"Note.—I think that it is accepted law that innominate contracts of an anomalous and unusual character cannot be constituted by parole testimony alone. The pursuer's case is laid solely upon a verbal arrangement, under which his author was to receive the sum now sued for. The only question, therefore, is whether that arrangement founded on falls within the description of contracts which cannot be proved parole. I think it very obviously does.

"The case laid is—(1) that Robert Macdougall, being the building superintendent for John Cyril Macdougall, and acting as such superintendent, engaged defender as the measurer for the building [that is to say, that Robert Macdougall as superintendent, and defender as measurer, were alike the employees of John Cyril Macdougall]; (2) that Robert Macdougall, on his employer's behalf, undertook to pay defender certain fees, but that on his own behalf Robert Macdougall arranged verbally with defender that of such fees—which were represented to the employer as going into defender's pocket—a proportion was really to find its way into the private pocket of Robert Macdougall.

"This secret commission arrangement is what pursuer wants to prove parole. I don't think the action as laid is relevant.

"I think, also, that the case is irrelevant in respect the sum sued for is claimed by Robert Macdougall personally. Upon pursuer's own statement of his case, Robert Macdougall could not take this sum personally, for he says he was

11*a* and 12*a*

1ST DIV. Macdougall v. Bremner.

John Cyril Macdougall's agent, and if an agent gets a rebate upon an account payable by his principal, that rebate belongs, not to the agent, but to the principal.

"I think, further, that the case as stated is not relevant, because a rebate upon fees cannot be claimed until the fees themselves have been paid, and it is not here averred that John Cyril Macdougall has paid the measurer's fees to defender. I accordingly sustain defender's first plea in law, and I do not therefore require to express any opinion upon the second plea, which possibly would have necessitated at least a limited proof."

The pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

Argued for the Appellants: The contract was not of so unusual or anomalous character that it could not be constituted by parole evidence alone (Forbes v. Caird, 1877, 4 R. 1141; Henderson v. United Collieries, 1904, 11 S.L.T. 653).

Argued for the Respondents: The alleged contract was a pactum illicitum and contrary to public policy, and could not be enforced by the Court (Laughland v. Millar, Laughland & Co., 1904, 6 F. 413; Harrington v. Victoria Graving Dock, 1878, 3 Q.B. Div. 549). It was a bargain of the kind which was now an offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 6 Edw. VII. cap. 34.

The Court assoilzied the defender.

Lord M'Laren.—This action is brought by the assignee of a person who, as clerk of works, had charge of the erection of certain buildings in Glasgow. This clerk of works, Mr Robert Macdougall, employed John Bremner, the defender, as measurer to make the measurements on which the tradesmen were to be paid, and as a condition of giving him the employment he avers that he stipulated for payment of a commission of ¾ per cent. upon the total amount of the contracts of the tradesmen as ascertained by the measurement. That was a substantial proportion of what Mr Bremner was to get for doing the measuring. The action is brought to enforce payment of this secret commission. The Sheriff-Substitute has dismissed the action on the ground that the contract was an innominate contract of an anomalous and unusual character, which could not be proved by parole testimony alone.

I do not think that it is necessary to consider whether the case does fall within the rule on which the Sheriff founds. I am not at all disposed to say that the Sheriff-Substitute's finding is wrong. But it seems to me that there is a clearer and more direct ground of decision, and that is that the stipulation is illegal. It is true that this defence is not specially pleaded. But where the nature of the transaction is disclosed on the face of the proceedings, it is consistent with the known law on this subject that the Court will refuse to give decree in an action to enforce a pactum illicitum. There is no doubt that the stipulation which it is here sought to enforce was within the class of obligations contrary to public policy. This is assumed in the Act of Parliament recently passed, because it is impossible otherwise to suppose that the Legislature would have made it punishable to bargain for a secret commission. I am confirmed in proposing to decide the case on the ground I have stated by the case of Harrington, to which we were referred; and apart from authority, I am sure your Lordships would not give the aid of the process of the Court to enforce a bargain which the Legislature has declared to be a crime.

REPARATION — RELEVANCY — NEGLIGENCE—PROPERTY—DUTY OF PUBLIC AUTHORITY WITH REGARD TO UNFENCED ARTIFICIAL POND IN PUBLIC PARK — SAFETY OF CHILDREN UNATTENDED—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 208.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Pursuer reclaimed and argued: This was an artificial pond constructed by the defenders in a place to which children had access and were known to resort. It was the duty of the defenders to construct such a pond so as not to be a danger to children; in any case their duty to fence it for their protection was clear (Greer v. Stirlingshire Road Trs., 1882, 9 R. 1069; Gibson v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, 1893, 20 R. 466). The Lord Ordinary in his judgment founded to some extent upon the fact that the child had been allowed to be unattended. That did not amount to contributory negligence on the part of the parents (Martin v. Wards, 1887, 14 R. 814; Forbes v. Aberdeen Commissioners, 1888, 15 R. 323).

The Court, without calling upon counsel for the respondents, refused the reclaiming note.

The Lord President.—My Lords, I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right. I do not think it expedient, in such a case as this, to lay down in general terms what are the precise duties which lie on persons who, like the magistrates here, have the care of public places; but the existence of the so-called negligence which is averred here would, in my humble judgment, prevent the existence of artificial water at all.

I think the learned counsel commented too much on the topic of contributory negligence, and neglected to consider what was the proximate cause of the accident. The proximate cause was not the existence of the pond, but the fact of the child being unattended. He says the child had a right to be there; of course it had, just as a child has a right to be on the public street. But if the parents of children of such tender years cannot provide nurses to look after them, those children run risks which other children who are more carefully looked after do not. That cannot be altered by law; it is just one of the results of the world as we find it; and to say that if a child unattended falls into a pond and is drowned that imposes liability on the magistrates, seems to me to be against all common sense. It may be quite true, as the reclaimer's counsel stated, that the pieces of water in the other parks of Edinburgh are natural and not artificial, but I see no distinction in this matter between pieces of water which are natural and those which are artificial. I never heard that if a child who was left to run about unattended fell into the Serpentine the owners of Hyde Park would be liable. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

Lord Kinnear.—I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship. There is here no question of contributory negligence. What we are asked to consider is whether there is here a relevant averment of fault on the part of the magistrates, and until that question is decided no question of contributory negligence can arise.

Children cannot be left by their parents to play in public places except subject to the risks which must necessarily be attendant on such places.

Lord Pearson.—I also agree.—2nd July 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling and Low.)

86. Cassidy v. Connochie.

I. Slander — Relevancy — No Damage—Charge against Police Constable of Taking Bribes — Investigation with Result of Clearing the Constable in the Eyes of Superior Officers—Proof Allowed.

II. Slander — Privilege — Information by Member of Public to Chief Constable that Sergeant of Police Took Bribes from Publicans—Communication Held Privileged.

III. Mora—Action of Damages — Verbal Slander—Action Raised Three and a Half Years after Slander Uttered —Slander of Police Constable—Constable Unable to Raise Action while Member of Police Force — Action Raised after Retiral on Pension—Plea of Mora Repelled.

Appeal against Interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

This was an action of damages for verbal slander alleged to have been uttered in November 1902, the present action having been raised in June 1906. The material averments for the pursuer were as follows, the words printed in italics having been added by amendment at the hearing on 4th July 1907:—

Cond. 1. The pursuer Patrick Cassidy was for over thirty years in the Dumbartonshire Constabulary, from which he retired on pension on 2nd December 1905. At his retiral he held the rank of sergeant, and in November 1902 he was sergeant in charge at Duntocher Police Station. The defender Daniel Connochie is a spirit dealer in Glasgow, and at the date mentioned he resided in Helensburgh.

Cond. 2. On or about 14th November 1902 the pursuer met Mr T. Y. Paterson, brewer, 284–288 Castle Street, Glasgow, in Hardgate, Duntocher, when the latter invited him for some refreshment into the public-house there kept by John Black. The pursuer refused the invitation, which was urgently pressed upon him by Paterson. Later in the day the pursuer again met Paterson, who repeated his invitation and invited him into the public-house of Robert Horne, Hardgate, Duntocher, and the pursuer then accompanied Paterson into Mr Horne's house, where he was served with a refreshment. Immediately thereafter Paterson rose and went out hurriedly, and on his way out he threw some money upon the table in the room, saying to Horne "Give the sergeant a bottle of whisky," or words to that effect. The pursuer, who was very much annoyed at what had taken place, indignantly refused to accept either the whisky or the money, and at once left the house.

Cond. 3. On or about 28th November 1902 the pursuer again met Paterson in Hardgate, Duntocher, when he urgently pressed him to accompany him to John Black's public-house for a refreshment, but the pursuer peremptorily declined the invitation. Defender was with Paterson when the invitation was given and refused.

2nd Div.

Cassidy v. Connochie.

Cond. 4. The pursuer believes and avers that on or about said date Paterson and the defender called at the said public-house kept by Robert Horne, where they falsely represented to James M'Kenna (the person then in charge) that the defender was one of Paterson's English travellers, and the defender or Paterson then and there handed to M'Kenna a small sum of money with the remark that it was "for a dram for the sergeant," meaning the pursuer. When the pursuer was informed of this he indignantly and peremptorily repudiated the suggestion that he should take either the drink or the money, and it is believed and averred that the said Robert Horne returned both sums of money to Paterson in a registered letter.

Cond. 5. On or about Sunday 30th November 1902, and in or near the Roman Catholic Church in Helensburgh, the defender falsely and calumniously stated to Chief Constable M'Hardy of the Dumbartonshire Constabulary that the pursuer was guilty of irregularities of a serious nature in the performance of his duties as sergeant of police which rendered him unworthy of occupying the position he held; and in particular he then and there falsely and calumniously stated to the said Chief Constable that the pursuer had accepted bribes from the said T. Y. Paterson, and that Paterson had on two occasions, condescended on in Articles 2 and 4, left money with the said Robert Horne for the pursuer, who applied for and received spirits from the latter. The defender further, at the same time and place, falsely and calumniously stated to the same Chief-Constable that the pursuer had been heavily indebted to his grocer and had received money by way of bribe from Horne or Paterson to pay off the debt. The said statements were also made maliciously and without probable cause.

Cond. 6. The said statements were made by the defender of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represented, and were meant by the defender to represent, that the pursuer was guilty of misconduct and corruption in the exercise of his duties, and had accepted bribes from publicans and others not to report offences against the licensing laws, and that pursuer was thereby unfit to act as sergeant of police.

Cond. 7. The pursuer had repeatedly reported John Black, publican, Hardgate, Duntocher, for breach of his certificate, and he believes and avers that the defender and the said T. Y. Paterson, or one or other of them, were interested in the business carried on by Black, and had formed a scheme to bribe the pursuer not to report further breaches of certificates, and if he had accepted the bribes offered to him to deter him from reporting such breaches by threatening to report him to the Chief Constable if he did so, or otherwise to represent that the pursuer had accepted bribes and thereby to have him dismissed from the constabulary, or at all events removed from that district, so that he might not have an opportunity of reporting further breaches of certificate by Black. The pursuer further believes and avers that in pursuance of this scheme the defender and Paterson attempted to bribe the pursuer, as condescended on in Articles 2 and 4, and having failed to induce the pursuer to accept any bribe the defender falsely and calumniously made the statements complained of, with the intention and for the purpose of having the pursuer dismissed from his employment.

Cond. 8. As a result of the said false and calumnious statements Chief Constable M'Hardy, on or about 1st December 1902, summoned the pursuer to headquarters in Dumbarton and charged him with accepting bribes of drink and money from Paterson and Horne, and, although the pursuer denied the charges, the Chief Constable instructed Depute-Chief Constable Cameron to proceed to Duntocher and inquire into the charges and to report. The Depute-Chief Constable instituted inquiries at Duntocher accordingly, and reported in writing that the charges against the pursuer were unfounded. Thereafter the Chief Constable instituted other inquiries, and in particular he summoned the said Robert Horne to Dumbarton and examined him with reference to the said charges, with the same result.

Cond. 9. The pursuer, under conditions of his service in the Dumbartonshire constabulary, was debarred from instituting any action for damages for the slanders complained of while he remained in the service without the consent of the Chief Constable, for which he applied verbally and in writing, but the Chief Constable refused to give his permission, and undertook to get a withdrawal of and an apology from the defender for the slanders, but it is believed and averred that the defender refused to make any apology.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia:

"2. The defender having maliciously and without probable cause slandered the pursuer as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as prayed for."

The Defender pleaded, inter alia:

"1*a*. Privilege.

"2. The action is irrelevant."

The Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) sustained the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed.

Argued for the Pursuer: 1. Relevancy. It was no answer to say that, the slanderous statement being on investigation found to be false, the pursuer was retained in his situation as police sergeant, and that therefore he suffered no damage. There was damage to feelings and reputation, and the pursuer was entitled to something in name of solatium, or at least to an apology. 2. Privilege. There was here no privilege. It was not enough that the person to whom the communication was made had an interest to know, if the person making it had no duty, legal or moral, to make it (M'Callum v. M'Diarmid & Co., 1900, 2 F. 357, per Lord Kincairney at 359). Facts and circumstances shewing malice were averred, and it was not necessary to use the word "maliciously" in the condescendence. The averment of malice and want of probable cause was there in substance, and it was pleaded in the pleas in law. Ob majorum cautelam the pursuer was willing to amend by averring it. 3. Mora. Mora was not a plea in law. It was a circumstance bearing on the evidence (Bain v. Assets Co. Ltd., 1905, 7 F.

(H.L.) 105, per Lord Davey at 109; Moncrieff v. Waugh, 1859, 21 D. 216). The delay in bringing this action was explained in a satisfactory manner. The pursuer was really non valens agere, so far as this case was concerned, while he was in the police force (Cunningham v. Skinner, 1902, 4 F. 1124; Winn v. Quillan, 1899, 2 F. 322).

Argued for Defender: [Counsel was asked to speak only to the questions of relevancy and mora, the Court being satisfied that the occasion was a privileged one]. 1. Relevancy. The privilege here was of a very high order. Facts and circumstances shewing malice must be averred, and these must be independent of the facts averred as ground of action in this case (Campbell v. Cochrane, 1905, 8 F. 205, per Lord President at 212, and Lord M'Laren at 214). There was no proper averment that a scheme had been concocted by the defender. In any event, the pursuer must amend by averring malice and want of probable cause. 2. Mora. Cases of verbal slander were the very cases above all others in which action must be taken at once if the pursuer was not to be held to have given up any claim he had. In Winn's case the slanders were continuous, down to the time of raising action. In Cunningham's case there had been an action prior to that in question, which had been dismissed because the pursuer was unable to find caution. There was a pecuniary disability which had prevented the pursuer suing earlier. He had, in effect, given notice to the defender that he had not departed from his claim. The position of the defender must be considered as well as that of the pursuer (Young v. Young, 1903, 5 F. 330; Assets Co. Ltd. v. Bain, 1904, 6 F. 676, per Lord Kyllachy at 685; 1905, 7 F. (H.L.) 105, per Lord Chancellor at 106; Colvin v. Johnstone, 1890, 18 R. 115). There were the two elements of (a) hardship on the defender, and (b) presumed abandonment of claim. In such a case as this the latter was probably the more important. 3. If the pursuer amended and the case was sent back to the Sheriff as relevant, the defender should get full expenses (Thornton v. Boyd & Forrest, 1907, S.C. 390).

Counsel for the pursuer craved leave to amend by adding the words printed in italics at the end of Cond. 5. Leave was granted.

The Court sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor appealed against, remitted the cause to the Sheriff to proceed as accords, and found no expenses due to or by either party since the date of the interlocutor appealed against.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—In this case a retired police sergeant sues a publican in Glasgow for alleged slander. The slander is said to have been uttered on 30th November 1902. It is practically admitted that something of the nature alleged was said by the defender, although there is some dispute as to the exact terms of his communication to the chief constable. The pursuer retired from the police force on 2nd December 1905. This action was brought in June 1906. The Sheriff-Substitute has disposed of the case in this way: he has sustained the "defender's first and second pleas." By that I think it clear he means the defender's pleas 1, 1A and 2, because he refers to these pleas in a way which shews that he intended to sustain them all. I do not think that is the right way of disposing of the action.

1. As to the defender's first plea, viz. mora, I agree that in the ordinary case there is no justification for bottling up—if I may so express it—an action of damages for slander, particularly when it is for verbal slander uttered in rixa, or when it is merely a case of loss of temper or good manners. No Court will encourage a stale action of slander, and I would say that an action of slander might generally be described as stale where the slander has been uttered four years before the bringing of the action. But with regard to mora, in this case it is to my mind a decisive consideration that during most of the time which elapsed between the utterance of the slander and the bringing of the action the pursuer was under inhibition from his superior officer. Under the rules of the police force he required the consent of the chief constable before he could bring an action. It is not disputed that such consent was asked and was refused, but the refusal was coupled with something like a promise by the chief constable that he would ask the defender for a retraction. The retraction was refused. Looking to this fact, and considering that the pursuer only left the police force on 2nd December 1905, it is, I think, impossible to say that there was any undue delay in raising the action.

2. With regard to the plea of privilege I think the Sheriff-Substitute was undoubtedly right in saying that this was a privileged occasion, and that an averment of malice and want of probable cause was necessary. But this defect has been cured by amendment. I do not know why the words now inserted were not there from the first, because the pursuer is not under the necessity of adding any averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice. Such facts and circumstances were already distinctly alleged on record, because the pursuer avers that the defender and another person being interested in the business carried on by a publican whom the pursuer had repeatedly reported for breach of certificate, had formed a scheme either to induce the pursuer to accept bribes and so to obtain a hold over him by threatening to report him; or otherwise, to represent that the pursuer had accepted bribes, and so to get him dismissed. Anything more serious, or more calculated to found a charge of malice, if proved, I cannot imagine. But it is not necessary to dilate on that part of the case, because the pursuer does not ask for an issue, but is willing that the case should go back to the Sheriff Court to be tried before the Sheriff himself.

2nd Div.
Cassidy v. Connochie.
Lord Stormonth-Darling.

3. The remaining plea sustained by the Sheriff-Substitute is that the action is irrelevant. All that he says about that is that this "is a claim for injury to reputation, and pursuer's own statement is that he suffered no such injury, because after official enquiry, his reputation was cleared to the satisfaction of the only parties to whom the slander is alleged to have been uttered." I cannot agree with this. No doubt the pursuer was cleared in the eyes of his superior officer, and therefore did not suffer any injury of that particular kind. But if a slander has been uttered, the pursuer is prima facie entitled to some damages, or at all events to an apology. Therefore I think this is not a good reason for dismissing the action on the ground of irrelevancy. On the whole matter, I think, now that the necessary words have been added to the record, we should recal the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor and remit to him to proceed as accords.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. I should only like to say this—I think that when an action is raised on the ground of slander, and particularly verbal slander, it ought to be brought within a reasonable time after the slander has been uttered; and the Court will view with disfavour any considerable delay. In this case a long period elapsed between the uttering of the slander and the raising of the action; but that delay has been explained in a way which is entirely satisfactory. Further, the defender has not, so far as I can judge, been prejudiced by the delay, and therefore the plea of mora is not, in my opinion, well founded. In other respects I agree with what has been said by my brother Lord Stormonth-Darling.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I agree. The plea of mora should not be sustained as a ground for preventing enquiry into the facts, except in very special circumstances. Here the delay is explained. As to the relevancy of the action the Sheriff-Substitute says that the pursuer has sustained no damage. I think that is an assumption which cannot be made. When there is a relevant averment of slander, the question whether there has or has not been damage to the pursuer cannot be decided until there has been enquiry into the facts.—4th July 1907.

87. Brims & Mackay and Others v. M'Neill & Sime, S.S.C., and Others.

Process — Summons — Competency — Several Pursuers—Community of Interest —Several Claims—Action to Recover Debts Due to Existing Firm and to Dissolved Firm of Same Name to Whose Business It Succeeded — Action Raised in Name of Both Firms—Conclusion for Payment of Single Sum—Action Held Incompetent.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Guthrie.

This was an action of count, reckoning and payment, raised at the instance of "Brims & Mackay, Solicitors, Thurso," the partners thereof, the trustees of the deceased James Brims, and "the now dissolved firm of Brims & Mackay, Solicitors, Thurso," against "M'Neill & Sime, S.S.C., Edinburgh, and James Adam Pattullo, S.S.C., and Henry Vetch, S.S.C., the individual partners of said firm, as such partners, and also against the said James Adam Pattullo, as an individual." The summons concluded against the defenders "conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally," for payment of the sum of £200 sterling.

The action was raised to recover money alleged to be due under an agreement entered into in 1893 between Brims & Mackay and Pattullo, by which the former sent business to the latter on condition of receiving a certain share of the fees earned.

The firm of Brims & Mackay as it existed in 1893 was dissolved in 1901 by the death of one of the partners, James Brims, but the business was carried on under the same name by another firm, and it was averred that "by arrangement between the parties, it is provided that all accounts due to the late firm of Brims & Mackay are to be collected by and paid to the present firm of Brims & Mackay." In 1893 Pattullo was in business on his own account, but in 1898 he entered into partnership with Vetch, and thereafter the two carried on business under the firm name of M'Neill & Sime. The sum sued for was in respect of business sent to Pattullo both before and after 1901, and both before and after he became a member of the firm of M'Neill & Sime.

The defenders, M'Neill & Sime, pleaded, inter alia: "2. The action as laid is incompetent. 3. The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed."

The defender Pattullo pleaded, inter alia:

"1. No title to sue.

"2. The action as laid is incompetent.

"3. The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed.

"4. The arrangement or agreement condescended on with reference to the matter of agency fees is only provable by this defender's writ or oath."

On 26th March 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:

Sustains the second and third pleas in law for the defenders M'Neill & Sime; dismisses the action so far as directed against them, and decerns; . . . . further, repels the first, third and fourth pleas in law for the defender James Adam Pattullo, and quoad the said defender and the pursuers, allows them a proof habili modo of their respective averments.

He delivered the following opinion:—

Lord Guthrie.—The defenders M'Neill & Sime maintained their first, second, third and seventh pleas, namely, no title to sue, incompetency, irrelevancy and prescription. The defender Mr Pattullo maintained similar pleas.

So far as the defenders M'Neill & Sime are concerned, I sustain their pleas to competency and relevancy, and dismiss the action against them.

The objection of these defenders to relevancy was founded on the absence of any relevant averment of an agreement between them and the pursuers to allow the pursuers a share of agency fees. The agreement founded on by the pursuers is alleged to have been made in 1893, when Mr Pattullo began business on his own account, and, as in a question with him, it is said to have continued after he became a partner of the firm of M'Neill & Sime in 1898. But I find no averment of any agreement between the pursuers and M'Neill & Sime, nor any sufficient averment of actings on the part of that firm which necessarily implied such an agreement, apart from Mr Pattullo's alleged obligation.

On the question of competency, both sets of defenders object to the proposal of the pursuers to recover one sum of £200 from them "conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally." They point out that, while Mr Pattullo's alleged obligation applies to the whole period covered by the condescendence, namely, from 1894 to 1906, M'Neill & Sime had admittedly no relations with the pursuers till 1898, when Mr Pattullo joined the firm. The result is, they say, that the summons contains a conclusion under which it would be possible to find M'Neill & Sime liable for the proportion of the £200 concluded for effeiring to the period between 1894 and 1898, for which, according to the pursuers' averments, Mr Pattullo is alone responsible. I think this objection is well founded, and that the case is indistinguishable from that of Sinclair v. Caithness Flagstone Co., 1898, 25 R. 703, per Lord Kinnear, p. 707.

Turning now to the case against Mr Pattullo, I take first his seventh plea, relating to prescription. That plea cannot be disposed of at this stage. The pursuers aver that the accounts in question were incurred on written instructions, and further, that they formed one continuous series. These questions of fact must first be determined before the plea of prescription can be dealt with.

Mr Pattullo's plea on title to sue does not cover the whole accounts sued for. It relates to the period from 1894 to 1st August 1901, during which the firm of Brims & Mackay consisted of the late Mr James Brims and the pursuer Mr Alexander Mackay. Mr James Brims died on 1st August 1901, and thereafter the firm of Brims & Mackay, of which he had been a partner, subsisted only for the purpose of winding up by the surviving partner, Mr Alexander Mackay. For the accounts alleged to be due in connection with work done during that period, the only pursuers are the late Mr James Brims' trustees and "the now dissolved firm of Brims & Mackay." Mr Alexander Mackay is also a partner, but only as a partner of the existing firm of Brims & Mackay. It is said that in order to constitute a good instance for recovery of the accounts during the existence of the dissolved firm, Mr Alexander Mackay ought to have been a pursuer as the surviving partner of that firm.

2nd Div.

Brims & Mackay and Others v. M'Neill & Sime, S.S.C., and Others.

This objection is technical, and in the absence of express authority in its support, I repel it. It is admitted that in the case of an existing firm like Brims & Mackay, with a personal firm name, it is not necessary to conjoin the names of any of the partners in order to make a good instance. If this be so, I do not see sufficient reason for holding that a debt due to a firm, which, although dissolved so as to be incapable of carrying on business, still subsists for the purpose of winding up, cannot be recovered without conjoining in the instance the surviving partner or partners, or, at least, the surviving partner who is in charge of winding up (II. Bell's Comm. 527, 533). The cases quoted by the defenders in support of their view were cases where the firm name was descriptive and not personal, and where, therefore, whether dissolved or not, the names of the partners were necessary.

I shall therefore repel Mr Pattullo's first plea of no title to sue, and also his third plea to relevancy. I think the pursuers have sufficiently averred a case of express contract between him and them of the nature alleged by them, and have also made a sufficient case, so far as averment goes, as a foundation for their third plea.

The defender Pattullo reclaimed and argued: The action was incompetent, in respect that the two sets of pursuers—the existing firm of Brims & Mackay and the dissolved firm of Brims & Mackay—had no community of interest, and were suing for independent debts (Killin, 1905, 7 F. 526; Gibson, 1866, 5 M. 113). It was further incompetent in respect that it concluded for payment of a single sum of money, and that there was no specification of the amounts claimed by the pursuers respectively.

Argued for the Respondents: A dissolved firm could sue in its own name—if it were a personal one—without conjoining the name of a surviving partner (Nicoll, 1877, 5 R. 137; Lindley on Partnership, p. 837). Even though the case were dismissed as against one defender, it did not necessarily fail as against the other (Robinson, 1900, 2 F. 928). There was no absolute rule against different pursuers conjoining in one action; it was a matter of convenience, depending upon the circumstances of each case (Cowan, 1876, 4 R. (H.L.) 14, at p. 17). In the present case the form of action chosen was the most suitable, as it convened all the parties having an interest in the matter. The two firms of Brims & Mackay were intimately connected, as predecessor and successor in the same business.

2ND DIV.

Brims & Mackay and Others v. M'Neill & Sime, S.S.C. and Others.

Counsel for the respondents intimated that they acquiesced in the decision of the Lord Ordinary dismissing the action as against M'Neill & Sime.

The Court sustained the second plea in law for the defender Pattullo, and dismissed the action.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case a firm of Brims & Mackay are said to have sent business to Mr Pattullo, the defender, on special terms, and it is for fulfilment of these terms that the action is brought.

In 1898 Pattullo joined partnership with one Vetch, and they carried on business under the firm of M'Neill & Sime. The pursuers now ask an accounting for all business sent by them to Pattullo, both before and after the institution of the co-partnery.

They lay their action (1) against Pattullo, (2) against M'Neill & Sime, and (3) against Pattullo and Vetch as the partners of that firm. They ask decree conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally.

The question now is whether the Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding the pursuers to have a title to sue Pattullo. I agree with him in thinking that they have such a title. That he was employed by them is distinctly averred, and the terms of the employment are distinctly specified.

But that is not the only question with which the Lord Ordinary deals. Another important question is whether the action is competent, seeing that the firm of Brims & Mackay, which now exists, and which sues the action, was not the firm with which the bargain with Pattullo took place. The original firm was broken up by the death of Mr Brims in 1901, and although there is now a firm of Brims & Mackay, it is not the same firm as that which existed prior to 1901. The debts of Pattullo were due to the firm which came to an end in that year, and there is no connection of title or of right to the second firm for debts due to the first. It cannot be successfully maintained that the new firm has any joint interest to entitle them to sue for the debts incurred before they came into existence.

Moreover, there is no distinction drawn in the summons between debts said to have been incurred by Pattullo while the old firm subsisted, and debts which may have been incurred after it had ceased to exist. The pursuers have failed by any specification, by separate conclusions, to distinguish between what is alleged to be due to the old firm and what to the new.

It appears to me in these circumstances that Mr Pattullo's plea must be sustained, with the result that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled and the action dismissed.

Lord Low.—The circumstances in which this action has been brought may be stated very shortly.

It appears that in 1893 the defender Pattullo commenced business on his own account as a law agent in Edinburgh, and the pursuers aver that the then firm of Brims & Mackay, law agents in Thurso, from time to time sent business to him upon the condition, to which he agreed, that they should receive one-third of the fees which he earned. In 1898 Pattullo went into partnership with the defender Henry Vetch, and the two of them carried on business as law agents under the name of M'Neill & Sime. The pursuers aver that thereafter they continued to send business to Pattullo on the same footing as before. In these circumstances they call for an account of the fees recovered upon all the business sent by them to Pattullo, both before and after he became a member of the firm of M'Neill & Sime.

The action is brought not only against Pattullo as an individual, but against the firm of M'Neill & Sime, and Pattullo and Vetch as the partners thereof, and decree for the full sum of £200 claimed by the pursuers is asked against the defenders "conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally."

The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action in so far as it is directed against M'Neill & Sime, on the grounds (1) that the pursuers have no title to sue, because they have made no relevant averment of an agreement to share fees with M'Neill & Sime; and (2) that the action as laid is incompetent, in respect that it is sought to make M'Neill & Sime liable for that part of the £200 which represents the alleged debt due by Pattullo alone before he joined that firm. So far, the interlocutor has not been challenged. The Lord Ordinary has, however, further held that the pursuers have a title to sue Pattullo, and the first question is whether he was right in doing so?

That is a question which is not free from difficulty, but I agree with the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary; and if it had been the only question which we had to determine I should have been prepared to adhere.

There is, however, another question which was very fully argued before us, but with which the Lord Ordinary has not dealt. That question is, whether the action as laid against Pattullo is competent? Pattullo's second plea in law is that the action as laid is incompetent. The Lord Ordinary, however, has not dealt in any way with that plea, although he has repelled the first plea (of no title to sue), the third plea (that the pursuers' averments are irrelevant), and the fourth plea (that the agreement averred can only be proved by writ or oath). Probably the question was not argued to the Lord Ordinary, at all events as fully as it was in this Court, and his Lordship may have thought that he would be better able to deal with the competency of the action after the facts had been ascertained.

The conclusion to which I have come, after careful consideration, is that the second plea for Pattullo should be sustained.

It is well settled that two or more unconnected persons cannot sue in one joint action, unless they have been aggrieved by the same act of the defender, or have a joint interest in the matter libelled (Killin v. Weir, 7 F. 526).

Now it was argued that the two firms of Brims & Mackay—that is to say, the firm which was dissolved in 1901, and the existing firm—cannot be regarded as unconnected persons, because the same business has been carried on by them in succession without any break in its continuity. That is quite true; but as regards debts due to the old firm and the new firm respectively there is no connection between them. It is not said that the new firm acquired, by assignation or otherwise, debts due to the old firm. All that is said is that an arrangement has been made for the new firm to collect accounts due to the old firm, but that only means that for the purpose of collecting accounts the new firm is authorised to act as the agents of the old firm. The fact remains that so far as the right and title to debts due to them respectively are concerned, there is no connection between the two firms.

Again, I do not think that even if the two firms could be regarded as being only technically and not in any practical sense unconnected persons, they have a joint interest in the matter libelled. No doubt they both claim debts incurred in respect that both firms in succession employed Pattullo to do business for them, and in some cases employment which was commenced by the old firm was continued by the new firm. But in whatever amount Pattullo may be indebted to the two firms, it must be divisible into two portions, the one due to the old firm alone and the other due to the new firm alone.

Again, even if it could be said that both firms founded on the same act of the defender, namely, his refusal to carry out the agreement alleged to have been made with the old firm and continued with the new firm when it came into existence, the action as laid would still be incompetent, because it would have been necessary to have separate conclusions, the one specifying the sum alleged to be due to the old firm, and the other the sum alleged to be due to the new firm (Harkes v. Mowat, 24 D. 701).

There are other grave objections to the form of the action, which, however, it is unnecessary to consider, because if the view which I take be sound it is sufficient for the disposal of the case.

I am therefore of opinion that the second plea in law for Pattullo should be sustained, and the action dismissed.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with the opinion just delivered by my brother Lord Low, but I would like to say in regard to what his Lordship seems to have had in view in the last sentence or two of his opinion, that I desire to reserve my judgment on the question of title to sue as viewed from the standpoint of form. I am of opinion that if the pursuers Brims & Mackay sue as agents for, or in any other capacity representing, the old firm of the same name, and they do apparently sue as such agents, that capacity or character should have been set forth in the instance of the summons.

It may be quite true, as stated in the record, that an arrangement was made with the old firm that "all accounts due to the late firm of Brims & Mackay are to be collected by and paid to the present firm of Brims & Mackay." And we all know that it is a very common arrangement that all assets of a firm should be handed over to and collected by a succeeding firm; but if that is so in this case it should have appeared in some way in the instance of the summons, and the mandate, assignation, agreement, or other document conferring on them a title to sue for sums due to the old firm and to recover payment thereof ought also to have been mentioned in the instance of the summons. With this reservation I agree entirely with what has been said by Lord Low, and think that the action should be dismissed.—2nd July 1907.

Process—Interdict—Appeal from Sheriff Court—Interlocutor of Sheriff-Substitute Granting Interdict Appealed to Inner House—Application by Appellant to Court of Session for Recal of Interdict Pending Decision of Appeal—Application Refused—Court of Session Act 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sects. 69 and 79.

Note in Appeal from an Interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Renfrew.

This was an application by way of note craving the Court to recal an interdict obtained in the Sheriff Court pending the decision of an appeal against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute granting the said interdict.

In this action the pursuer, a farmer in the Upper District of the County of Renfrew, inter alia, craved interdict against the defenders discharging sewage from the village of Mearns and from certain irrigation works into a certain burn in such a manner as to pollute the water thereof and render it unfit for the primary purposes. On 11th June 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute granted interdict as craved. The defenders appealed against this interlocutor, and on 5th July presented this note to the First Division. They pointed out therein the serious consequences which would follow the enforcement of the interdict. It would be necessary to abandon the present purification works, constructed at great expense, and to erect new works. Further, until the completion of the new works the disposal of the sewage of Newton Mearns could not be conducted in a manner consistent with public safety. They accordingly, in Single Bills, craved the Court, pending the decision of the present appeal, to recal the interdict granted by the Sheriff-Substitute as aforesaid.

Sects. 69 and 79 of the Court of Session Act 1868 were referred to in argument. They enact respectively as follows:—

"Sect. 69. Effect of Appeals under this Act.—Such appeal shall be effectual to submit to the review of the Court of Session the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause, not only at the instance of the appellant, but also at the instance of every other party appearing in the appeal, to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice without hindrance from the terms of any interlocutor in the cause, and without the necessity of any counter appeal; and an appellant shall not be at liberty to withdraw or abandon an appeal without leave of the Court; and an appeal may be insisted in by any party in the cause other than the appellant, in the same manner and to the like effect as if it had been taken by himself."

"Sect. 79. Regulation of Interim Possession, pending Appeal to the Court of Session.—In all cases where the judgment of any inferior court shall be brought under the review of the Court of Session by appeal it shall be competent for the inferior court to regulate in the meantime, on the application of either party, all matters relating to interim possession, having due regard to the manner in which the interests of the parties may be affected by the final decision of the cause; and such interim order shall not be subject to review, except by the Court at the hearing of such appeal, when the Court shall have full power to give such orders and direction in respect to interim possession as justice may require."

The Court refused the note.

The Lord President.—This application raises a point which, it is surprising to find, is novel. One would have supposed that the point would have arisen before, but counsel have not been able to produce any authority. The matter arises in this way. The Upper District Committee of the County Council of Renfrew have had an action raised against them in the Sheriff Court at Renfrew seeking to interdict them from discharging sewage into a certain burn from their irrigation works. Now these sewage works are part of a sewage scheme of the defenders, and it is clear that to prevent the operation of these sewage works is a very serious thing. The pursuer asserts that the defenders are doing an illegal act, and the Sheriff-Substitute has so found, and has, causa cognita, granted interdict.

I assume, of course, at present, that that interlocutor is right, but at the same time it is a judgment against which the defenders are entitled to appeal, and they have appealed. They have also lodged this note to the Lord President, pointing out the serious consequences which the enforcement of the interdict would involve, and craving that, pending the decision of the appeal, the interdict granted by the Sheriff-Substitute should be recalled.

I have come to be of opinion that the course asked by the defenders is incompetent, but that the defenders are not without remedy. The matter is regulated by two sections of the Court of Session Act 1868, viz. sects. 69 and 79. Sect. 69 is the section which determines the effect of appeals from the Sheriff Court to this Court, and it provides [his Lordship quoted the section]. The matter is more particularly dealt with in sect. 79. It provides [his Lordship quoted the section]. It seems to me that sect. 79 covers the case, and that it is perfectly possible for the defenders to make a motion before the Sheriff-Substitute asking him to suspend the operation of the interdict until the appeal shall have been decided in this case. It will not affect the decree, and in truth will not be an ordinary interlocutor in the cause. I say this, that the Sheriff-Substitute may not be hampered by the fact that the process is here. It will not, as I have said, be, strictly speaking, an interlocutor in the cause, but will be an independent interlocutor written on a separate interlocutor sheet, though, of course, the interlocutor will be subject to review in terms of the 79th section.

I have no doubt that what I have said will be before the Sheriff-Substitute when he comes to consider the suggested application, and that he will have it in mind that it is a very serious thing to stop the operation of a drainage scheme when perhaps—I don't say probably, but perhaps—the judgment may be reversed.

(Lord Johnston.)

89. More (Morton's Trustee) v. Kirkhope & Gilmour.

Right in Security — Law Agent—Absolute Disposition to Law Agents — Back Letter—Trust Disposition and Settlement —Sequestration of Trust Estate—Trustee in Bankruptcy—Accounting—Law Agents' Account for Professional Charges Held Chargeable Against Security Subjects Quoad Management and Realisation.

This was an action of accounting at the instance of David More, trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Morton, for the balance of the price of certain heritable properties sold by the defenders as ex facie absolute disponees. The defenders maintained that on a just accounting there remained a balance due to them.

The following statement of facts is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary :—

"James Morton, station master, South Beach, Ardrossan, died on 3rd September 1905, leaving a trust disposition and settlement in favour of Robert Gardiner and others, who accepted and acted. But as Morton's estate turned out to be insolvent they were superseded by the appointment, on 7th February 1906, of the pursuer David More, solicitor, Kilmarnock, as trustee on the estate which it was found necessary to sequestrate. Owing to the embarrassed condition of Mr Morton's affairs, a committee of creditors, of which the pursuer More was a member, had been appointed in October 1905 (said on record to be 1906, but the true date must be 1905), which had co-operated with the testamentary trustees until the estate was sequestrated.

"Mr Morton's financial embarrassment was occasioned by speculations in house property. At his death he had on hand a semi-detached villa and a self-contained cottage in Sorbie Road, Ardrossan, and two tenements of dwelling-houses at Catrine. The half villa in Sorbie Road was bonded for £400; the cottage in Sorbie Road was bonded for £450; and the tenements were bonded for £700 and £725 respectively. The total of these securities amounted to £2275. When the properties were realised at the Whitsunday after Mr Morton's death they brought £2735, which left a balance of £460, after deduction of the bonds. This £460 is the subject of dispute in the present action.

"Messrs Thomas Kirkhope & Gilmour, solicitors, Ardrossan, were the agents of Mr Morton, and had assisted him in his financial difficulties. After bonding the Sorbie Road villa and cottage as above mentioned, Mr Morton, on 9th June 1905, executed an ex facie absolute disposition of these subjects in favour of Messrs Thomas Kirkhope & Gilmour, and of even date a minute of agreement qualifying the terms of the disposition was entered into between the disponees and Mr Morton.

"The transaction with regard to the Catrine tenements is a little more complicated. The facts do not very clearly appear at present, but I gather that the ex facie absolute disposition of these tenements which Mr Morton executed in favour of Messrs Thomas Kirkhope & Gilmour, preceded the bonding of these tenements which was carried out at and shortly after Whitsunday 1905. I understand that the sums advanced on the faith of the ex facie absolute disposition were repaid out of the proceeds of the bonds, but that notwithstanding, the ex facie absolute disposition was allowed to stand, with what effect is one of the questions between the parties. But this disposition was also qualified by an agreement between the disponees and Mr Morton of even date with itself, viz. 1st March 1905."

The Pursuer pleaded: "3. In any event the defenders, so far as acting as their own factors and law agents in administering and realising the security subjects, are entitled only to their outlays."

The following cases were cited in argument. For the Pursuer: Robertson v. Duff, 1840, 2 D. 279; Callum v. Goldie, 1885, 12 R. 1137; National Bank of Scotland v. Union Bank, 1885, 13 R. 380, 1886, 14 R. (H.L.) 1; Anderson's Trs. v. John Somerville & Co. Ltd., 1899, 36 S.L.R. 833.

For the Defenders: Borthwick v. Scottish Widows' Fund, 1864, 2 M. 595; Mitchell v. Mackersy, 1905, 8 F. 198.

The Lord Ordinary found (1) that on the death of Mr Morton the defenders were not entitled to make further advances or to do further work to be charged against the security subjects except in the management and realisation of said subjects, unless by agreement; and (2) that the defenders were not precluded from making professional charges in connection with the management and realisation of the security subjects.

Lord Johnston [after narrating the facts above quoted].—The present action is in the form of an accounting raised by Mr More as trustee on Morton's sequestrated estate against Messrs Thomas Kirkhope & Gilmour for the balance of their intromissions with the heritable properties in question, which they have now sold under their ex facie absolute dispositions. Accounts have been lodged under my order, and objections and answers tabled of a voluminous and somewhat argumentative nature, the questions raised in which have been very keenly argued before me in the Procedure Roll. I am clear that I cannot dispose of the whole matters raised without proof or admissions, but I think it is proper, after the discussion which has been had, to consider the questions of law involved with a view of defining what remains for proof.

Messrs Thomas Kirkhope & Gilmour credit themselves with three items—£207, 16s. 4d., being cash advanced to Mr Morton, £200; and interest to 16th July 1906, £7, 16s. 4d., as per state No. 9 of process; further, with six business accounts against Mr Morton personally, amounting to £38, 2s. 2d.; and lastly, with a general account for business and outlays incurred to them by Mr Morton's trustees, the committee of his creditors and the pursuer as trustee on his sequestrated estate, from the date of Mr Morton's death down to Martinmas 1906, when the business connected with the transfer on sale of the security subjects was completed. This account amounts to £255, 11s. 6d. On the other hand, they debit themselves with a sum of £361, 17s. 10½d. as the balance of their intromissions on cash account from Mr Morton's death down to the sales of the security properties and settlement of the price. Accordingly, they bring out on their account, subject to the taxation of their accounts, which they have all along offered, a balance of £139, 12s. 1½d. due to them instead of anything due by them. The pursuer Mr More challenges not so much at present the accuracy of their accounts, as the defenders' right to charge the various items against the proceeds of the properties which they held under their ex facie absolute dispositions. His objections raise the questions of law which I have now to consider. These, I think, so far as they are general questions, may be summarised as follows:

First, Did the death of Mr Morton ipso facto close the accounts for which the subjects were held in security so that the defenders are not entitled to charge anything against their proceeds except the sums actually due by Mr Morton at the date of his death, together with the legitimate costs of realisation?

Second, Can the defenders legitimately charge more than their outlays in connection with the realisation of the subjects, they being themselves law agents, in respect that in doing so they would be auctores in rem suam?

Third, What was the effect of the pursuer's appointment? Can the defenders charge against the proceeds of the subjects any item of date subsequent to 7th February 1905? In this respect I do not think that the pursuer even admits the defenders' right to the legitimate costs of realisation, but maintains that he was wrongously prevented from realising under his statutory title. . . .

Taking, then, these general objections in the above order.

First, If the pursuer is right, the defenders are precluded from paying themselves out of the proceeds of the properties any more than their cash advances to Mr Morton . £200 0 0
Interest 7 16 4
The six business accounts, as these may be taxed 38 2 2

£245 18 6

There can be little doubt that under the agreements embodied in the back letters were covered only transactions between Mr Morton himself and the defenders. But I do not think that that ends the matter. It must be remembered that the back letters, though granted, never entered the record. On Mr Morton's death his trustees came into his rights and under his obligations. His right was to redeem the properties if he chose, and to the reversion of their price if he did not choose or was not able to redeem them. There has been much difference of opinion as to the character of this right, but I think it must now be accepted that though it was not a radical right in the strict sense, it was so in a popular sense. Morton was feudally divested, and his radical right depended not on his feudal title, but on the obligation his disponees lay under to him. His right of reversion was a jus actionis merely, and was therefore assignable (Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland, 14 R. (H.L.) 1). That right passed to his trustees. Now, notwithstanding the terms of the back letters, the defenders would have been entitled to retain against Mr Morton the reversion of his property if he had incurred debt to them not contemplated by the terms of the agreement or back letters, and I think that his trustees if they did not redeem the subjects, but left them in the defenders' hands, and thereafter incurred further debt to the defenders in the matter of Mr Morton's estate, though these were not contemplated by the terms of the agreement or back letters, were open to the same plea of retention that Mr Morton was himself.

While, therefore, there may be questions of fact arising on the accounts, I think, on the principle of retention, that the defenders have an effectual security in these ex facie absolute titles for advances made or debts incurred after Mr Morton's death and before the sequestration of the estate.

Further, there can be no question that they are entitled to the legitimate costs of realising their security. In fact, I have failed to understand the pursuer's contention to the contrary.

Second, It is maintained that these accounts must be restricted to outlays merely, and that the defenders cannot make business charges as solicitors in respect that they are acting as agents for themselves as creditors. I am not aware of this subject having been touched upon in the Scottish Courts except in the case of Brown's Trs. v. Horne in the Outer House (21st January 1905, 12 S.L.T. 614), and I cannot find that Lord Stormonth-Darling's judgment in that case was brought under review.* But the case does not directly dispose of the present question, as the circumstances did not directly raise it. The pursuer, therefore, has to rest his case on the English decisions which were canvassed in Brown's Trs. v. Horne, viz.: in re Wallis, L.R. 25 Q.B.D. 176, and in re Doody, L.R. 1893, 1 Ch. 129, in which the law of England prior to the Mortgagees Legal Costs Act 1895, was held to be that a solicitor-mortgagee acting as solicitor for himself cannot charge profit-costs against the mortgagor but only out-of-pocket costs. Though in the latter case Mr Justice Stirling refers to the rules as to the solicitor-trustee, I think that the Court in these cases, and in those on which they are based, do not regard the mortgagee as in any true sense a trustee for the mortgagor's interest, but treat the matter as one of contract purely. Taking the terms of the mortgage as obliging the mortgagors to pay principal, interest, costs, charges and expenses, the English Courts held that it was not part of the contract that the mortgagee should recover anything for personal trouble undertaken, even if he might have employed another to perform the work and have recovered his charges. Notwithstanding the great authority of the judges who decided these English cases, I am not persuaded of the soundness of their judgment if attempted to be applied to the case of a Scottish bond and disposition in security, and still less if attempted to be applied to a security by way of ex facie absolute disposition as here. If the circumstances and terms of the back letters here are considered, it is seen that the defenders might have had to enter into possession, and let the subjects, attend to their upkeep, pay taxes, and collect rents. Had they been acting for the mortgagor they would have been entitled to professional remuneration. They would have accounted for net returns only. They were working for him though they were themselves mortgagees, and I cannot understand why that circumstance should entitle him to their services gratis. The same applies when they come, not to let and administer, but to sell the properties. They would naturally have done the business for him as client; why should they not do it for him as client and debtor? If the principle underlying the disallowance of such charges in the case of the solicitor-trustee applied, viz. that in such relation the risk of interest conflicting with duty must at all hazards be avoided, it would be different. But it is admitted that that question does not arise, and that the question is simply, What was the contract? I cannot help suspecting that it must generally have been felt that the ground of judgment in these cases was not sound, or else the last of them would not immediately have been followed by the passing of an Act which, if on the contrary the ground of judgment was sound, looks, particularly as sect. 3 of the Mortgagees Legal Costs Act 1895 is retrospective, very much like a statutory breach of contract which the Legislature has not been in use to countenance.

Third, The effect of the pursuer's appointment as trustee on the deceased Mr Morton's sequestrated estate is a different matter. The right of Mr Morton and his trustees being what I have already indicated, that right was by the 102nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1856 vested in the pursuer ipso facto by his act and warrant, and as regards the defenders' security, the defenders were from that point onward in pari casu with the National Bank and the pursuer in pari casu with the Union Bank in the case of The Union Bank of Scotland v. The National Bank of Scotland, supra cit. But the actings of parties after the pursuer's appointment may affect the position created by the pursuer's appointment, and give the defenders rights to retain, which they would not otherwise have had, for advances made or accounts incurred after that date. As to these actings, there must be enquiry or admissions. In any view the defenders were, even after the pursuer's confirmation, entitled to realise and charge against the proceeds of the subjects their legitimate expenses, if the pursuer did not offer to redeem.

Arrestment—Future Debt—Arrestments on Dependence of Action of Adherence and Aliment at Instance of Wife—Recal of Arrestment—Circumstances Where Arrestments Recalled on Caution Being Found—Amount of Caution.

This was a petition for recal of arrestments used by a wife in an action of adherence and aliment against her husband. The petitioner expressed his willingness to find caution for expenses. For the respondent it was contended that the arrestments should not be recalled unless caution was found for £20,000.

The opinion of the Lord Ordinary further sufficiently reports this case.

Lord Salvesen.—On 13th May 1907 Mrs Millar raised an action of adherence and aliment against her husband, the amount of aliment concluded for being £3000 yearly. She avers that her husband declined to live with her, and that he had an income of at least £10,000 a year. On the dependence of this action she used arrestments to the extent of £30,000.

The record was closed on 5th June, and thereafter, on the motion of the pursuer, I pronounced an interim decree in her favour for £600 to account of aliment and £150 to account of expenses. I intimated at the time that, as the proof was fixed for a date early in the winter session, I should not entertain any further applications either for interim aliment or interim expenses, unless some unforeseen circumstances emerged. Both these sums have been paid; and the defender has now presented a petition for recal of the arrestments. Answers to this petition have been lodged, in which the respondent maintains that, if the arrestments are recalled, that should only be done on very substantial caution.

The law as to this matter was finally settled by the decision of the First Division in the case of Symington, 1875, 3 R. 205. In that case the Lord President (Inglis) said: "I think that a lady who is separated from her husband, as she does not thereby cease to be his wife, must still follow his fortunes. I should be very slow to hold that because a wife is separated from her husband she is entitled to have her aliment secured so as to give her a preference for life over all her husband's creditors." And further on he says: "For all that is due and bygone the diligence is competent; but, for future debts, I think we cannot lay it down too distinctly that the diligence is incompetent unless the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or there be other circumstances of a parallel kind."

In the later case of Burns, 1879, 7 R. 355, where the husband had expressed an intention of realising his means and of leaving the country, a petition presented by him for recal of arrestments used against him by his wife, on the dependence of an action of separation and aliment, was granted only on substantial caution. The respondent founded on this case, and endeavoured to assimilate its circumstances to those which are said to be present here. She avers that Mr Millar has sold off his house in Claremont Terrace and the furniture therein; and this is admitted, so far as the house and the bulk of the furniture are concerned. She says, further, that, although her husband has taken on lease a small bachelor's flat in Glasgow, she believes that he intends to remove to London, and transfer his business and his whole property there. The last averment is not admitted; but, even if it were true, it appears to me not to bring the case within the rule established by the decision in Burns v. Burns. Even if the defender removed to London, any decree against him pronounced in Scotland could be enforced under the Judgments Extension Act just as effectually as if he remained in Scotland. The other averment which follows, that the pursuer has reason to believe that the defender, with the object of defeating her claims, has placed portions of his property on investments in the names of third parties, is, I think, equally irrelevant. A husband may, if he please, divest himself of his estate if he does so completely; even although the effect may be to reduce his own income and the amount of aliment payable therefrom to his wife. If, on the other hand, he does not divest himself, his property will be liable to be attached by his creditors—including his wife, even if it be in the names of third parties. Apart from all this, I do not think I am entitled to proceed on a vague general averment unsupported by prima facie evidence, and I cannot believe it to be likely that a man who is said to be worth £100,000 should strip himself of the most of the bulk of his property in order to defeat his wife's claim for aliment.

On the other hand, in a case of this nature, which may be keenly contested and not finally decided for possibly a year, I am disposed to give the wife the benefit of the arrestment which she has used for the purpose of securing the expenses to which she will be put in constituting her claim, and also of securing aliment during the dependence of the action. For these two purposes a sum of £2500 will, I think, be ample; and, on caution being found for this sum, I shall recal the arrestments.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the petition and answers, on caution for £2500 being found by the petitioner, recals the arrestments used at the instance of the respondent; finds the respondent entitled to expenses as between party and party; modifies the same to ten guineas."—5th July 1907.

Appeal from Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.

This was an action raised in 1893 in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, at the instance of Mrs Vallance or Morrison, residing at 33 Cumberland Street, Glasgow, against her brother Dr Vallance, designed in the petition as also residing there. The action concluded for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £472, 5s. 3d., made up of £239, 7s. for board and lodging for the period from July 1888 to 10th March 1893, during which Dr Vallance resided with the pursuer; £160 for clothes, pocket money and education provided for him by the pursuer; £42, 18s. 3d. for class fees paid for him by the pursuer; and £30 lent to him by the pursuer.

On the 10th March 1893 Dr Vallance left his sister's house to take up a position as ship surgeon on board an Allan liner, and never thereafter returned to reside with his sister. The summons was served on 31st March 1893 in a registered letter addressed to the defender at his sister's house. The registered letter was taken in by the pursuer, who averred that she forwarded it to Dr Vallance at the office of the Allan Line. Decree in absence was granted against Dr Vallance on 20th April 1893, but the decree was not extracted till 24th January 1906, after Dr Vallance's death on 1st January 1906.

On 1st March 1906 Dr Vallance's executors were sisted as defenders to the action, and the decree in absence was recalled. Dr Vallance's executors lodged defences, and pleaded, inter alia: "There having been no valid service of the petition on the original defender, the proceedings are null and void."

Sect. 12 (2) of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1876 is as follows:—"A party who appears shall not be permitted to state any objection to the regularity of the execution or service as against himself of the petition by which he is convened."

1st Div.

Morrison v. Vallance's Executors.

After a proof had been taken as to the circumstances of the service of the action, the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe), on 10th July 1906, issued an interlocutor finding that the action not having been competently served, the proceedings thereupon were null and void, and dismissing the action. He added the following note:—

I think it is quite beyond argument that the petition in this case was never served. It was posted to the defender, addressed to the pursuer's residence, and the letter was taken delivery of by the pursuer herself. It never reached the late Dr Vallance, who had ceased to reside in the pursuer's house. All that has followed is void, and this action must be dismissed.

The Pursuer appealed, and argued: (1) Dr Vallance's executors having been sisted as defenders and lodged defences, were barred from stating any objection to the service of the action in terms of sect. 12 (2) of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1876. Sect. 12 (2) of this Act was in practically the same terms as sect. 21 of the Court of Session Act 1868, and applied equally to the original defender and his executors. (2) Apart from the specialties of the case the citation was good, as it complied with the provisions of sect. 3 of the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act 1882. Dr Vallance had not left his sister's house for forty days before the service of the summons, and consequently her house was his "legal domicile or proper place of citation." The meaning of sect. 1 of the Act of Sederunt 14th December 1805 was that until a person had been absent from his last known address in Scotland for forty days it remained his "proper place of citation," and edictal citation was incompetent (Corstorphine v. Kasten, 1898, 1 F. 287, per Lord President Robertson at p. 293; Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 197; Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice, p. 67; Judicature Act 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sect. 53). (3) The specialties of the case did not affect the result; there was nothing irregular in the appellant's taking in Dr Vallance's letters and forwarding them to him. Had she refused to take in the letter the only result would have been that it would have been left by a sheriff messenger.

Argued for the Respondents: (1) The citation should have been edictal, as the pursuer knew for a fact that Dr Vallance had left Scotland. Citation at the last known place of residence was only competent within the forty days when the pursuer was uncertain whether the defender was furth of Scotland or not (Brown v. Blaikie, 1849, 11 D. 474, per Lord Jeffrey at p. 482; Cribbes v. Ross, 1851, 13 D. 1369). (2) The appellant was barred from pleading the citation was good by her own acts. She had no right to use the Citation Amendment Act in such a way as really to serve the action on herself. She ought to have refused to take in the registered letter and let it take its course.

upon to reply to the first point argued for the appellant.

The Court affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the circumstances in this case are peculiar. The pursuer, Mrs Vallance or Morrison, on 20th April 1893 got decree in absence against her brother Dr Vallance for certain sums alleged to be due her for board and lodging, and advances to enable the defender to pursue his studies. After getting that decree the pursuer did nothing till 1906, when the defender died, and she put forward a claim against his executors for the amount found due in the decree in absence. Dr Vallance's executors appeared in the process and were sisted as defenders and reponed against the decree in absence.

The defenders pleaded that the decree in absence against Dr Vallance was bad, because of the circumstances of his citation. These circumstances were that prior to 10th March 1893 Dr Vallance lived with his sister, the pursuer, but at that date left to take up a situation as ship's surgeon on board an Allan liner and never returned to live with his sister. After his departure the pursuer instructed her agents to serve a summons against him concluding for payment to her of £472, 5s. 3d., made up of payment for board and lodging and for clothes and education during the time the defender resided with her. The pursuer's agents, on 31st March 1893, posted the summons in registered letter addressed to Dr Vallance at the pursuer's house, in terms of the Citation Amendment Act. Sect. 3 of that Act provides that citation by registered letter shall be "a legal and valid citation, unless the person cited shall prove that such letter was not left or tendered at his known residence or place of business, or at his last known address, if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation."

The registered letter was taken in by the pursuer herself, and though she says that it was forwarded to her brother, Dr Vallance, there is no proof that he ever got it.

The question raised is a double one: (1) Whether the citation was good under the circumstances, apart from the specialties arising out of the position of the pursuer. The answer to that question depends on sect. 3 of the Citation Amendment Act, which provides for citation by registered letter on the person to be cited at "his last known address, if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation."

There is no question that the pursuer's house was Dr Vallance's "last known address"; the question is whether it continued to be "his legal domicile or proper place of citation." That depends on sect. 1 of the Act of Sederunt of 14th December 1805, which provides "That where any person against whom legal diligence is meant to be executed, or who is to be cited as a party in any judicial proceeding, has left the ordinary place of his residence, which may render it doubtful whether he is within the kingdom of Scotland or not, and consequently whether the charge or citation against him ought to be executed at his dwelling-house, or at the market cross of Edinburgh and pier and shore of Leith, when he is not personally found, it shall in time coming be held and presumed that the said person, after forty days' absence from his usual place of residence, but not sooner, is furth of the kingdom of Scotland; and therefore, that within the said forty days the citation or charge may be at his late dwelling-house; but, after that period, must be at the market cross of Edinburgh and pier and shore of Leith."

It was argued for the pursuer that the effect of that section is that after a person goes from his last known place of residence in Scotland, his domicile of citation remains for forty days at that residence. On the other hand, it is argued for the defenders that this is so only if there is a doubt in the mind of the pursuer whether the person to be cited has gone from Scotland or not, but that if the pursuer knows for a fact that he has gone from Scotland, then the citation must be edictal even within the forty days.

The point does not seem ever to have been decided, and there are conflicting dicta. On the one side there is the dictum of Lord Jeffrey in Brown v. Blaikie, 11 D. at p. 482; on the other, that of Lord President Robertson in Corstorphine v. Kasten, 1 F. at p. 293. I do not think it is necessary to decide this point, though, as far as my own view is concerned, it coincides with the dictum of Lord President Robertson and not with that of Lord Jeffrey.

(2) Assuming the citation is good apart from the specialties of this case, the question arises whether it is good in view of those specialties. I am of opinion that it is not, and that the pursuer is barred by her own acts from pleading that the citation is good under the Citation Amendment Act. If she had refused to take in the registered letter, it would, in terms of the Act, have been returned to the Sheriff-Clerk, and decree in absence could not have been got without certain further procedure. The pursuer, by taking in the letter, constituted herself an agent for the defender without any right to do so. She had no right to take in the summons, but having done so, was bound to see that the defender got it. She cannot be heard to say that the defender did get it, so on the specialties of the case I am of opinion that the citation was invalid.

The argument of the pursuer, based on sect. 12 (2) of the Sheriff Courts Act 1876, is obviously unsound, because the parties here appearing, i.e. the executors, are not stating an objection to the regularity of the service as against themselves, but as against another person, i.e. the deceased; and in this sense an executor is not eadem persona cum defuncto.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree on the special ground on which your Lordship proposes to decide this case.

On the question as to which of the conflicting dicta by Lord Jeffrey and Lord President Robertson is sound, I reserve my opinion until the question is raised in a case in which it is necessary to decide it.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Ayr.

This was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Ayr at the instance of (1) James Arthur, tenant of the estate of Montgomerie, with consent and concurrence of W. R. Paterson, heir of entail of the said estate, and of Mrs Paterson, his curator, and (2) John Meikle, proprietor of the estate of Barskimming. The defenders were Thomas Aird, John Jones, and Robert Wallace, miners, Hurlford.

The prayer of the petition was:—

To interdict the defenders from unlawfully entering and trespassing upon the lands and estate of Montgomerie, situated in the parish of Tarbolton and county of Ayr, or upon any part thereof, or from unlawfully entering and trespassing upon the lands and estate of Barskimming, situated in the parish of Stair and county of Ayr, and in particular from fishing for or trying to catch or kill in any way yellow trout or grayling in the portion of the River Ayr, so far as it flows ex adverso of the said estates of Montgomerie and Barskimming.

A plan (No. 19 of process) was lodged, shewing the relative positions of the river Ayr and of the estates of Montgomerie and Barskimming. The following description of the plan is taken from the opinion of Lord Low.

"The river Ayr forms the boundary between Montgomerie and Barskimming for that part of its course which lies between the letters A B and C D on the plan No. 19 of process. There is there a stretch of the river (lying between the letters A B and H G on the plan) which forms the boundary between Barskimming and another estate, the proprietor of which is not a party to this action, and finally there is a stretch of the river (G H to E F on the plan) which lies wholly within the estate of Barskimming."

The pursuers averred that the defenders had trespassed on their estates and had fished in the river at various points on the portions of the river marked on the plan, but there was no averment of trespass or fishing at the part between the lines E F and G H.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:

2. The action is incompetent and irrelevant.
3. No title to sue.
4. The River Ayr, at the points referred to in the pursuers' condescendence, being a public river, the right to fish for trout therein is common property.
5. That the public have from time immemorial, or at least for the prescriptive period, with the knowledge of the pursuers or of their authors, exercised the right to fish for trout and salmon in said river at the points specified in the pursuers' condescendence. This defender, as a member of the public, is entitled to fish therein.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia:

4. The defences stated are irrelevant.

On 19th December 1905 the Sheriff-Substitute (Shairp) granted interdict, in terms of the prayer of the petition, against entering and trespassing on the estates of Montgomerie and Barskimming, and against fishing for trout or grayling in the river Ayr between the lines (1) E F and G H, and (2) A B and C D on the plain.

He delivered the following note:—

The defenders' substantial defence in the present action is that, as members of the public, they are entitled to fish in the River Ayr at the places mentioned, in respect that the public have acquired by prescription a right to fish for yellow trout or grayling in these waters. It is admitted by the defenders' agent that, at these portions of its course, the River Ayr is neither tidal nor navigable. This point is not in dispute between the parties. In the case of Grant v. Henry, 12th January 1894, 21 Rettie, p. 358, the law laid down by previous decisions is expressly reaffirmed, that a right of trout fishing cannot be acquired by prescriptive use in a question between the public and a riparian proprietor. The present is not a case where the defenders allege any title competing with that of the pursuers, and, if it were held that, on their present record, the defenders are entitled to go into a close investigation of the pursuers' titles, then such a course would be open to every poacher who is challenged for fishing in waters that do not belong to him. In these circumstances, I have no choice but to grant the interdict which pursuers crave.

2nd Div.
Arthur and Others v. Aird and Others.

The above interlocutor has been expressed in the foregoing terms because I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to interdict against the defenders fishing for yellow trout or grayling where, either together or singly, the pursuers hold riparian rights on both sides of the River Ayr. Matters are in a somewhat different position wherever their riparian rights are limited to one bank. In the latter case the pursuers are, in my opinion, only entitled to interdict the defenders from trespassing upon their lands, and this, of course, would cover the case of the defenders walking on the bed of the river belonging to the pursuers up to the medium filum. It is, of course, conceivable that, where the pursuers do not hold both banks of the river, the riparian proprietor of the opposite bank, not represented in the present action, might allow the defenders to fish from his side, and in that case they might be able legally to fish over the whole breadth of the river at that part without walking beyond the medium filum, and so trespassing on the pursuers' lands. It is because I have had these considerations in view that the foregoing interlocutor has been expressed in the terms in which it is couched.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Brand), who adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued: The action was wholly incompetent. The pursuers had no community of interest, and could not conjoin in an action in which each asked for interdict against trespassing on the lands of the other (Gray, 1741, M. 11986; Gibson, 1866, 5 M. 113; Smyth, 1891, 19 R. 81). Further, there was no averment of fishing in the river between the lines G H and E F on the plan, and quoad that portion, interdict should in any event be refused.

Argued for the Respondents: The form of the action was the most convenient for all parties, and was competent. There was sufficient community of interest between the pursuers (Killin, 1905, 7 F. 526 at p. 528). No right of fishing could be prescribed (Montgomery, 1861, 23 D. 635; Somerville, 1859, 22 D. 279).

The following case was referred to by Lord Low: Cowan & Sons, 1876, 4 R. (H.L.) 14.

The Court recalled the interlocutor appealed against, interdicted the defenders from fishing in the river Ayr in the portion between the lines A B and C D on the plan, and quoad ultra dismissed the action.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Judging from what is to be found in the proceedings in the Sheriff Court in this case, I think it right, before dealing with the case as presented to this Court, to state the following propositions in law, which are beyond doubt:—

1. No one has any right to trespass on the lands of another for the purpose of fishing.
2. No one, even if he is lawfully on the bank of a river, has, merely because he is lawfully there, a right to fish in the stream.
3. It is not possible for members of the community having no title to establish a right to fish by any usage of fishing for however long a period as against a proprietor having a title to the land over which a stream flows.

As regards the case as now presented to us I have to point out that the action is somewhat strange in its conclusions, for it is raised by two proprietors of separate estates for interdict against trespass on both estates.

The view I have formed of the case can be stated in a few sentences. I have no doubt in holding that no such interdict upon joint application can be granted as is prayed for by the pursuers, as it would be to give a right to sue for breach of interdict to persons having no right as regards the lands respectively of which they were neither proprietors nor tenants.

But in so far as the prayer of the interdict is directed against fishing for trout in the Ayr so far as it flows altogether ex adverso of the estates of Montgomerie and Barskimming—that is to say, where the two estates face one another on the river—the case is somewhat different. For the river being there the division between the two proprietors, I hold it to be settled that the proprietors have a common interest in the stream, their rights in the solum of which extend to the medium filum respectively, which is the boundary between them. I therefore am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to interdict as regards that part of the river which lies between the letters A B and C D on the plan No. 19 of process.

On the other hand, for the reason already stated, I hold that the pursuers are not entitled, suing jointly as they do, to any interdict as regards those parts of the river to which either of them has the right of property or tenancy on one bank only.

I would propose that your Lordships should adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff in so far as it grants interdict as between A B and C D, and quoad ultra, recal the interlocutor and dismiss the action.

Lord Low.—The pursuers in this action are (1) the tenant of the mansion-house, shootings and fishings of the estate of Montgomerie, with the consent and concurrence of the heir of entail in possession, and (2) the proprietor of the estate of Barskimming. These are entirely separate estates, but the leading crave in the prayer is that the defenders—of whom there are three—should be interdicted from unlawfully entering and trespassing upon the estate of Montgomerie or upon the estate of Barskimming.

It appears to me that that is an incompetent application. The proprietor of Montgomerie has no right or title whatever to interdict trespassers upon Barskimming, and the proprietor of Barskimming has no right or title to interdict trespassers upon Montgomerie. It follows that the two of them cannot obtain a joint interdict against trespassing upon either estate.

The prayer, however, proceeds to ask that the defenders should be interdicted "in particular, etc." [His Lordship quoted the prayer of the petition and described the plan No. 19 of process as cited supra.]

The Sheriff-Substitute, in an interlocutor to which the Sheriff adhered, interdicted the defenders from "trespassing upon the lands and estate of Montgomerie, or upon any part thereof, or from trespassing upon the lands and estate of Barskimming, or upon any part thereof; and in particular from fishing for or trying to catch or kill in any way yellow trout or grayling in the river Ayr between the lines (1st) E F and G H; and (2nd) between the lines A B and C D on the plan."

Now, for the reasons which I have already given, I am of opinion that that interlocutor, in so far as it is directed against trespassing in general terms, was incompetent. I think that it was also incompetent to grant interdict at the joint instance of the proprietors of the two estates against fishing in the Ayr between the lines E F and G H, because that part of the river is wholly within the estate of Barskimming. I do not think that a riparian proprietor has any right or title to interfere with fishing in a part of the river which is wholly beyond the limits of his estate. Plainly, the proprietor of Montgomerie, if he had sued alone, and with no other title than that of proprietor of Montgomerie, would not have been entitled to interdict anyone from fishing between E F and G H. He would have had no more right to do so than an outsider who had no property upon the river at all. Therefore I think that an interdict at the joint instance of the proprietor of Barskimming and the proprietor of Montgomerie is just as incompetent as if it had been at the joint instance of the former and of a member of the public who had no connection with the river.

I would further observe that there is no foundation for an interdict even at the instance of the proprietor of Barskimming in regard to the part of the river with which I am now dealing, because it is not averred that any of the defenders ever fished that part of the river.

A different question, however, arises in regard to the part of the river between A B and C D; there the river flows between the two properties, and although each property only extends ad medium filum, it may very well be that the proprietors have a common interest in the whole of that part of the river sufficient to make it competent for them to sue together in one action a person by whose act both of them have been aggrieved. It has never been expressly decided whether the proprietor of the lands upon one side of a river only is entitled to cast his line across the medium filum and to take trout out of water flowing over the half of the alveus belonging to his neighbour. In regard to that question I would only say that it seems to me to be plain that in small rivers, which, with or without wading, can be commanded from bank to bank (a category which includes the great majority of trout streams, and among them the Ayr at the point in question), a rule limiting the angler on either bank to his own side of the medium filum would be unworkable, and could not possibly be enforced; and, unless the river were of considerable size, such a rule would hamper the angler upon either side to an extent which would greatly detract from the value and amenity of the right of fishing. Accordingly, so far as I know, such a rule is, in practice, unknown in Scotland so far as trout fishing is concerned. I therefore think that riparian proprietors upon opposite sides of a trout river have a common interest in that part of the river which flows between their estates which entitles them to take joint action against anyone fishing the water from either side.

Now, all the defenders admit that they fished in the Ayr between the points marked A B and C D on the plan, and that they refused to stop fishing when requested to do so. I infer from the pursuers' averments that all the defenders were fishing from the Montgomerie side of the water, but none of them found upon that fact as a reason why interdict should not be granted against them. Their defence is that as members of the public they were entitled to fish in the river, which, of course, is an entirely untenable proposition.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor should be affirmed in so far as it interdicts the defenders from fishing in the river between the points A B and C D, and that, quoad ultra, the interlocutor should be recalled and the action dismissed.

Lord Ardwall.—A number of questions are raised by the pleadings in the present actions, but the discussion in this Court was limited by the counsel for the defenders to the second and third pleas stated for them, which are directed respectively against the competency and the relevancy and the pursuers' title to sue.

The pursuers are, first, James Arthur, the tenant of Montgomerie, and William Robert Paterson, the proprietor of that estate, with his curator; and, second, John Meikle, proprietor of the estate of Barskimming. At the instance of these pursuers the Court is asked, first, to interdict the defenders from trespassing on the estate of Montgomerie, and next from trespassing on the estate of Barskimming.

2nd Div.

Arthur and Others v. Aird and Others.

Lord Ardwall.

I am of opinion that up to this point the pleas of incompetency and no title to sue must be sustained. The proprietor and tenant of Montgomerie have no title to sue for interdict against trespassing on the estate of Barskimming, nor has the proprietor of the estate of Barskimming any title to sue for interdict against the defenders trespassing on the estate of Montgomerie, and accordingly the two sets of proprietors are not entitled to obtain jointly an interdict against trespassing on either estate; and it was incompetent to make them joint pursuers in the action for interdict against trespass on lands in which it could not be said that both of them had an interest.

In the next place, interdict is asked against the defenders from fishing for yellow trout or grayling in the portion of the river Ayr so far as it flows ex adverso of the said estates of Montgomerie and Barskimming. This portion of the prayer requires to be considered with reference to the different parts of the river to which the interdict is to apply. With regard to the portion of the river between the letters E F and G H, it flows through the estate of Barskimming, and both banks of the river are in that estate. For the reasons above adverted to with reference to the estate generally, it is evident that the proprietor of Montgomerie has no title to ask for interdict as regards this part of the river; and the interdict being asked at the joint instance of all the pursuers, it is, so far as this portion of the river is concerned, incompetent.

With regard to the part of the river between the points marked A B and C D on the plan, the question stands in a different position. During that portion of its course the river flows between the estates of Barskimming on the one side and Montgomerie on the other; and as the river Ayr is a water of such a size as that it can be practically fished across its whole breadth from either side of the medium filum thereof, it seems to follow that no interdict against fishing in that portion of the river would be effectual unless obtained at the instance of the proprietors on both sides. Further, both proprietors have a common interest in the fishing over this portion of the river, and therefore a right to obtain a joint interdict against fishing there. I may refer to the case of Lord Forbes and Others v. Leys, Mason & Co. (1824, 2 Shaw (N.E.) 515), where a number of upper heritors were held entitled to sue jointly for the removal of a dam which injured their salmon fishings; and in the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan & Sons, 2 M. 653, it was held that a number of riparian owners were entitled to sue jointly an action of declarator and interdict for putting a stop to the pollution of the river Esk which flowed past their respective properties; while with regard to the conjunction of Mr Arthur, the tenant of Montgomerie in the action, I may refer to the case of Jolly v. Brown (28th May 1826, 6 Shaw 872), where two persons jointly raised an interdict against trespassing on the estate of which they were respectively proprietor and tenant.

I agree with what Lord Low has said with regard to the law of angling in a burn or river of such small size as that the angler can cast his line across the medium filum and practically command the whole stream from either side of it, and I have nothing further to say except that I agree in omnibus with his remarks on this subject, on which, however, I am unaware there is any direct authority to be found in the legal text-books or reports.

Assuming the law to be as stated by Lord Low, it follows, I think, with regard to the remaining portion of the river between A B and G H, that it would be incompetent to grant an interdict at the instance of the proprietor of Barskimming against fishing in that part of the river, seeing that the proprietor of Failford is not a party to these proceedings. From what has been above said with regard to the rights of angling in a water such as the Ayr, it would seem to follow that interdict as regards this part of the river would not be competent or effectual except at the instance of the proprietors on both sides, though of course the proprietor of Barskimming alone could, if he so desired it, in another action obtain an interdict against trespassing on his own estate which would prevent fishermen from using the Barskimming banks of the water of Ayr at that place or the alveus of the stream up to the medium filum for the purpose of fishing therefrom.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutors of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-Substitute should be recalled, and interdict granted against the defenders fishing for yellow trout or grayling in the river Ayr between the lines A B and C D on the plan No. 19 of process.—2nd July 1907.

The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Johnston.—In this action the Temperance Halls Co-operative Building Society Ltd., of Hamilton, owners of the Victoria Hall there, sue the Glasgow Pavilion Company for implement of certain missives of sale dated 3rd and 5th May 1906, under which, as alleged, the pursuers sold to the defenders the Victoria Halls, Hamilton, at a price of £4750. These missives were subject, inter alia, to this condition:

"5. The sale to be conditional on the granting of a theatrical licence to my clients (i.e. The Pavilion Company) at an early meeting by the competent licensing authorities of Hamilton."

The pursuers maintain, and the defenders dispute, that this condition has been purified.

After discussion in the Procedure Roll, it became apparent that a knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the bargain would, or at least might, aid in the disposal of the question at issue, and accordingly I allowed a proof in words I now see unfortunately chosen, though I cannot explain how this came about. It was intended to limit the proof to such evidence as would place the Court in the same position as to information as the parties occupied at the time when these negotiations culminated, and in no sense to limit the mode of proof. And this, I think, was understood by the parties. But my careless use of language opened the door to a general proof of negotiations ante and transactions post the date of the agreement, which I found it impossible judiciously to check during the proof, and therefore contented myself with warning the parties that though they might be allowed to prove what facts they thought relevant, it must be understood that the relevancy and competency of the various points in their proof remained to be sifted—in fact, that the proof must be accepted as one "before answer." On the whole, I do not think that the case will suffer from the more general proof which has been led.

The facts which I select as material and relevant and competent to be proved are these.

The Victoria Hall has been in existence for more than twenty years. For a long time past it has been used, not continuously as a theatre, but for the occasional visits of operatic and theatrical companies such as take places like Hamilton on their tours. By a misconception on the part of the Temperance Halls Society of their obligation, and on the part of the local licensing authority of their duty, or through mere negligence on the part of both, it appears that until a year before the agreement of May 1906 in question, the hall had never been licensed. This, however, was not known generally, and in dealing with the pursuers, the defenders did, in my opinion, proceed, and I think were entitled to proceed, on the assumption that as the hall had been for years back used for theatrical performances, it had, throughout and down to the time of these negotiations, possessed the statutory licence.

The Victoria Hall has on the ground floor its entrance flanked by shops on each side, and has two or three rooms at the back, disconnected with the shops, and used for nondescript purposes connected with the hall. The hall itself is on the first floor, and it has the usual adjuncts of a very minor local theatre or music hall—a stage, a dress-circle, stalls, a pit, and a gallery—suitable for theatrical and other public entertainments, but also for public meetings. I do not rest anything on the fact that the pursuers' company is styled the Temperance Halls, etc., Society, because this name is for practical purposes sunk in the name by which the hall is known, viz. the Victoria Hall. But the fact remains that it has throughout been conducted without any liquor licence, and that there is, in fact, no bar within the premises, and, I think I may add, no suitable place in which to establish one, and that the fact that it had neither liquor licence nor bar was apparent on the surface, and was known to the defenders, though they maintain that the premises admitted of a bar being established, and that they had in view to establish one.

I may here refer to two points. (1.) Ground had been acquired by excambion at the back, for extension and improvement, I presume, of the stage and its accessories. But this was not a term of the agreement, and indeed had no relation to it. The excambion had been arranged by the Temperance Hall Society before the negotiations between them and the defenders were entered on.

(2.) It may be said that the hall was more properly styled a music hall than a theatre. That may be so, but as a theatre it had been used. And I am unable to follow some of the witnesses, and even counsel, who spoke as if there was something of the nature of a music hall licence, differing from and inferior to a theatre licence. I cannot claim to be familiar with the statutes on this point; but I am not aware of, and cannot find, any ground for the distinction, and none such was supplied to me in the course of the discussion. I therefore proceed upon the footing that I am concerned with but one form of licence, and that a theatrical licence, under the Act 6 and 7 Vict. cap. 68.

The conditional agreement having been entered into, application was at once made, under the statutory rules, to the licensing authority by the defenders for a theatrical licence, and on 12th July 1906 the Justices determined that a licence should be granted, but subject to an undertaking secured by a bond of caution that the grantees would not apply for an Excise licence, without the consent of the Justices being first asked and obtained. A licence on these terms was refused by the defenders, who now maintain that on these terms the condition No. 5 of the agreement of sale and purchase has not been, and cannot be, purified.

These are, I think, all the facts that I can competently entertain in considering the question raised. I do not think that I am concerned with the episode of the employment of Mr Paterson, architect, to prepare and pass plans for the improvement of the hall and its better adaptation to the defenders' purposes, or with the somewhat inconsistent action of the defenders after the determination of the Justices was announced to them—an action which seems to imply that the defenders' managers were acting without fully consulting their board.

The statutory regulations for the control of theatres and theatrical performances, so far as bearing on the present case, are, first, the Act of 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. cap. 68), which repeated existing enactments on the subject, and provided (sect. 2) that it shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the performance of stage plays, without the authority of letters patent, the licence of the Lord Chamberlain in the metropolitan district, or of the Justices of the Peace elsewhere; (sect. 5) that on application to the Justices for a theatrical licence a special session shall be held, certain procedure be followed, and the licence, if granted, bear the signature of four Justices; (sect. 7) that the licence shall be granted to the responsible manager of the theatre for the time being; and (sect. 11) that certain penalties shall be incurred by persons acting or presenting stage plays in places not duly licensed. This Act, it will be observed on a further examination of its detailed enactments, deals solely with the control of theatrical performances, and has no bearing on the sale of liquor in theatres.

That matter was, at the passing of the Act of 1843, and, until recently, continued to be regulated by the Act of 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 39), which provided (sect. 7) that it should be lawful for the Excise, and they were strictly authorised and empowered to grant a retail licence for the sale of liquor in any theatre established by royal patent or licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or Justices, without requiring the production of the statutory certificate precedent to the granting of a licence to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling house. That is to say, the obtaining a theatrical licence ipso facto entitled the licensee to take out an Excise licence.

This system lasted (notwithstanding the passing of the Public-House (Scotland) Acts 1853 and 1862; see Arthur v. Lord Advocate, 1895, 22 R. 382) until 1903, when it was enacted (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25, sect. 47): "Notwithstanding anything contained in the Excise Act 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 39), no licence to sell excisable liquors in any theatre or other place of public entertainment erected after the commencement of this Act, shall be granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to any person who shall not produce a certificate granted in terms of this Act."

It is, therefore, the present law that when a theatre or other place of public entertainment was "erected" before the commencement of the Act of 1903, it being licensed as a theatre, ipso facto entitles its proprietors to an Excise licence, but that where the theatre or other place of public entertainment has been "erected" since that date, its licensing does not carry that consequence; but if a liquor licence is wanted, application to the licensing (liquor) authority for a certificate must be made as in the case of any other premises for which a licence is desired. The first question therefore is, Was the Victoria Hall "erected" prior to the passing of the Act of 1903 in the terms of that statute? I think that it was.

I do not think that it is incumbent on me to consider exhaustively the meaning of the phrase "erected." It is enough for this case that de facto the building had been erected, and the proposed alterations cannot be construed as an erection of new, and that de facto it had been used as a theatre, and had even latterly, I think, been licensed. On this latter question there is some discrepancy between Mr Bell and Mr Hiddleston. But even if no licence had actually been granted prior to the defenders' application, I think there was, for the purpose of this case, the equivalent in respect of its having been used as if licensed, by the mistake or neglect of those concerned, including the licensing authority. If I am right, then on obtaining a theatrical licence, or the removal of a theatrical licence, the proprietor of the Victoria Hall would by statute have been entitled to go direct to the Excise, who must (Arthur v. Lord Advocate, supra) have granted a liquor licence.

In the next place, were the magistrates legally entitled to impose the condition which they did on granting the licence? This has been decided in the affirmative in England (The Queen v. County Council of West Riding of Yorkshire [1896], 2 Q.B. 386), and I adopt the judgment and the reasoning of the Court without comment.

But though the parties were acting within their powers, that does not solve the question which I have to decide.

The defenders purchased conditionally a theatre or place of public entertainment erected and de facto or de jure licensed—this, at any rate, they are entitled to assume. In the circumstances they were also entitled to assume, and I think did assume, that its then proprietor could at any moment have obtained, without further intervention of the Justices, an Excise licence; and what I think they bargained for was that before the provisional or conditional contract became absolute, they should get a licence, or rather transfer of licence, which would put them in the same position as that in which the pursuers actually were, or in which the defenders were entitled to believe that the pursuers were. The granting of a licence under conditions fenced by caution did not place them in that position, and did not, in my opinion, purify the condition of the contract. In fact, until caution was found and the licence accepted on these terms, though the licence was signed, it was not granted. And in a question with the pursuers they were not, I think, bound to accept the terms and find the caution.

I cannot approve the defenders' evasive and underhand mode of proceeding, in suppressing the fact that they contemplated the use of the theatre licence in course of time, or rather after biding their time, to obtain, behind the back of the parties, an Excise licence, and to provide bars, without such structural alteration as would have required them to go back to the Dean of Guild Court. Nor can I approve their employment of Mr Paterson with a view to his exercising influence on the Justices' Bench. But I should be sorry to think that Mr Paterson, had he known their object, would have accepted their employment, though the bare suggestion shows how improper it is to place professional men on the roll of Justices.

But notwithstanding the defenders' conduct, I am obliged to conclude without hesitation, though with reluctance, that they are entitled to be free of their bargain.

I shall therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusion of the action, with expenses.—3rd July 1907.

Succession—Liferent and Fee—Liferent With Power of Disposal "By Will or Other Deed"—Intention of Testator—Intention to Restrict to Liferent, and to Give Power of Testamentary Disposal Only.

Outer House. Lord Johnston. Dick v. Dick's Trustees.

This was an action at the instance of Henry Cecil Knox Dick against his late father's trustees, to have it found and declared that he was presently vested and entitled to the fee of the residue of his father's estate.

The late Mr Henry Knox Dick, by the last purpose of his trust disposition and settlement, dated 17th March 1904, appointed the pursuer sole residuary legatee, and directed his trustees to "pay" to him the one-half of the free residue of his estate at the age of twenty-five and the other half when he attained the age of thirty, and the half of the whole revenue of said residue till he attained the age of thirty, and he declared that the whole provisions above conceived in favour of his children should be purely alimentary and not assignable or attachable by creditors. Mr Dick executed three codicils to his will. By the third and last of these, dated 20th July 1904, he provided as follows:—

"I, Henry Knox Dick, maker of the foregoing settlement and codicils, do hereby revoke the provisions therein made in favour of my son Henry in regard to the residue of my estate, and in place thereof I hereby bequeath to him a liferent of the whole of the residue of my estate, and instruct my trustees to pay over to him the one-half of the revenue of the said residue when he attains the age of twenty-five and the whole revenue when he attains the age of thirty, and that half-yearly; but he shall have power, however, to dispose of the capital by will or other deed in such way as he thinks proper, and, failing such disposal, then to his lawful heirs."

The Lord Ordinary held that upon a sound construction of the testator's testamentary writings the pursuer was given a liferent only, with a power to dispose of the fee testamentarily.

Lord Johnston.—The question is raised in this case whether a liferent with a power of disposal amounts to a fee. On a sound construction of the testamentary writings in question I think the question falls to be answered in the negative.

The whole testamentary writings must be read together. Now by the original settlement of 17th March 1904 the testator gave his whole residue to his son Henry (the pursuer) without effectual qualification, except as regards the time of payment, for the clause excluding his creditors was of no avail. By his third codicil of 20th July 1904, however, the testator revoked this provision in favour of his son Henry, and in place thereof bequeathed him a liferent of the residue of the estate, and directed his trustees to pay over to him the revenue of this residue, one-half at twenty-five and the whole at thirty years of age, and then added: "But he shall have power, however, to dispose of the capital by will or other deed, in such way as he thinks proper; and failing such disposal, then to his lawful heirs." There is a failure in the grammar of this clause, but I think that there is little doubt as to what the testator intended.

If the result of the clause is to give the pursuer a fee of the residue, then the codicil may be taken as pro non scripto. Matters would be left where they were under the main settlement. But it is clear that that is not what the testator intended. He revoked the fee already given, and substituted a liferent, with a power of disposal in the terms quoted. And the inference certainly is that he intended to reduce his son's interest from a fee to something more restricted. Nevertheless, he may have failed to effect his purpose. But before I could come to that conclusion the failure must be plain and unmistakable. I do not think that it is so. I think very apt words are used to shew that the testator only intended to give his son a power of testamentary disposal, failing his exercising which, "his lawful heirs" are conditionally instituted. "By will or other deed" plainly means by will or other deed ejusdem generis, or of a testamentary nature. I can hardly imagine a more appropriate case for the application of this well-known principle of construction.

I shall therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusion of the summons, with expenses.—2*nd July* 1907.

The Court adhered.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by the Lord Justice-Clerk.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case raises a question of much importance. The pursuer asks for damages from a magistrate sitting in a summary court, on the ground that he sentenced her to imprisonment without the option of a fine, under a complaint based upon a clause of a statute which did not empower him to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment, except as an alternative to the non-payment of a pecuniary penalty, the prayer of the complaint being in terms of the statute. She alleges that although it was pointed out by the Clerk as the Court's Assessor that such a sentence could not be pronounced, he insisted on inflicting it, on the view that he could deal with the matter, not as it was charged in the complaint, but as constituting an offence at common law—viz. a breach of the peace, for which he had by law the power to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment as a direct punishment. That he erred in this cannot be doubted, and that consequently he acted outwith, and in excess of, his jurisdiction, is equally plain. The question now before the Court is whether an action of damages can be competently and relevantly raised against him in these circumstances.

We had the advantage of a very able and full argument from the bar, the one party alleging that a judge sitting as the defender did, is immune from all actions at law for damages for anything done by him when sitting in his judicial capacity; the other party maintaining that while such immunity from attack in a court of law applies to judges of superior jurisdiction, there is no law to the effect that inferior magistrates may not be called upon to make reparation, where they have gone outside their powers, and inflicted a wrong.

Upon the question of immunity of the judges of the Supreme Court there can be no doubt. The principle is clear, and the decisions are emphatic. The principle is that such judges are the king's judges directly, bound to administer the law between his subjects, and even between his subjects and himself. To make them amenable to actions of damages for things done in their judicial capacity, to be dealt with by judges only their equals in authority and by juries, would be to make them not responsible to the king, but subject to other considerations than their duty to him in giving their decisions, and to expose them to be dealt with as servants, not of him, but of the public. Accordingly, the remedy in this case, if they flagrantly offend against duty, is not by proceedings in any court, but only by addresses to the Crown from the Houses of Parliament. Between their position and that of judges appointed, not by the king, but by the community, or some authority in the community not having the kingly prerogative, but only acting by a delegated authority for local administration, as in the case of Justices of the Peace appointed by the Lord Chancellor, there is no analogy. Therefore any claim for immunity for acts done in local summary courts cannot be based on the fact of the immunity of the Supreme Court judges. That the highest courts of justice are designated "Supreme Courts," of itself indicates the distinction. The Supreme Courts have power to right wrongs done in the inferior courts, their jurisdiction being universal, and their duty being to see justice done throughout the land. The other courts have no jurisdiction beyond their own border, and cannot review the conduct of any other judge within their own border.

Is there, then, any immunity attaching to the judges of the inferior courts for their actings when sitting in judgment? Certainly there is. They cannot be made amenable for words used, however severely they may comment on the conduct of individuals, provided such words are uttered when acting in the exercise of their magisterial functions. Of this the case of Waterston is the latest and most emphatic instance. For in that case the magistrate, who was dealing with a charge of crime against a child, sent for the child's father, who was in no way a party to the proceedings, and was not a witness, and used words to him as regarded his conduct in relation to his child, which, while the Court considered them to be highly reprehensible, they held could not be made the ground of an action of damages, the magistrate having at the time been engaged in his official capacity. The principle of this is that the right to express himself freely in dealing with matters before him, must not be hampered by apprehension that he may be sued in a civil court and subjected to damages, as if what he said had been uttered by him as an ordinary citizen, not acting in a public judicial capacity, it being uttered for what presumably at the time seemed to him to be good and just cause.

But while this is so, it is a totally different question whether a magistrate who does official acts when sitting as such which he has no power to do under a statute in accordance with which he is bound to act, and which judicial acts have the effect of restraining the liberty of the subject, and subjecting him to penalty in his person, is immune from civil consequences for the wrong he has done. I do not think that this has ever been held, and the opposite has been held in many cases. Where a magistrate, professing to sit as such, and dealing with a case which he has no jurisdiction to deal with at all, commits what is an undoubted wrong upon a citizen, both by principle and practice he is held liable for the wrong done. If that is so, can it be said that a magistrate who has before him a case which he can competently try, under an Act of Parliament on which the complaint is founded, and who, instead of dealing with the case as it is before him, and on conviction awarding such punishment as the Act prescribes and allows, proceeds knowingly to pronounce a sentence which is not competent under the Act of Parliament, and thereby sends a person to prison contrary to the Act of Parliament—I say, can it be said that he is in any more favourable position than a magistrate trying a case in circumstances where he has no jurisdiction? In the one case his sentence is illegal, because he has no complaint before him on which he can pronounce a sentence at all. In the other he has a complaint before him, on which he cannot pronounce the sentence which he does pronounce. The wrong is as great in the latter as in the former. For as well might he have no jurisdiction at all as step outside the jurisdiction which he does possess, to do something which he could not do if he held himself within the limits prescribed to him by the law under which he was called to exercise his jurisdiction. The case of Groome v. Forrester, decided in England, is a forcible illustration of the fact that there may be liability in a magistrate, not merely for acting without jurisdiction, but for doing an act in excess of the jurisdiction he was called upon to exercise. In that case, as here, the magistrate could have pronounced an effective judgment, under which incarceration might have taken place. The mistake made was that while the thing complained of was that an overseer had refused to obey an order of Court by delivering up a certain book, he was committed till he should have delivered up "all and every, the books, etc." In that case the magistrates were held liable in damages for "a clear excess of jurisdiction."

Here I think it is necessary to draw a distinction. It is where the error committed by the inferior magistrate takes effect that his liability to answer for the wrong done arises. It is not for what he has ordered, but for what he has caused another to suffer, that he is amenable to the law. That he has pronounced an illegal sentence is not sufficient to subject him in damages, if nothing has been done upon it. But where it has been carried out so that the wrong has been made effective, then he may be answerable. This is illustrated by the English case where an illegal sentence ordering confinement in the stocks was pronounced, but was not carried out, so that the wrong was not suffered. Accordingly it was held that no claim for damages could be sustained.

The principle which I have stated as governing the matter seems to be well established by the authorities. Erskine in his Institutes says: "Where a sentence is glaringly illegal, lata culpa equiparatur dolo, the law, from the grossness of the error, presumes a perverse will." The magistrate so acting is presumed to have been led astray by evil motive, or by such rashness and disregard of the citizens' rights as will be held equivalent to direct dole.

It would be difficult to state the matter more concisely and clearly, and it appears to me that the decisions of the Courts are entirely in accordance with the idea that, whatever may be the privileges attaching to a judge of the higher courts, it has never been held to extend to such courts as are called Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, which was the nature of the Court in this case.

Reference was made in the course of the debate to the Act of George the Third, commonly called the Twopenny Act, by which justices of the peace were protected from any award of substantial damages unless it was averred that the acts were done "maliciously and without any reasonable and probable cause." It also enacted that no damages or costs should be recovered by the plaintiff, if the justice could prove his guilt, and that he had not undergone greater punishment than was assigned by law to the offence. I refer to the Act for the purpose of indicating what I think is a plain inference to be drawn from it, viz. that these inferior judges must have been subject to actions of damages by the law as it then existed; otherwise it would have been unnecessary to pass a law limiting their liability. And it is to be noticed that the exemption is a limited exemption. It refers only to a conviction "had or made under any Act or Acts of Parliament," and so had no reference to acts done in administering the common law, as to which it left the liability of justices as it was before. And further, I remark that, although that Act was extended to Scotland by the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, it could never apply to this case, seeing that the pursuer here did suffer a greater punishment than was assigned by law to her offence, seeing that the Act under which she was tried gave no power to commit to prison without the option of a fine. I notice in passing, with reference to England, that new rules as regards liability of Justices were established by the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 44, and the Twopenny Act, in so far as inconsistent with it, was repealed. But that does not affect what I have already said—that the passing of such Acts proceeded and could only proceed upon the footing that such inferior judges as the Act deals with did not possess the general immunity which attaches to the Supreme Court judges. But I think there is a further and necessary inference to be drawn from it, viz. that the doctrine sometimes stated in English cases, that judges of what are called there "Courts of Record" are immune from actions of damages, did not apply to some Courts. The phrase "Court of Record" is not one which conveys any clear idea to the mind of one not versed in English law and practice. But whatever a Court of Record may mean, and to whatever Courts it might apply, the Twopenny Act plainly indicates that Courts of inferior magistrates were never included in the phrase. Accordingly such actions have been repeatedly sustained. The most notable case is that of Pollock.

It only remains to be seen whether, under the legal decisions which have been pronounced, it can be held that in such a case as the present, in which a magistrate sitting in a police court has pronounced a sentence of imprisonment for a term, without the option of a fine, where he had no jurisdiction to do so, he is free from any action. I am unable to find, after an examination of the cases quoted in the debate, that they lead to any such conclusion. The case of Haggart was a case similar to Waterston's case, being based on remarks made by Lord President Hope about the conduct of an advocate. Harvey v. Dyce was a case of slanderous words used by a sheriff. The only other case founded on in opening by the reclaimer was the case of Haggard in Appeal Cases 1892. That case has no bearing on the present, as the question there turned upon the right of a judge to dismiss a civil case as vexatious. One other case was referred to in reply by the reclaimer—that of Anderson v. Gorrie [1895], 1 Q.B. 668. That case also has no bearing, being the case of a Supreme Court Judge of a colony, and it was held that his position was analogous to that of a Supreme Court Judge in this country, and that he could not be sued for an act done in his capacity as Judge, whether he acted rightly or wrongly.

On the question whether, in this case, it is necessary to aver specific malice and to put malice in issue, I concur with the Lord Ordinary that the case being one in which the wrong complained of was an entirely ultra vires act by the magistrate, it is not necessary for the pursuer to prove malice. I adopt the words of Lord Pitmilly, who said in a similar case: "It is no matter whether it was from error or malice, if . . . . grossly illegal and irregular, the party is entitled to claim damages alike from the private party and the judge."

But I guard myself, as he did, from its being supposed that any culpa levissima would warrant damages against a judge.

This doctrine is emphatically confirmed by Bell in his Principles, where too he says: "He (the magistrate) will also be liable if there be gross irregularity in imprisonment, though no malice be shewn."

I would therefore move your Lordships to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. . . . . 9th July 1907.

96. Mackenzie's M.-C. Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees.

Husband and Wife—Marriage Contract—Assignation by Wife of Acquirenda—Testamentary Provisions by Wife's Father in her Favour—Legitim—Marriage-Contract Trustees not Entitled to Control Wife's Election.

The circumstances of this case and the contention of parties are sufficiently explained in the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Mackenzie.—The object of this action is to have it declared that the pursuers, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Mackenzie, are entitled, under the conveyance in the marriage contract of the wife's acquirenda, to payment of the legitim to which she is entitled from her father's estate. By the marriage contract, dated in 1873, the husband made certain provisions for his wife which are set out on record. The wife's father was not a party to the marriage contract. On her part she conveyed, assigned, and disponed to the trustees her whole means, estate, and effects then belonging to her, or to which she had right, or to which she might succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage, and bound and obliged herself to complete titles in her person to said means, estate, and effects, and to execute and deliver all such further deeds in favour of the trustees as might be necessary for carrying out the purposes of the trust.

The trust purposes were (2) for payment of the income to her; (3) on her death for payment of the income to her husband should he survive her; (4) on her death, but subject to her husband's liferent, for the children of the marriage in such proportion as the spouses should direct, or failing appointment, equally. There were two children, Robert Duncanson Mackenzie and William Beveridge Mackenzie. The wife, at the date of the action, had contributed nothing but a legacy of £50 to the marriage trust.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie. Mackenzie's M.-C. Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees.

The wife's father died on 23rd January 1905, leaving a trust disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his estate to the defenders in this case.

By the seventh purpose of his settlement he left Mrs Mackenzie £2000, under the provisions and declarations thereinafter mentioned. A legacy of £2000 was left to the testator's grandson, William Beveridge Mackenzie. One-fifth of the residue was left to Mrs Mackenzie. The testator's grandson, Robert Duncanson Mackenzie, was expressly excluded from any interest in his estate. The trustees were given absolute power and discretion with regard both to the £2000 legacy and the share of residue left to Mrs Mackenzie, to pay or postpone payment, or to retain the same vested in their persons, or to vest the same in other trustees, so that the interest might be paid or applied for her alimentary use during her life, or for such time as the trustees might fix, and so that the capital should be settled on the testator's grandson, William Beveridge Mackenzie, as the trustees might deem expedient.

The purposes of the marriage contract and of Mr Beveridge's settlement were thus at variance as regards (1) the husband's contingent liferent; (2) any interest of R. D. Mackenzie; and (3) the discretionary power to the testamentary trustees over Mrs Mackenzie's capital.

The marriage-contract trustees (with one exception) resolved to claim payment of Mrs Mackenzie's legitim to which she became entitled on her father's death. Mrs Mackenzie was called on by the pursuers to concur in this claim, but declined, and is a defender in the case.

The legitim will not exceed £13,000. The testamentary provision is at least £14,500. It was pointed out that as payment of this is postponed till the widow's death, the legitim may prove to be as valuable. In the event of either of Mrs Mackenzie's brothers predeceasing her mother without issue, the testamentary provisions will be at least £27,000, and may amount to over £43,000.

It was argued on behalf of the pursuers that on the death of Mrs Mackenzie's father on 23rd January 1904 a right to legitim vested in her, that she had by her marriage contract conveyed her whole acquirenda to the trustees, that the right to legitim which had vested in her passed under this conveyance to them, and that she could do nothing to defeat the right they had so acquired. This argument was stated by counsel for the pursuers to be independent of any question of the amounts of the legal and conventional provisions respectively. It was maintained that, where the trusts upon which conventional provisions are to be held are inconsistent with the trusts of the marriage contract, it is then not merely the right, but the duty, of the trustees under the marriage contract, which contains a conveyance of acquirenda such as the present, to demand payment of legitim. According to this argument a wife, by becoming a party to a marriage contract such as the present, destroys her right to elect. It might be that the legitim would only give the wife £5000, and that a heritable estate worth £5000 a year had been settled on her by her father. The wife, however, could only take what would fall under the marriage contract. She would not be entitled to elect at all, because by her conveyance of acquirenda she had already given the £5000 to her marriage-contract trustees.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie.

There is no doubt that legitim vests ipso jure by mere survivance. It was pointed out in M'Murray v. M'Murray's Trs. (1852, 14 D. 1048) that this had been settled since 1843, by Fisher v. Dixon (1843, 2 Bell's App. 63). Although, however, it is true that the right to legitim vests, it is equally true that another right completely vests, and that is the right to the testamentary provisions. This is emphasised by Lord Moncreiff and Lord Gillies in their opinion in Stevenson v. Hamilton (1838, 1 D. 181 at p. 197), where they say: "That right" (to the testamentary provision) "is perfect and effectual to herself" (the wife), "unless the claim to legitim can be put forward in her right. A choice is to be made between these rights; and the material question is, Who shall be entitled to make this election?" The question in Stevenson's case was whether the creditors of the husband were entitled to maintain that all the personal rights of the wife became vested in him jure mariti, and that the right to the legitim having passed to him by the legal assignation of the marriage, he had an absolute right to claim it. The minority there held that the interest of the husband in the wife's legitim was one which she could not surrender, and the grounds upon which this view was put support the pursuer's argument in the present case. The Court, however, negatived this view, upon the ground that the husband's jus mariti, though it has many of the effects of a right of property, is, in its proper nature a right of administration only. It was held that the right to elect was primarily in the wife, and that if the husband forced his wife, to her injury, to reject a testamentary provision which excluded the jus mariti, the Court would interfere. The interlocutor bears that as the mutual claims of the husband and his creditors and of the wife did not admit of adjustment and division of the fund between them being made by the Court, the wife's claim was sustained. Stevenson's case is referred to in the Duchess of Buckingham v. Winterbottom (1851, 13 D. 1129), and was followed in Lowson v. Young (1854, 16 D. 1098; see also Macdougal v. Wilson, 1858, 20 D. 658). In the case of Aikman (1893, 30 S.L.R. 804) it was held by the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) that an undischarged bankrupt was not entitled to reject his legitim and take instead testamentary provisions from which his creditors were purposely excluded. This was upon the ground that a right to legitim, which vested in the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration, and while he was undischarged, was clearly "estate" as defined in sect. 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that therefore the trustee was entitled to the vesting order asked. It was pointed out that the decisions of Stevenson and Lowson were not applicable to such a case.

It was argued in the present case that as a claim to legitim cannot be given up to the prejudice of ordinary creditors, neither can it to the prejudice of marriage-contract trustees who are in the position of creditors also. No doubt, in regard to what the marriage contract includes, it is onerous in the highest degree. The right of election, however, is personal and not transmissible, and until it is exercised by the only person who is entitled to do so, it cannot, in my opinion, be said that within the meaning of the conveyance in the marriage contract the wife has succeeded to the legitim more than to her testamentary provisions. It appears to me that the right to elect remains, notwithstanding the terms of the conveyance. The wife may be barred from exercising that right, e.g., if she has granted a specific conveyance of her legal rights. Or again, if she has become bankrupt, in like manner she would forfeit her right. I think, however, that unless there is something in the contract to bar her election, her right to elect remains. I am not able to hold that the terms of the marriage contract under consideration are sufficient to operate as a bar.

Nor do I think that there are circumstances in the case which necessitate the interference of the Court.

I am accordingly of opinion that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses.—22*nd June* 1907.

EXTRA DIVISION.

(Lords M'Laren, Pearson and Ardwall.)

97. Boal v. The Scottish Catholic Printing Company Limited.

Slander—Newspaper — Innuendo — Fair Comment—Comment on Appeal for Subscriptions for Charity.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

This was an action at the instance of Samuel Boal, journalist and lecturer, 574 Cathcart Road, Glasgow, against The Scottish Catholic Printing Company Limited, the proprietors of the "Glasgow Observer," concluding for £1000 as damages for slander contained in the issue of the defenders' newspaper of 1st December 1906.

The pursuer averred, inter alia:—

Cond. 1. The pursuer for many years had been engaged in the publishing of tracts dealing with Protestantism as opposed to Roman Catholicism, and he regularly delivered lectures to the public in various parts of the United Kingdom. In the city of Glasgow the pursuer was generally known as Pastor Boal, and as such he addressed meetings in a hall engaged by the Glasgow Protestant Truth Society at 379 Parliamentary Road. The pursuer was also widely known by name and reputation throughout Scotland and the north of Ireland.

Cond. 2. The defenders were the proprietors of the "Glasgow Observer," a weekly newspaper, which was the recognised organ of the Catholic faith in Scotland. The paper had a wide circulation throughout Scotland and Ireland, and was read alike by Catholics and Protestants. Frequently, in the issues of said paper, the lectures and statements of the pursuer had been maliciously commented upon, and the articles dealing with such matters had been of the most hostile nature to the pursuer and his views, and had exhibited ill-will and hatred towards the pursuer.

Cond. 3. In the issue of the defenders' newspaper of Saturday, 1st December 1906, the defenders printed and published, in a column headed "Glasgow Gleanings"—the type used being large and prominent as compared with the rest of the letterpress—the following statements:—

"We have received a printed note appealing for donations of money or gifts of material for the fitting and furnishing of a 'Home' at 11 Old Govan Road, Paisley Road, Glasgow, S.W. 'The Rev. G. Thompson Diver' is stated to be the 'General Superintendent,' and somebody called Boal appears to have scribbled a note saying, 'We will be pleased to receive a small donation.' . . . .

"Of that we have not the least doubt. . . . .

"In the public interest we beg to inquire: When was this 'Home' started? What has been the number of inmates sheltered in it since then? Is there a balance-sheet? and what guarantee is there that the money subscribed does not go to the private profit of the Rev. G. Thompson Diver or the scribbling Boal?"

Cond. 4. The pursuer believed that it was true that a Home had been opened at 11 Old Govan Road, and that a person known as the Rev. G. Thompson Diver was the superintendent thereof, and had appealed for subscriptions. At no time had the pursuer had any connection with the Home in question, nor had he ever written a note asking for subscriptions for same. The pursuer had in no way interested himself in said Home, and the said article associated him with it for the purpose of creating a pretext for maligning his private character. . . . .

In answer to Cond. 4 the defenders averred:—

Explained that a printed note regarding the said Home was, in or about the end of November 1906, sent to and received by the defenders. The said note is in the following terms:—

"Scottish Protestant Association and Bible Christian Union.

General Superintendent— Rev. G. Thompson Diver. Head Office: 83 Jamaica Street, Glasgow.

"Dear Sir or Madam,—In connection with the above, arrangements have been made to open a Rescue and Industrial Home for Women and Girls. For this purpose suitable premises have been secured at 11 Old Govan Road, Paisley Road Toll, Glasgow, S.W.

"For the fitting and furnishing of the Home, and the carrying on of this work, an appeal is hereby made to the charitably disposed public. Donations of beds, bedding, furniture, and cast-off clothing, as well as donations of money, will be thankfully received and acknowledged.

"If householders desiring to give any of the above-mentioned articles will kindly drop a post-card it will have our immediate and grateful attention. All communications to be addressed to the General Secretary at the office of the Association.—Yours faithfully,

"G. Thompson Diver."

At the top of the note an appeal for a subscription from the defenders is written in a scribbling form of hand-writing, and in these terms:—"We will be pleased to receive a small donation.—S. Boal." It is believed and averred that the said scribbled hand-writing is that of the pursuer.

With reference to Answer 4 the pursuer referred to the note and hand-writing for their terms.

The pursuer further averred:—

Cond. 5. The said statements of and concerning the pursuer were false and calumnious. They were printed and published, or caused to be printed and published, by the defenders without probable cause, and in order to gratify feelings of ill-will and hatred towards pursuer, who held contrary views on religious topics to those advocated by the defenders' said newspaper.

Cond. 6. The said statements complained of meant and implied, and were intended to mean and imply, that the pursuer was an untrustworthy person, or a person not worthy of public trust or confidence in the administration of charitable funds, and was capable of appropriating funds collected for charity to his own uses and purposes.

The Lord Ordinary approved the following issue:—

Whether the defenders were at December 1st 1906 the owners of, and printed and published, or caused to be printed and published, the "Glasgow Observer," dated December 1st 1906, containing the article printed in the schedule attached hereto, and whether said article is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as a person capable of appropriating funds collected for charity to his own purposes, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuer?

Damages laid at £1000 sterling.

Extra Division.

Boal v. The Scottish Catholic Printing Co. Ltd.

Lord Salvesen.—This is an action of damages for slander said to be contained in a paragraph published in the "Glasgow Observer" on 1st December 1906. The paragraph itself is printed in Condescendence 3. The pursuer proposes two issues—one the ordinary issue of slander, and the other an issue in which he propounds the question whether the statements complained of were false, and exposed the pursuer to public hatred and contempt. The latter issue has very rarely been allowed in Scotland, and only under exceptional circumstances, none of which exist here. I shall accordingly disallow it.

The innuendo proposed in the first issue is whether the article falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as a person unworthy of public confidence in the administration of charitable funds, and capable of appropriating funds to his own uses and purposes. The defenders say that the article is not capable of having this meaning attached to it; that all that they did was to comment on a matter of public interest, and that the article amounts only to an enquiry with regard to an unknown charitable institution as to what guarantees there are that it was efficiently and properly managed. It is open to the defenders to convince the jury that that is the true meaning of the article, and that it contains no imputation on the pursuer's character. But in my opinion the meaning which the pursuer says the article was calculated to convey is not so plainly unreasonable as to warrant me in refusing him an issue. There is no doubt that the article is intended to disparage the pursuer in public estimation. It talks of him as "the scribbling Boal," and amongst the enquiries which it makes with regard to the charity for which he is said to have solicited subscriptions, it asks "what guarantee is there that the money subscribed does not go to the private profit of the scribbling Boal?" This enquiry follows a series of questions which were probably quite legitimate, but which suggest a doubt as to the existence of the "home," or at least of its usefulness as a charitable institution. When the writer goes on to suggest that the money subscribed may go to the private profit of the pursuer, he does not appear to me to be in the region of legitimate comment on a matter of public interest, but to have exposed himself to the charge of attacking private character. If the article meant that under the guise of collecting money for a charitable object the pursuer was really seeking to obtain profit for himself, I cannot doubt that it is actionable. I shall therefore allow the pursuer an issue; although I think the inneundo might be better expressed, for I do not find any suggestion in the article that the pursuer was connected with the administration of the society. The proper innuendo seems to me to be that the article represents the pursuer as a person capable of appropriating funds collected for charity to his own purposes.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

The following authorities were referred to:—Archer v. Ritchie & Co., 1891, 18 R. 719; Gray v. Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1890, 17 R. 1185; Falconer v. Docherty, 1893, 20 R. 765.

The Court adhered.

Lord M'Laren.—I am not surprised that the defenders should have raised the question of the relevancy of this record, as they have done, because in such cases one has not implicit confidence in the view that may be taken by a jury, especially where the elements of political or religious prejudice come into play. But what we as a Court have to consider is, whether the words published regarding the pursuer are capable of bearing the interpretation or innuendo which is sought to be put upon them. Now the Lord Ordinary has held that they are capable of being put in issue with the innuendo which he accepts as a possible meaning, and I cannot say that I entertain any doubt upon this subject. I adhere to all that I said in my judgment in the First Division in the case of Archer v. Ritchie & Co., 18 R. 719, and wherever a critique, however severe it may be in its terms, is, in the opinion of any fair-minded reader, nothing but criticism of public conduct, I should be against sending such a case to a jury. But I am unable to say that the paragraph complained of here is of that character. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I concur in everything he has said in his opinion, with one slight reservation as to the passage where he says:—"When the writer goes on to suggest that the money subscribed may go to the private profit of the pursuer, he does not appear to me to be in the region of legitimate comment in a matter of public interest, but to have exposed himself to the charge of attacking private character." It is only necessary for me to say that I think that the observation with regard to subscriptions going to the private profit of the pursuer is not so clearly within the region of legitimate comment that the case should be withheld from the jury. I think it is for the jury to say whether the intention was to point out that the public were in danger of being defrauded by a system of appeals for subscriptions without the publication of accounts or any other guarantee as to the proper application of the funds subscribed, or whether the intention was to say that Mr Diver and Mr Boal were persons who sought for money for the purpose of converting it to their private profit. Even if the writer had not named any person, but, having taken the appeal for subscriptions as his text, had gone on to ask what guarantee was given that money so subscribed did not go to the private profits of those appealing for it, I think he would have come perilously near to the region of attacking private character. Here, however, the defenders do not even give themselves the chance of escaping on the ground that they have made no attack on anyone, for the names of the two gentlemen, to whom they suggest that their criticism is applicable, are given. I have no doubt, therefore, that this case must go to a jury.

Lord Pearson.—I also think that the Lord Ordinary is right in the decision he has come to, and I agree with all that the Lord Ordinary has said, subject to the qualification which your Lordship has pointed out.

Lord Ardwall.—I also agree with the Lord Ordinary, subject to your Lordship's remarks on his opinion. I think it cannot be said that the article in question might not be interpreted as suggesting that the persons therein referred to are persons capable of putting money subscribed for a charity into their own pockets. It is indeed true that the sentence complained of takes the form of an interrogation and not of an assertion, but I cannot think that that makes any real difference. It is no better than if it had consisted of an assertion that there was no guarantee that the money subscribed did not go into the pockets of Diver and Boal. The pursuer is in my opinion entitled to lay such a statement before a jury and ask them if it can bear the innuendo suggested by him. I therefore agree with your Lordships that this case must go to trial.—6*th July* 1907.

This was an action at the instance of the North British Railway Co. against the Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co. and the individual partners thereof, as such partners and as individuals; and also against William Mather and Reston Mather, both farmers near Shettleston, and James Mather, engineer, there. The action concluded for declarator: (First), that the pursuers, as proprietors of certain lands, marked respectively Nos. 1, 2 and 2a, 3 and 4, at and adjoining Shettleston Station, in the parish of Shettleston and county of Lanark, were proprietors of (a) the soil, (b) the clay, (c) the sand, and (d) the other substances presently being worked and removed by the Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co., lying in, under or upon the said lands, and that the said clay, sand, and other substances were not included either (1) in the mines of coal, ironstone, slate or other minerals deemed to be excepted in terms of sect. 70 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, out of the conveyances of the said lands held by the pursuers, so far as the said conveyances were granted under the said Act, or (2) in the mines or minerals expressly excepted out of the said conveyances so far as mines or minerals were expressly excepted therefrom; (second), that the defenders were not entitled to work or remove any parts or portions of the said soil, clay, sand or other substances presently being worked or removed by them; and (third), that the defenders were not entitled to work or remove any parts or portions of the soil, clay, sand, or such other substances as aforesaid, in, under, or from the lands adjacent to the said lands marked Nos. 1 and 4 on the said plan, so as to injure the said lands belonging to the pursuers, or the railways or station or works on these lands owned by the pursuers, or so as to interrupt or interfere with the working of the traffic on these railways or at the said station; and the defenders, the Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co., ought and should be interdicted from working or removing the said soil, clay, sand, or other substances in, under, or from the said adjacent lands, so as to injure the said lands marked respectively Nos. 1, 2, 2A, 3, and 4 on said plan, or the railways or station or works on these lands owned by the pursuers, or so as to interrupt or interfere with the working of the traffic on these railways or at the said station.

In the case of the said lands marked Nos. 1, 2 and 2A on the said plan, all mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under these lands were excepted out of the Conveyance thereof held by the pursuers by virtue and in terms of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845. In the case of the lands marked No. 3 on the said plan, the disposition held by the pursuers contained a reservation in the following terms:—

"But excepting and reserving from the foresaid conveyance the whole coal, ironstone, limestone, and fireclay, and whole other metals and minerals in the lands above disponed, in so far as forming part of the lands of Budhill, with full power and liberty to those in right thereof, and their heirs and successors and their tenants, to search for, work, win, and carry away the same, so far as not already done, but so as not to enter upon the surface of said lands, declaring that we and our heirs and successors shall not be liable or responsible in any way to our said disponees or their foresaids for any damage which may be occasioned to the said lands or to the buildings or erections which may be erected thereon by the working and carrying away the minerals and others before reserved, or those in any adjoining land belonging to us. . . ."

In the case of the said lands marked No. 4 on the said plan, the disposition thereof held by the pursuers contained the following reservation:—

"Reserving always from this conveyance the whole coal mines and minerals in and under the piece of ground hereby disponed, and full right and liberty to work the same, but only by pits sunk outside of the piece of ground hereby disponed, and subject to and in terms of the provisions of The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845."

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, the substance of which and the facts of the case appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—

"Finds (1) That the pursuers have failed to prove that the notice (No. 8 of process) served upon them by the defenders, the Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co. and others, was given mala fide for the sole purpose of compelling the pursuers to compensate the said defenders, and that the workings of the said defenders have been proceeded with mala fide, not in the ordinary course of working, but merely to rear up a fictitious claim against the pursuers; (2) that the pursuers have failed to prove that the substances, other than soil and clay, presently being worked and removed by the said defenders, are not such as to fall within the exception contained in sect. 70 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845; (3) that it is unnecessary to decide whether or not the substances lying beneath the surface of the lands marked and coloured No. 3 pink on the plan produced (No. 7 of process) are such as to fall within the exception and reservation contained in the pursuers' title to the said lands in respect there is no evidence that the said defenders intend to proceed to work the said substances in said area; (4) that there are neither averments nor proof to support the pursuers' conclusion for lateral support. With these findings, dismisses the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns."

Lord Dundas. — The pursuers, the N.B. Railway Co., are proprietors of certain lands which are marked and coloured upon the plan produced as No. 1 brown, Nos. 2 and 2A crimson, No. 3 pink, and No. 4 red respectively, which they or their authors have acquired from time to time for the purposes of their undertaking.

The station of Shettleston and various railway lines, including a portion of the main line between Glasgow and Hamilton, are situated upon these lands, mainly upon those coloured brown. The lands were purchased from persons named Mather, whose family have been proprietors of the estate of Budhill since about the year 1790. In regard to the lands Nos. 1, 2 and 2A respectively, all mines of coal, ironstone, slate or other minerals under the same are excepted out of the conveyances to the Company by virtue and in terms of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845; and the conveyance of No. 4 is practically similar. The conveyance of No. 3 is in common law form, and contains an exception and reservation of minerals which is quoted at length in Art. 3 (c) of the Condescendence. The defenders to this action are the Messrs Mather, who claim to be proprietors of the minerals lying under the whole of the said lands, and the Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co. and its partners, who are lessees under an agreement of lease between them and the Mathers (No. 421 of process), dated 11th and 18th December 1905, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1906, of (first) the freestone metals and all other minerals within a depth of 120 feet from the surface of an area coloured blue upon the plan produced, and of the surface thereof; and (second) the freestone metals and all other minerals within a depth of 120 feet from the surface in the said areas coloured brown, crimson, pink, and red respectively on said plan, and also in an area coloured purple thereon, the surface of which has been feued by the Mathers to the Acme Manufacturing Co. Ltd.

The proximate cause of the action was a notice by the defenders, the said lessees, to the pursuers, dated 27th December 1905, which is printed at length in Art. 4 of the Condescendence, whereby they intimated, in terms of sect. 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, that they intended, after the lapse of thirty days from the service of the notice, to work the minerals contained in their lease under that portion of the railway shown upon the accompanying plan, it being their intention (without prejudice to their right to vary the order of working) to commence to work the sandstone at or near a stated point in the area coloured blue and to work it in a northerly and north-westerly direction, the seam of sandstone being about twelve feet thick; and thereafter to work the building rock underlying the said sandstone, and thereafter the seam of coal thereunder, and the fireclay associated therewith. The pursuers served no counter notice, and the said defenders commenced operations at or near the point indicated by sinking a mine and carrying their workings under a portion of the ground coloured brown, as shown on the plan, with the result that a certain amount of subsidence occurred at and near Shettleston station.

During the proof, and in the arguments, a variety of questions of general importance were developed. I shall endeavour to deal with these; but I do so under the protest that the summons is not, as I shall presently explain, so framed as, in my opinion, to raise them sharply for decision.

The pursuers' counsel argued that sandstone is not a mineral within the meaning of the conveyances to the railway company, or any of them; and further that, in any event, what the defenders are at present working and removing is not of that character. It is, I think, absolutely concluded by authority, so far as I am concerned, that the exception of "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, and other minerals" in sect. 70 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845 covers freestone, including in that generic term sandstone and limestone. That was decided in the recent case of G. and S.-W. Railway v. Bain, 1893, 21 R. 134. But Bain's case does not stand alone. In Jamieson, 1868, 6 S.L.R. 188, the Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) so decided in regard to limestone, and his decision, which was acquiesced in, was expressly approved by the Inner House in Nisbet Hamilton, 1886, 13 R. 454, and by some, at all events, of the judges in Farie, 1887, 14 R. 346. It is true that the last cited case was reversed on appeal by the House of Lords (1888, 15 R. (H.L.) 94), but I observe that Lord Watson, who was one of the majority in that House, said (at p. 101): "The important question still remains, What are the minerals referred to, other than coal, ironstone, or slate? My present impression is that 'other minerals' must necessarily include all minerals which can reasonably be said to be ejusdem generis with any of those enumerated. Slate being one of them, I do not think it would be possible to exclude freestone or limestone strata." In Bain's case (supra cit.) the Lord Justice-Clerk said: "Accordingly, in the case of Farie, in the House of Lords, it appears to have been regarded as impossible to exclude freestone and limestone, when slate was included." I may also refer to the decision of the House of Lords in Midland Railway Co. 1889, 15 A.C. 19, which is to the same effect. It was, indeed, argued for the pursuers that the exception in sect. 70 does not include stone at all. This argument was based upon certain dicta by Lord Macnaghten in Farie's case (15 R. (H.L.) at pp. 110, 111), where his Lordship, in developing his view (which has since been overruled, e.g. in Midland Railway Co., supra cit.) that "mines" do not include open-cast workings, dealt with sects. 25 to 36 of the Scots Act of 1845, "with respect to the temporary occupation of land." I doubt whether Lord Macnaghten's dicta, which of course must be regarded as of great weight, go the length of supporting the pursuers' argument; but if they do so, then I think that they must give way to the series of decisions already referred to, which directly negative the pursuers' proposition. The pursuers' counsel further founded upon the cases of Menzies v. Breadalbane, 10th June 1818, F.C., affirmed 1822 1 Shaw App. 225, and Duke of Hamilton, 1841, 3 D. 1121. In the first of these—the "Bolfracks" case—the rubric in the Court of Session report is: "Found that a reservation by the superior in a feu-charter of 'the haill mines and minerals, of whatever nature and quality' does not comprehend a quarry of fine stone, of peculiar qualities, useful for building." The report describes the subject in dispute as "a vein of stone of a rare species, peculiarly fitted for architectural purposes, by its admitting of ornamental finishing, and by its resisting the weather." The defender there argued that "in a feu grant, particularly of a Highland property, the parties must have intended to convey all the rocks of which the property was composed, because, in many districts, the property consists of little else." The Lords, by a majority, and reversing the Lord Ordinary (Pitmilly), found as above. The judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords. The rubric in 1 Shaw App. 225 broadly describes the subject as "a quarry of freestone." The briefly reported opinion of the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) proceeds upon the distinction between the canons of construction applicable to leases and feu-charters respectively, and concludes thus: "It does appear to me to be the better opinion that mines and minerals in this feu did not mean stone-quarries, and that the opinion of the majority of the judges is therefore right." The Duke of Hamilton's case decided in conformity with the case of Menzies v. Breadalbane, "that a reservation in an excambion of the liberty of working coal and other metals, fossils, and minerals did not comprehend freestone." The learned judges evidently regarded Menzies' case as establishing a general principle to the effect stated, a view which, with all respect, I think might require to be reconsidered if a similar question should arise. But it is sufficient for present purposes to observe that cases decided upon the construction of feu-charters or other agreements between parties can afford little or no assistance in determining the true meaning of a statutory conveyance, embodying the statutory exception of mines and minerals. This has been repeatedly enunciated by the highest authorities, and is perhaps nowhere more clearly laid down that it was by Lord Herschell in Midland Railway Co., 1889, 15 A.C. at page 27. So far, therefore, as the pursuers' conveyances of the lands Nos. 1, 2, 2A and 4 are concerned, I am of opinion that sandstone is within the exception expressed in sect. 70, and impliedly embodied in the deeds.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Dundas.

North British Railway Co. v. The Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co. and Others.

It may be open to question whether a similar proposition can be affirmed in regard to the pursuers' title to the pink lands No. 3. But I see no reason to decide that matter one way or the other, because there is no suggestion that the defenders are about to carry their workings under that area, and there are obvious reasons which render such a course improbable.

I turn now to the pursuers' subsidiary argument, viz. that what the defenders are at present removing by their workings is not sandstone within the meaning of the said exceptions in their titles. There is, I think, no dispute that there is a large amount of undoubted sandstone in this district, though its quality is said to vary from part to part. The defenders are at present engaged in blasting the upper portion of the material, and converting it into moulders' sand, for which it appears to be suitable. They state that their intention is, when they reach what they allege to be harder sandstone, suitable for building, to work that for sale by open-cast quarry. The question raised by the argument must, I consider, be looked at in the light of the whole evidence as to the character of the subjacent materials in the vicinity of the defenders' workings. The pursuers' witnesses describe the material which is now being got out as "a peculiar kind of rotten stone, decomposed stone"—"consolidated sand and clay"—"rotten sandstone"—"a soft, rotten rock"—"stone by courtesy, not building stone," and so forth. The defenders' witnesses, on the other hand, say that what is presently being wrought is suitable for moulders' sand, and that below there is a quantity of good building sandstone.

Some of them describe the latter more modestly as "an ordinary building freestone poor of quality"—"a poor variety of building stone, but could be used as such"—"a first-class quarry of good working freestone for speculative building purposes"—"the usual building stone. I would not compare it with the best, such as Craigleith," and so forth. The pursuers' counsel argued, as I understood him, that neither the softer stuff now being wrought (with which alone the summons deals) nor the alleged harder material below (which appears to be included in the language of his first plea in law) can be dealt with as minerals, because, as he put it, they are of no merchantable value, not being capable of being wrought to profit. I pause to observe that I do not think that capacity of earning profits is the true test of whether or not a stone is "merchantable," and is therefore a mineral, in such a question as this. For example, if a person owned a small seam of coal under a railway, I do not imagine that the Company would be entitled to prohibit him from removing it, merely because he might not be able to sell it at a profit. The proposition which the pursuers contend for is said to have been laid down in Nisbet Hamilton, 1886, 13 R. 454. In that case, a proprietor sought payment for rock removed by a railway company from the sides of a railway cutting, within the limits of the land compulsorily acquired from him by the Company. The latter argued in defence (a) that the rock did not belong to the pursuer but to the Company, because by their conveyance they acquired the land, and all that might be in it, within the limits of the conveyance, down to formation level; (b) that the rock was not a mineral within the meaning of sect. 70; and (c) that nothing had been removed except what was necessary for the safe working and maintenance of the line. The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) decided in favour of the Company, solely upon the third ground. Lord Adam, who pronounced the opinion of the Court in the First Division, had some doubt about this ground of decision, but he decided for the Company upon the broad general argument first above stated. Nothing else was necessary to the judgment; but Lord Adam, in considering the second of the Company's contentions, did express an opinion that "while the stone was of some value to the defenders for making or repairing embankments . . . . it was of no merchantable value whatever." By this I do not think his Lordship intended to express or imply that in order to come within the exception in sect. 70 it is necessary that stone should be wrought, or capable of being wrought, at a profit. I am confirmed in this view by what the same learned judge said in Farie's case (14 R. at pp. 366, 367). Lord Adam there quoted with approval the tests applied by English judges, viz. that the material should be "of some value" or "of commercial value"; and he also referred to the opinion of Lord Romilly, M.R., in Chechley (L.R. 1867, 4 Eq. 19), where his Lordship used the words, "anything . . . . which is useful for any purpose whatever." If I have rightly interpreted Lord Adam's meaning, it appears to be in harmony with the views upon this matter of the learned Lords in Farie's case, and particularly with that expressed (15 R. (H.L.) at p. 96) by the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury). I observe that in a recent English case his Lordship reiterated his opinion upon the point, and said (during the course of the argument): "I think it is absolutely wrong to say that the question whether a thing can be worked at a profit or not is to determine whether it is a mineral or not" (Todd, Birleston & Co. [1903], 1 K.B. 603, at p. 606). I refer also to Lord Herschell's explanation in Midland Railway Co., 1889, 15 A.C. at pp. 26, 27, of his opinion in Farie's case (15 R. (H.L.) at p. 105). But I need not labour this matter further, because I think it clear, looking to the mass of evidence hinc inde contained in the proof, I am not in a position here and now to affirm, even to the restricted extent and effects which the summons contemplates, that the "substances presently being worked" are not such as fall within the exceptions referred to; and still less, that such is the case as regards the "similar substances in the remainder of said lands" to which the pursuers' first plea in law seems to extend.

I believe that this is the stage at which I ought to notice an argument which was strenuously advanced for the pursuers, but of which I can find no trace upon the record. It was to the effect that, even assuming that the substances which the defenders have begun to work out are minerals within the exception contained in sect. 70, they have no right so to work them as to injure or bring down the surface of the pursuers' land. It was conceded that the contrary was decided forty years ago by the House of Lords in the English case of Bennett, 1867, 2 E. and I. App. 27, which has not only been followed by numerous decisions in England, but has hitherto been regarded as good law in Scotland. (See, for example, Haunchwood Brick, etc. Co., 1882, 20 Chan. Div. 552; Ruabon Brick, etc. Co. [1893], 1 Chan. 427; Blades [1901], 2 Chan. 624; Todd, Birleston & Co. [1903], 1 K.B. 603; Farie's case, supra cit.; Dixon, 1879, 7 R. 216 (per Lord Adam)—referred to in Farie's case by L.P. Inglis and Lord Adam, 14 R. at p. 353 and p. 365, and by Lord Herschell in Midland Railway Co., 1889, 15 A.C. at p. 32; Ferguson's Deas on Railways, p. 192.) It is, however, now urged that there is a vital, though hitherto unnoticed, distinction between the language of sect. 79 of the English Act and the corresponding sect. 72 of our own statute. I am satisfied, upon a careful study of the two sections, that this is an entirely mistaken idea. The language of the sections is, for some reason, different, but the meaning appears to me to be the same. The scheme of the English section is that if before the expiration of the thirty days the Company do not state their willingness to treat with the mine-owner or lessee for payment of compensation, it shall be lawful for the latter to work the mines, or any part thereof for which the Company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, "so that the same be done in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same shall be situate"; and then the section proceeds—quite intelligibly, though perhaps tautologically—to provide that if any damage be occasioned to the railway by "improper working of such mines," the same shall be repaired and made good by the mine-owner, etc., at his own expense. Sect. 72 of the Scots Act is not, to my thinking, substantially different. It provides that, upon the same hypothesis, it shall be lawful for the mine-owner or lessee to work the mines, or such parts thereof for which the Company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, up to the limits of the mines for which they shall have agreed to make compensation, "in such manner as such owner, lessee, or occupier shall think fit, for the purpose of getting the minerals contained therein." The words quoted seem to me to be substantially equivalent to those which I quoted from the English section, the idea of both being, as I think, proper as contrasted with improper mining operations; and the section proceeds, perhaps unnecessarily, as in the case of the English section, to state the converse proposition, viz. that, if any damage be occasioned to the railway "by the working or getting of any such minerals which the Company shall so have required to be left unworked, and for which they shall so have agreed to make compensation"—and this is, I think, the analogue of the "improper working" of the English section—the damage shall be made good by the owner or lessee at his own expense.

If the views which I have now expressed, perhaps at too great length, are correct, I think it is manifest that no practical effect can be given to the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. There is no evidence that the defenders are removing "soil" or "clay," except very thin streaks of clay, the removal of which would be a necessity of working the sandstone, assuming that the defenders are entitled to work out the latter. As regards "sand" and "other substances," the summons is not framed so as to meet in any adequate manner the evidence and arguments to which I have referred, and in regard to which my opinion is substantially adverse to the pursuers. Nor, in my opinion, can the second declaratory conclusion, and the interdict relative to it, receive practical effect, if the views already expressed are sound—unless, indeed, the allegation of mala fides on the part of the defenders, to which I shall presently allude, is well founded.

The third declaratory conclusion can, in my judgment, be disposed of in a few words. It is really based upon a claim by the pursuers for adjacent support; and their counsel referred to the recent case of Turners Ltd., 1904, 6 F. 900. But, assuming everything else in the pursuers' favour, it seems sufficient to say that there is nothing, so far as I can see, in the record or in the evidence to warrant the conclusion.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

North British Railway Co. v. The Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co. and Others.

I now come to a question which, if I do not mistake, lies at the very core of the pursuers' case, but which, oddly enough, is not specifically referred to in their summons, though it might probably be given effect to, if necessary, under the conclusions for interdict.

The point is sharply enough raised by the pursuers' third plea in law, and is to the effect that the defenders' notice was "given mala fide for the sole purpose of compelling the pursuers to compensate the said defenders," and that their workings have been proceeded with mala fide, "not in the ordinary course of working the said substances, but merely to rear up a fictitious claim against the pursuers." I do not doubt that, now and again, unfounded claims are brought against railway companies, with the sole object, in the words of the pursuers' witnesses, of "harassing" or "getting at" the Company; nor that, if such a case were fairly proved, the Court would be entitled and bound to interfere on the Company's behalf. But I think that very clear proof would be required to justify such intervention. A case of this sort was presented, but failed, in Midland Railway Co., 1887, 37 Chan. Div. 386, affd. 1889, 15 A.C. 19. In that case there had been no workings, nor had any lease of the minerals been granted. I entirely accept the law there laid down by Cotton, L.J., and quoted with approval by Lord Herschell, that "there must be not only an expression of desire but an honest actual existence of the desire to work, either by himself or his lessee, to justify an owner in giving such a notice. If he gave the notice when it was obvious that there were no minerals, or that he could not possibly intend either to let or work them himself, that would be vexatious, and the Court would not allow that to be acted upon." But the pursuers' case falls, in my judgment, far short of the sort of case there supposed. It depends upon the evidence as to the history of the Mathers' estate, and of its minerals; upon the method resorted to by the lessees for mining out the "rotten rock" for moulders' sand; and upon the opinions of the pursuers' skilled witnesses as to the impossibility of working any of the subjacent materials to a profit. The pursuers' case is, I think, at its best, one of suspicion. On the other hand, I saw no reason, so far as their demeanour was concerned, to doubt the honesty of the evidence given by Mr Mather and the Messrs Loudon. Further, I find it difficult to suppose that a scheme which is being carried on under the auspices and with the approval of Mr Rankine—a witness upon whose experience and integrity the Court is accustomed to rely—is one of the mala fide character which is alleged against it. Mr Rankine depones that he "had nothing to do with the actual looking out for a tenant"; but after the tenants were accepted, the matter came before him. He "unquestionably approved of the sandstone being let in the area in question." He considers that the defenders' mine, the sinking of which was accomplished before his advice was sought, is "an excellent means of ascertaining what is there," and says that "what has been done in the way of opening out the stone here has been properly done with a view to the getting of the material in the shape of sandstone in this ground, although I would regard it as preliminary to open-cast for the harder material." Other witnesses of experience in their respective lines of business, such as Mr M'Laughlan and Mr Barlas, speak confidently as to the future prospects of the concern; and there is a considerable body of evidence to the effect that the defenders' sandstone is at least nowise inferior to that obtainable at Haughyett quarry, the contents of which appear to have been regarded in Bain's case (21 R. 143) to be good workable freestone. Mr Tatlock, the well-known analyst, also depones: "The harder rock which I saw recently appears to be fair building rock. It would not rank with the best, such as Craigleith, but it is quite as good as well-known building stones that I have had to examine." I may observe, in passing, that Mr Tatlock's earlier reports upon the samples submitted to him seem to me to have as little to do with the real merits of this case as Mr Marshall's much-vaunted bottle of muddy water (No. 512 of process). I do not refer to these witnesses for the defenders as indicating that I agree with their evidence, but merely for the purpose of showing why I cannot accept the view that this claim is a wholly mala fide and vexatious one. I carefully refrain from making the smallest indication of any formed opinion as to the value, if any, of the defenders' subjacent materials. That is a question which, in my judgment, must, failing agreement, be decided by arbiters or an oversman, and not by this Court. All that I now say is that I am not prepared, upon the evidence before me, to sustain the pursuers' third plea in law. In conclusion, I may refer to a passage in the opinion of Chitty, J., in the Midland Railway case (37 Ch. Div., at p. 392) as fairly representing my views upon this point, and perhaps affording some answer to Mr Hall Blyth's complaint as to his experience of "inflated damages."

I do not think that there is any other point which requires to be dealt with. Upon the whole matter I am satisfied that the action must be dismissed, with expenses. The chief regret which I entertain is that it should have been necessary to deliver so long an opinion in regard to a summons which does not directly raise any of the issues with which I have thought it my duty to deal.—22*nd June* 1907.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered by Lord Low.

Lord Low.—In regard to the question whether the bond and disposition in security granted by Gardiner to Pitcher is challengeable under the Act 1621, cap. 18, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I am quite satisfied with the grounds upon which his judgment is rested.

There is, however, another question upon which the Lord Ordinary did not consider it necessary to express a decided opinion. The claimant Howard maintains that if the bond and disposition in security in favour of Pitcher should be held to be good, the debt of £8689, in security of which it was granted, has been extinguished to the extent of some £3400 by indefinite and unappropriated payments. The rule of law upon which that contention is founded is that where, in an account current, there is no appropriation of payment to any particular debts, the law makes an appropriation according to the order of the items in the account. I am of opinion that there is no room in this case for the application of that rule. There is here no account current between the parties in the sense in which that expression is used in the rule. What Howard founds upon as an account current is the account No. 240 of process. That is an account which was made up by Pitcher, for the purposes of this case, from memoranda, jottings, letters, cheques and bank pass-books. It contains on one side sums advanced to Gardiner, and on the other payments received from him, and to that extent it is somewhat in the form of an account current. It does not, however, represent any account current which was actually kept between Gardiner and Pitcher or Biss.

That, however, might not have been conclusive if the fact had been that advances having been made by Biss through the agency of Pitcher to Gardiner, the latter had from time to time made indefinite payments to account of his general indebtedness. But that was not what took place. [His Lordship examined the evidence regarding the various items of payments, and continued.]

The result is that, in my opinion, it is quite plain that none of the sums credited to Gardiner after the date of the bond, were indefinite payments to account of his general indebtedness. . . . .—9th July 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

The Lord Ordinary having assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action, the pursuer reclaimed.

Counsel for the pursuer stated that the pursuer did not insist in claiming payment of the estate as a matter of right. The pursuer offered security to repeat in the event of a child being born; and in these circumstances the Court were in practice to authorise the trustee to denude. In addition to the cases quoted in the Outer House, counsel referred to Blackwood v. Blackwood's Trs., 1833, 11 S. 699; In re 2nd Div. Turnbull v. Fleming (Turnbull's Trustee).

Loman [1895], 2 Ch. 348, per Lindley, L.J., at p. 366; Munro v. Macarthur, 1878, 16 S.L.R. 126.

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and allowed a proof before answer of the averments as to the failure of the trust purposes by the deaths of the whole persons who would have been entitled to the residue of the estate failing issue of the pursuer.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—There is no doubt that it has long been a fixed doctrine in our law—and the same seems to be the case in England—that there is no age at which a woman is presumed to be incapable of childbearing. Nevertheless, the Court have in several cases considered themselves able to allow property, which is to all intents tied up, when there is practically no possibility of children being born, to be divided on security being found to make repetition in the event of a birth taking place. I think we may follow these cases on the present occasion. I therefore propose that we recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and allow a proof before answer of the averments for the pursuer contained in Articles 6 and 7 of the Condescendence.

I should add that, while we recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, I do not think his Lordship could have treated the present case otherwise than he has done.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I quite agree. It is to be understood that we agree with the Lord Ordinary in his view that he could not, in this case, have done anything but what he has done. It has been argued that we ought to follow the decisions which have been cited to us, and which lay down a rule which does not constitute a rule of law but a rule of practice. We think this is a suitable case for applying that rule.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion.—11*th July* 1907.

I. Slander — Innuendo—Fraud — Charge of Running Dog in a Race Under a Wrong Name—Language Held Not to Bear Innuendo.

II. Slander—Privilege—Referee at Dog Race Meeting—Right of Referee to Give Reasons for Disqualifying Competitors—Malice—Facts and Circumstances—Relevancy.

III. Slander—Fraud—Charge of Fraud in a Printed Notice in General Terms—Averments That Charge Intended to Apply to Pursuers—Form of Issue.

The pursuers in this action were four working men in Edinburgh who were joint owners of a racing whippet dog named "Music." The defender was the promoter of athletic and sporting competitions at Powderhall, Edinburgh, and damages for slander were here claimed from him (1) for statements made by the defender concerning the pursuers at a race meeting at Powderhall on 31st December 1906; and (2) for statements in a notice printed on the back of the official programme issued by the defender in connection with a dog handicap to be run on 2nd February 1907.

The circumstances in which the alleged slanderous statements were made are sufficiently set forth in the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The first issue proposed by the pursuer was:

Whether [at the time and place mentioned, and in presence of certain named persons] the defender falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuers, or any of them and which of them, 'It's a wrong dog. Get off this track, or I will have you arrested,' or used words of the like import and effect, meaning thereby to represent that the pursuers had been guilty of fraud, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers.

The second issue proposed was as follows:

Whether in the end of January 1907 the defender issued to the public programmes containing a notice in the terms set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, and whether the said notice is of and concerning the pursuers, or any of them and which of them, and is false and calumnious, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

Damages laid at £200 for each of the pursuers.

Schedule referred to:—

"Important Notice."

"The practice of dog owners assuming a number of names having become so mystifying to the promoter and handicapper, notice is hereby given that in future all dogs must be entered in the actual owner's name, who will, however, if desired, be allowed to register a name under which all his nominations will appear in future. Anyone failing to act in accordance with this notification will be liable to have their dogs disqualified.

"Mr F. A. Lumley desires to thank dog owners and followers of the sport for the liberal patronage bestowed upon his promotings during the past year. The healthy state of the sport has encouraged him to set aside a number of dates during the forthcoming season for dog racing. The only regrettable feature in the past season's racing has been the tendency to bring dogs from other racing districts such as Oldham, Newcastle, etc., and to enter them under another name as a local dog without giving any details of past performances. Handicaps have been won? (stolen is perhaps the proper word to use) in this way, and the dog has been immediately returned to its rightful owner. The promoter is aware that unless some effort is made to check this abuse it will ultimately succeed in killing the sport. He therefore desires to get the co-operation of owners and others in the efforts he intends to make during the incoming season to stamp it out.

"In future all first entries must be made upon a form which will be supplied at the office on the ground or at 163 Leith Street. All particulars asked for must be given in full (written in ink) and signed by the actual owner of the dog, and will be used in evidence against him should the promoter at any time find misleading information has been given."

The defender pleaded (1) that the language complained of was not calumnious; (2) that the occasion was privileged, and that facts and circumstances were not relevantly averred from which malice could be inferred; and (3) in regard to the second issue, that the notice was issued to the public in general terms, and was not of and concerning the pursuers or any of them.

The Lord Ordinary disallowed the first issue, and allowed the second issue in the following amended form:—

Whether in the month of January 1907 the defender issued to the public programmes containing a notice in the terms set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, and whether the said notice or any part thereof is of and concerning the pursuers, or any of them and which of them, and falsely and calumniously represents that they or any, and which of them, had been guilty of fraud in substituting another dog for their dog "Music" at Powderhall races, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

Damages laid at £200 sterling for each of the pursuers.

Schedule annexed as quoted above.

Lord Salvesen.—Two issues have been proposed in this case, the one based upon an alleged verbal and the other on an alleged written slander of the pursuers. The defender maintained on somewhat different grounds that neither of these issues should be allowed, and it is accordingly necessary to scrutinise the pursuers' averments.

There are four pursuers—Costa, M'Manus, White, and Paterson—and each claims damages to the extent of £200. They claim to be joint owners of a whippet dog named "Music." In November they arranged to enter this dog for the New Year Powderhall Handicap of 190 yards, the first prize in which was £40. To qualify the dog for this race it was sent to Middleton, near Oldham, for six weeks' special training, and on 14th December the dog was entered for the handicap by the pursuer Costa in the name of the pursuer White, and was by request placed in the first string of No. 1 heat. The first heat was to be run on 31st December at 2 p.m., and prior to that hour three of the pursuers, along with their trainer, were upon Powerhall course. When the race was just about to commence the marksman said to the pursuer Costa, "A very good imitation, but you shan't run here. The right 'Music' was a wee bit browner between the strokes." Some other conversation took place, and Costa then fetched the defender. On his asking the marksman what was the matter in dispute the latter replied, "It's not the one." The defender then said to the marksman, "You know what to do," and on his return to the winning line he ordered the dog's number to be taken down from the number board, and so disqualified it. The pursuer Costa then went to defender at the winning line and asked him why the dog was not allowed to run, and the latter replied, "It's the wrong dog. Get off this track or I will have you arrested."

These are the words which are put in issue, and although addressed only to the pursuer Costa, they are said to represent that all the pursuers had been guilty of fraud, the fraud consisting in their having substituted another dog for the genuine "Music" in order to increase their chance of winning the prize.

It is admitted by the pursuers that the defender was in sole control of the races in every way. It was, therefore, part of his duty to disqualify any dog to which a valid objection was taken, and it is not contended by the pursuers that for any mistake which he might make in performing this duty he would incur any liability. The right to disqualify seems also to imply a right in the arbiter to state the reason if he is appealed to. At all events, I think it is plain that he is privileged in doing so, and indeed that the case is one of somewhat high privilege. It is difficult to see in what simpler language the defender could have given his reason for the disqualification than the words attributed to him. If, as the pursuers contend, the threat to have Costa arrested could be read along with the other words "It's a wrong dog," it might be possible to innuendo the words as implying a charge of fraud against Costa. In my opinion they cannot be so read. The words "Get off this track, or I will have you arrested," appear to have no possible connection with the alleged fraud, but refer to an obstruction of the track by the pursuer and a threat to have him dealt with if he did not remove himself. The contention that the words complained of, "It's a wrong dog," necessarily imply a charge of fraud, not merely against Costa, to whom they were addressed, but against other persons who are said to have had an interest in the dog, seems to me untenable. I presume a dog may be rightly disqualified though its owner has not been guilty of fraud, and I therefore propose to disallow the first issue. I may add that I think this is a case in which even if the words could be construed as calumnious, malice would require to go into the issue, and that the issue falls to be disallowed on the further ground that there are no facts and circumstances from which such malice can be inferred.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen. — Costa and Others v. Lumley.

The second issue is based on a printed notice which the defender issued in the end of January 1907. The notice relates, inter alia, to fraud or attempted fraud in connection with racing. It states that dogs have been brought from other racing districts and entered as local dogs under false names, and "that handicaps have been won (stolen is perhaps the proper word to use) in this way." The words here are perfectly general, and contain no direct reference to pursuers, and it is not said that such things as those referred to have not occurred in connection with the racing of whippet dogs. The pursuers, however, aver, and offer to prove, that the objectionable paragraph of the notice was directed against them, and that it was so understood by large numbers of the public. This perhaps by itself would not be enough, but there are some circumstances which they found on as indicating that the writer of the paragraph had the case of the pursuers specially in his mind. Their dog "Music" had come from Oldham as a pup and had been trained there, and Oldham is the first place that is mentioned as an outside racing district from which dogs that have been given false names and descriptions had been brought. Further, the notice refers to "the past season's racing as having been characterised by this regrettable feature." What is even more important is that the disqualification of "Music," which is said to have attracted great interest at the time, had taken place within a month of the publication of the notice. All these circumstances lend some colour of probability to the suggestion that the notice was directed against the pursuers. If so, it certainly is capable of being construed as imputing an attempt to commit fraud to the persons who were responsible for entering "Music" in the New Year Powderhall Handicap. Indeed, for all that appears, the pursuers may have been the only persons that the defender had in his mind when he issued the notice; and if that were proved it might be accurately described in the words of the issue as being "of and concerning the pursuers." I shall accordingly allow an issue based upon the notice, but the pursuers must innuendo the paragraph of which they specially complain.—22nd June 1907.

Arbitration — Procedure — Appointment of Oversman—Failure of Arbiters to Agree—Jurisdiction of Court to Make Appointment — Arbitration (Scotland) Act 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 13), sect. 4.

This was a petition by the Glasgow Parish Council (Glasgow District Lunacy Board) for the appointment of an oversman in an arbitration between them and the respondents, who were the lessees of the minerals on lands belonging to the petitioners. The clause in the lease providing for arbitration was in the following terms:—"In case any disputes shall arise between the parties with regard to the import of this lease and regulations prescribed, or with regard to any question arising out of the agreement betwixt them, as to the minerals hereby let, which this lease does not sufficiently explain or as to which it is silent, every such dispute or misunderstanding shall be referred to two arbiters to be mutually chosen by the first and second parties; or in the case of the parties not agreeing on arbiters, by two arbiters to be named by the Judge Ordinary; and in case of the arbiters not agreeing in opinions, by an oversman to be chosen by the arbiters; and it is provided that the award or awards, interim and final, which may be pronounced shall be final and binding on both parties." The opinion of the Lord Ordinary, who granted the prayer of the petition, and appointed Mr John Chisholm, K.C., Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick and Selkirk, as oversman, sufficiently reports the case.

Lord Salvesen.—The petitioners are proprietors of certain lands, the minerals in which are at present worked by The United Collieries Co. Ltd., under a lease to which they have acquired right by various transmissions. Certain disputes have arisen as to the working of the minerals, which fall to be settled by arbitration in terms of the clause of the lease quoted in the answers. Each party accordingly nominated a mining engineer as his arbiter, and each of them accepted office. Before proceeding with the reference the two arbiters, in accordance with what has now become an almost universal practice in similar references, agreed to nominate Mr Dixon, M.E., as oversman. Mr Dixon at first accepted office, but afterwards withdrew his acceptance; and the arbiters have failed to agree on the nomination of any other oversman to take his place. The respondents explain that the difference between the parties is one of principle, the petitioners pressing for the appointment of a legal man and the respondents for that of a practical man as oversman. After some correspondence, Mr Gemmel, the respondents' arbiter, suggested that, as the arbiters had failed to agree upon an oversman, application should be made to the Court; and the present petition has accordingly been brought.

The respondents plead that the petition is incompetent, or at least premature. They contend that, under the clause in the lease which provides for arbitration, it is not competent for the Court to appoint an oversman until the arbiters have differed in opinion as to the merits. They say that, in the event of their agreeing, no oversman need ever be appointed; and that in that event it will be a hardship that the expenses of an unnecessary petition should be expenses in the arbitration which, in the event of their being unsuccessful, they might have to bear. The validity of this argument depends on the true construction of sect. 4 of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 1894, which is in these terms: "Unless the agreement of reference shall otherwise provide, arbiters shall have power to name an oversman on whom the reference shall be devolved in the event of their differing in opinion. . . . Should the arbiters fail to agree in the nomination of an oversman, the Court may, on the application of any party to the agreement, appoint an oversman." The former part of this clause is inapplicable here, because the arbiters are expressly empowered to choose an oversman; and it is conceded that the arbiters may also proceed to name an oversman before the reference commences. The propriety of their doing so was expressly decided in the case of Crawford (1858, 20 D. 488). It being further conceded that the arbiters have failed to agree in the nomination of an oversman, the section quoted seems to make it competent for the Court to appoint one; for I see no ground for limiting its powers under this section, in a way in which the powers of the arbiters themselves are not limited. The contention that this case falls under the proviso at the commencement of the section is, in my opinion, untenable; for although the reference cannot be devolved upon the oversman unless the arbiters differ in opinion, I do not find anything in the clause to prevent the arbiters making provision for the event, which is almost invariable, of their failing to come to an agreement on the merits.

As to the matter of expenses, these are not asked against the respondents except in the event of their opposing the petition. If the application is competent—as I find it to be—then it was quite proper to ask that the expense of nominating the oversman should be found to be expenses in the arbitration. Whether the respondents will have to pay this, will of course depend upon the results. It would, I think, be very unfortunate if it should be held that the Court could not appoint an oversman before the arbiters had actually differed in opinion; because it is now matter of daily practice, with a view to the ultimate saving of expense, that the oversman should sit along with the arbiters and hear the evidence, in case of the reference being devolved upon him.

As both the arbiters are men of practical experience, I concur with the petitioners that the oversman should be a gentleman with legal qualifications.—10*th July* 1907.

Revenue — Income Tax — Assessment — Income Tax Act 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sect. 60, Schedule A, No. 1, General Rule, and Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3 — Slaughterhouse, Property of Municipal Authority With Restricted Powers of Profit Earning, Assessed Under Schedule A, No. 1, General Rule.

Stated Case under the Taxes Management Act 1880.

This Case set forth as follows:—

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and for executing the Acts relating to the Inhabited House Duties for the county of Edinburgh, held at Edinburgh on the 18th day of October 1905;

The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of Edinburgh (hereinafter referred to as "the Corporation"), per Mr Robert Paton, their Chamberlain, appealed against an assessment made upon the Corporation, for the year ending 5th April 1905, of £91, 19s. of duty, being income tax at the rate of 1s. per pound on £1839, the net annual value for that year of premises at No. 119 Fountainbridge, Edinburgh.

The assessment was made under the Acts 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, sect. 60, schedule A, No. 1 General Rule; 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34, sect. 2; and 4 Edw. 7 cap. 7, sect. 7.

The Corporation claimed, as regards the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, to have the assessment made as in all previous years under No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A, and the Rules of Schedule D of that Act.

1. The following facts were admitted or proved:—

(a) The premises consist of slaughterhouses and houses accessory thereto. They are owned and occupied by the Corporation. They were erected by the Corporation under "The Edinburgh Slaughterhouses Act 1850" (13 and 14 Vict. cap. LXX.), which authorised the Corporation to provide public slaughterhouses for the city of Edinburgh, regulate their use, and charge the rents and dues therein set forth.

(b) The annual value of the premises, as appearing in the Valuation Roll for the City of Edinburgh for the year 1904–05, made up by the assessor appointed by the Magistrates of said city under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), is £2425. The Commissioners adopted that annual value for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts; and after making the deductions allowable under these Acts, fixed the net annual value of the premises at £1839. The Assessor is not an officer of Inland Revenue.

(c) The Corporation levy and take, as authorised by the Act of 1850, from every flesher to whom a booth or share of a booth in the slaughterhouses is allocated, over and above the dues on cattle slaughtered therein, a yearly rent, payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas. The booths are occupied in some cases solely by one flesher, in other cases by two fleshers, and in other cases by three fleshers. The rent of each booth is £8 per annum; and where a booth is occupied by more than one flesher, each of them pays a proportionate part of the rent of £8. The dues at present payable by a flesher renting a booth or share of a booth vary from one penny to sixpence per head of cattle.

The dues payable by a flesher using the slaughterhouses and not renting a booth or share of a booth are double the amount of the dues payable by a flesher renting a booth or share of a booth.

(d) The revenues derived from the slaughterhouses, including therein the dues on carcases brought into the city, and the dues on the sale of hides, skin and tallow, and the sums received for the blood, dung, and other refuse arising in the slaughterhouses, and all incidental revenue, are, as directed by the Act of 1850, employed (1) in defraying the necessary expenses of collection, management, and repairs, and all other annual burdens; and (2) in payment to the Corporation of a permanent annuity of £1000 (being interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum upon the capital sum of £20,000 advanced or borrowed by the Corporation for the erection and completion of the slaughterhouses); and any surplus of the revenuues, or any deficiency thereof, is, as directed by the Act of 1850, carried forward in the accounts until the first periodical investigation after the arising of such surplus or deficiency. The state of the accounts and of the slaughterhouses is investigated triennially, with the view of determining whether the dues at the rates then current shall be continued, or whether they shall be increased or diminished; and the Corporation may, if necessary, increase or diminish the dues from time to time, in order that the requisite income may be realised, taking into account any deficiency or surplus of revenues.

(e) For the year to 15th May 1905 the gross revenue, as detailed in the City Accounts, is, ... £4948 12 3

And the gross expenditure is . . . £4506 2 4

Deficiency of Revenue at beginning of year. 310 19 1

Surplus Revenue at close of year to 15th May 1905 . . . . £131 10 10

2. The Corporation contended:—

(1) That the slaughterhouses were assessable, not in respect of the annual value of the premises, but only in respect of the profits derived therefrom; and therefore that the assessment should have been made according to the rules of Schedule D of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, under No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A of that Act, as amended by sect. 8 of the Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. 36, the slaughterhouses being "concerns of the like nature" with those described in said Rule 3 (Adam v. Maughan, 1889, 27 S.L.R. 64, 2 Tax Cases 541; Webber v. Corporation of Glasgow, 1893, 30 S.L.R. 255, 3 Tax Cases 202). Under the Act of 1850 there are and can be no profits earned from the slaughterhouses over and above the said sum of £1000 payable annually to the Corporation.

(2) That if the slaughterhouses were assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A, the valuation of £2425 was excessive, and should be reduced to £1000—the amount of the annuity paid to the Corporation.

And (3) That the Assessor for the City of Edinburgh, not being an officer of Inland Revenue, the annual value of the slaughterhouses appearing in the Valuation Roll, made up by the Assessor, was not binding on the Commissioners (Menzies, 1878, 5 R. 531, 1 Tax Cases 148).

3. The Surveyor of Taxes (Mr Edward Harris) maintained:—

(1) That the slaughterhouses were capable of being let at an annual rent, and should be dealt with as ordinary trade premises, the annual value thereof being assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35; and the profits derived therefrom being assessable under Case 1 of Schedule D of that Act, on the three years' average, the annual value being deductible as a trade expense in arriving at the amount of the profits assessable under Schedule D.

(2) That the slaughterhouses, not being of the like nature with the concerns described in No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A, and not being specifically mentioned therein, were properly assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A.

And (3) That the fact that the Assessor for the City of Edinburgh was not an officer of Inland Revenue did not preclude the Commissioners from adopting, if they thought fit, for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, the valuation of the slaughterhouses made by the Assessor.

4. The Commissioners, upon a consideration of the facts and arguments submitted to them, were of opinion that the slaughterhouses were assessable by relation to the profits derived therefrom, in accordance with the provisions of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, and the Rules prescribed by Schedule D of that Act, and were not assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A.

The Commissioners accordingly sustained the appeal and vacated the assessment.

5. Whereupon the Surveyor of Taxes declared his dissatisfaction with the determination of the Appeal as being erroneous in point of law.

Argued for the Appellant: This was not a concern of a like nature to those enumerated in No. III., Rule 3, Schedule A. The essential feature of those concerns was their profit-earning capacity. The slaughterhouse was precluded by the terms of its constituting Act from earning profits (Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes, 1889, 17 R. 154; Ystradyfodwg Sewerage Board v. Benstead [1896], 1 K.B. 294, and [1907], 1 K.B. 490, at p. 498.

Argued for the Respondents: The utilisation of land in connection with the earning of profits was the distinguishing feature of the concerns enumerated in Rule 3. The slaughterhouse was a concern which possessed these features. It did in fact earn profits to the extent of £1000 per annum on which it had been hitherto assessed. It was not necessary that the profits should be unlimited. The position of gasworks, one of the enumerated concerns, was precisely similar to that of the slaughterhouse in this respect.

The Court reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to refuse the appeal and confirm the assessment.

Lord M'Laren.—The question in this case relates to the mode of assessment under which the Corporation of Edinburgh are to be assessed for income tax for the slaughterhouses which are the property of the Corporation.

The Surveyor of Taxes claims that these subjects should be assessed under Schedule A, No. 1 General Rule, which is the ordinary rule for the assessment of lands and heritages not falling under any special rule. The Corporation claims to have the assessment made under No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A and the rules of Schedule D of the principal Act, which by a later statute are made applicable.

The slaughterhouses and houses accessory thereto were erected by the Corporation under the Edinburgh Slaughterhouses Act 1850. The mode of occupation and the particulars of the revenue derived by the Corporation from the persons who make use of the slaughterhouses are set forth in the case and relative appendix, and it is not necessary to the explanation of the grounds of my opinion that I should enter into particulars on this subject. But I must direct attention to the provisions of the Act of Parliament which regulate the application of the revenue to be derived by the Corporation for the use of the slaughterhouses.

Under sects. 12 and 13 the Corporation is empowered to advance the capital required for the construction and equipment of these buildings, and for that purpose to borrow money on the security of the property to an extent not exceeding £20,000.

By sect. 21 the revenues derived from the slaughterhouses are to be employed, first, in defraying the necessary expenses of collection, management and repairs, including certain charges therein specified; secondly, in paying an annuity, originally at the rate of £7 10s. per cent., on the capital provided, but eventually reduced to £5 per cent.; and it is further provided that any surplus of the said revenues, after satisfying the foresaid purposes, or any deficiency thereof for such purposes, shall be carried forward in the said accounts until the first periodical investigation to be made after the arising of such surplus or deficiency.

The periodical investigation here referred to is the subject of sect. 23, and it is to be repeated at intervals of three years. Without entering into further detail, it may suffice to say that under the fifth head of this section the Magistrates and Council are to take into consideration the reports obtained by them, and to determine whether the dues on cattle shall be continued as formerly, or whether and to what extent the same shall be increased or diminished. Under sect. 24 there is a qualified appeal to the Sheriff. The Act gives no power to the Magistrates and Council to appropriate any part of the revenue of the slaughterhouses other than the annuity or interest on the capital provided; and it is perfectly clear that the slaughterhouses are intended to be self-supporting, but that the dues are to be so fixed that no permanent profit can be derived from them.

If it appears that a surplus has arisen in any triennial period after providing for annual outgoings and extraordinary repairs, if any, then the dues must, in accordance with the statute, be so fixed that this surplus shall be extinguished in subsequent years; and if there is a deficiency, this is to be made up by levying dues at a higher rate in subsequent years. The result of the administration prescribed by the statute is, as I conceive, that the undertaking is not carried on with a view to profit, and that there can be no perception of profits by anyone, although there may be an apparent profit on certain years which is to compensate the deficiency in the accounts of other years.

It appears to me that the undertaking carried on under such conditions cannot, in sound construction, be brought within the scope of the provisions of No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A.

If we put together the introductory part of No. III. and the Special Rule 3, the statutory provision will read as follows:—

"The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited . . . .; (3) of ironworks, gasworks, ... and other concerns of the like nature, from, or arising out of, any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, on the profits of the year preceding."

I have not quoted the enumeration of the different species of works contained in Rule 3, because in my view we do not need to consider whether slaughterhouses are concerns of the like nature with the works enumerated. One can never be quite sure as to the principle of an enactment in a taxing Act; but in this case I think the principle is reasonably clear, and it is that in the case of ironworks and the other works emunerated, which are carried on with a view to profit, it is impossible, or at least extremely difficult, to separate the profit derived from the use of the land from the profit derived from the mercantile undertaking carried on by means of the land or its produce, and therefore the two things are massed together and are assessed as a going concern. The supplementary part of No. III. directs that the duty is to be charged on the person, corporation, etc., "carrying on the concern," and the Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 8, directs that the assessment is to be made according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D of the principal Act. Now, if I am right in my conclusion that these slaughter-houses are not carried on with a view to profit, and that no profit in any true sense is made, the provisions of No. III., Rule 3, are inapplicable. But it does not follow that the subject is to escape taxation; because the only result of excluding No. III. and all its rules, is to put the subject into the category of property in the natural occupation of its owner who is not using it as a profit-yielding investment, and it is thus chargeable according to the General Rule No. 1 of Schedule A upon the rent "at which the same are wont to be let by the year."

Harris v. City of Edinburgh.

This is the principle of the decision of Mr Justice Walton in the case of the Ystradyfodwg Sewage Board (1906, 1 K. B. 308), where the learned judge considered it to be perfectly clear that the mode of assessment prescribed by No. III., Rule 3, of Schedule A could not be applied to undertakings that were not established or carried on with a view to profit. The contrary contention seems to have been abandoned in the later stage of the case reported in 1907, 1 K.B. 490, and subsequently affirmed in the House of Lords, because, if I rightly follow the report, the only question raised was whether a main sewer was assessable under General Rule No. 1, or was not assessable at all.

A separate point was made as to the amount of the assessment. I see no reason to doubt that the Inland Revenue Department is entitled to found on the valuation made under the Lands Valuation Act, although that valuation is not necessarily binding on them. No other valuation consistent with General Rule No. 1 is suggested in the case. The assessable income for the year 1904–1905 accordingly after making the deductions allowed under the Income Tax Acts, is £1839, and in my opinion the appeal should be allowed, and it should be found that the subjects are assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A upon a net annual value of £1839.

Lord Pearson.—I also am of opinion that the original assessment by the surveyor was right, and that the appeal must be sustained. It would be a singular and, as I think, an unexpected result, if the public slaughterhouses of the city were, in the circumstances disclosed to us, to be assessable to income tax under the rules of No. III. of Schedule A. I do not say that in no circumstances could a slaughterhouse be brought within the category of works specified in the third rule of No. III. But one thing is clear, that in all cases falling under that rule the charge is to be on the amount of yearly profits, calculated either on the year preceding, or on an average of a specified number of years. The undertakings, or "concerns" as the statute calls them, are regarded as going concerns, carried on for the purpose of earning profits. Of course it is always possible that even a concern to which the rule undoubtedly applies may in any given year or period of years earn no profit; in which case there will be nothing to assess. But I am unable to see how the rule can apply to a concern which not merely earns no profits, but which is not run for the purpose of profit, and which, moreover, being created by statute, is expressly debarred by its statute from earning anything which can really be called profit. That is the position of the Edinburgh City Slaughterhouses. They were built at the expense of the common good of the city at a cost of £20,000; and a perpetual annuity of £1000 a year is payable out of the slaughterhouse returns, to square the account. Beyond that, they are forbidden by statute to make a single penny of profit; and they are enjoined so to adjust their rates periodically as to secure this result. I cannot recognise such a concern as falling within No. III. of Schedule A; and the alternative must be that the subjects are assessable under No. 1 General Rule of Schedule A, which provides for an assessment on the annual value of lands, tenements, and hereditaments generally. How that annual value is to be arrived at in the particular case is another matter; but the Commissioners fixed the net annual value of the premises at £1839, which I presume will be allowed to stand for the year of assessment.

Parent and Child—Custody of Child—Child in Mother's Custody—Action of Separation Raised—Court Refused to Make Order in the Meantime—Guardianship of Infants Act 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), sect. 5.

Petition.

The petitioner craved the Court to find that he was entitled to the custody of his child, and to ordain his wife, the respondent, to deliver the child to him.

The petitioner stated:—

The petitioner was married to his wife on 1st August 1898. There is one child of the marriage—Robert Brydon—born 6th September 1902. The parties lived together in Edinburgh. Their domestic relations were of a satisfactory nature down to about the end of 1902, although even during that period friction arose from Mrs Brydon's frequent absences from home on visits to her parents. . . .

In July 1904 Mrs Brydon went off to Lilliesleaf without her husband's knowledge and consent. While there she consulted a lawyer in Hawick with a view to the arrangement of a separation from her husband. The petitioner thereupon consulted his present agents. Through their intervention a reconciliation was effected, and the relations between the parties continued satisfactory for about a couple of years. . . .

On or about 2nd October 1906 the petitioner, on returning from business, found that his wife had left home, taking the child with her, and carrying off numerous household furnishings, but without leaving any intimation as to where she had gone.

On 6th October 1906 the petitioner was served with a summons in the Small Debt Court at Edinburgh at the instance of "Mrs Elizabeth Little or Brydon, presently residing at 12 Guildhall Street, Dunfermline, 'for twelve weeks' aliment at the rate of 15s. per week,' pending judgment in an action of separation and aliment about to be raised in the Court of Session," as the summons bears. On 17th October 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Guy) allowed Mrs Brydon 10s. per week for a period of six weeks, and the amount was duly paid. At the same time the petitioner's agents informed the respondent's agent that they would accept service of the summons in the threatened action of separation and aliment, and requested that the boy should be handed over to his father's custody. After the expiry of a period of about twelve weeks, during which no action was taken by the respondent, the petitioner visited Crossford on Saturday, 29th December 1906, in the hope of being able to obtain delivery of his child. The boy, however, was not persuaded to accompany his father, and still remains in his mother's keeping.

Though several months have since elapsed, the threatened action of separation and aliment has not yet been brought into Court.

The petitioner is anxious to have the custody of the said child of the marriage. He is in a position to maintain it, and to provide for it in every way.

The respondent stated:—

Admitted that the petitioner and respondent were married on 1st August 1898, and that there is one surviving child of the marriage—a son—who was born on 6th September 1902. Admitted that prior to 1902 friction arose between the spouses. The causes of such friction assigned by the petitioner are denied, and explained that it was entirely due to the petitioner's intemperate habits, and to the way in which he neglected and ill-treated the petitioner, as hereafter described.

Admitted that in July 1904 the respondent went to her parents' house at Lilliesleaf, that while there she consulted a solicitor regarding a separation from the petitioner, and that a reconciliation was ultimately effected. Explained that the respondent's actions were due to the petitioner's intemperance and ill-treatment, and that she returned to him on his promising to become teetotal, which promise he did not keep. . . . . Admitted that . . . . on 7th October 1906 she had again to leave him in consequence of his conduct.

Admitted that she thereafter raised an action against the petitioner for aliment and obtained a decree, and that the aliment was paid. Admitted that the respondent intimated she was to raise an action of separation and aliment. Explained that such an action is now in process of being raised. Admitted that the petitioner visited Crossford in December 1906. Explained that he never asked the respondent to return to him.

Brydon v. Brydon.

Quoad ultra, the statements in the petition are denied. Explained that immediately after marriage the petitioner began to be very intemperate in his habits, and to spend his evenings away from home, returning in a state of intoxication. While in that condition he lost all power of self-control, used abusive language to the respondent, and threatened her with personal violence. His conduct grew worse in the early part of 1904, when time and again when he came home at night the respondent had to take refuge with her child in a neighbour's house. On one occasion he was only prevented from striking the respondent by a friend who accompanied him holding him back. It was in these circumstances that the respondent left him and went to Lilliesleaf. As a condition of her returning to him the petitioner promised to become teetotal, but he only kept his promise for a few months, when his conduct became worse than ever. Even when the respondent's parents were living in the house, the respondent had to ask the neighbours to come in and restrain her husband from violence. The petitioner's misconduct again culminated after the respondent returned from Dunfermline. On 1st October 1906 he came home about midnight much the worse of drink, and continued for nearly two hours to use abusive and threatening language to the respondent. He threatened to strike her more than once, and told her to leave the house and take her child and belongings with her. The respondent was afraid of the safety of herself and her child, and accordingly left the house next morning.

It would be detrimental both to the physical and moral welfare of the child to return home to his father. He is a delicate boy, subject to recurrent attacks of croup, and requires constant attention and fresh air. These necessities the petitioner, apart from his habits, cannot give the child, as he is at his work all day. In any case his habits of intemperance have become so confirmed, and his conduct when intoxicated is so outrageous, that he is utterly unfit to be the guardian of a child of such tender years, and it would endanger the moral upbringing, the health, and even the safety of the boy, to entrust him to the petitioner's care.

Argued for Petitioner: The answers contained no averment of cruelty on the part of the petitioner. The wife had been guilty of inexcusable delay in bringing her action of separation. The action was only raised on 5th July, when the petition was coming on for hearing. She had left her husband's house on 2nd October 1906, and she ought to have raised her action at once. The child was almost five years of age, and would have to go to school in September. He should go from his father's house. The old law of the father's right to the custody of his children was not abolished by the Guardianship of Infants Act. The father's house was his proper residence (M'Kellar v. M'Kellar, 1898, 25 R. 883, per Lord M'Laren; Reid v. Reid, 1901, 3 F. 330; Rintoul v. Rintoul, 1898, 1 F. 22; A. C. v. B. C., 1902, 5 F. 108; Sleigh v. Sleigh, 1893, 30 S.L.R. 272, per Lord M'Laren).

2nd Div. Brydon v. Brydon.

Argued for Respondent: Looking to the Guardianship of Infants Act it could not be questioned that the respondent had stated relevant answers to the petition. Pending enquiry into the facts the custody should not be changed. The action of separation would proceed, and enquiry would most conveniently take place in that action. If there was delay in taking action the delay was on the part of the husband. The present petition was not presented until 7th June. It was not the business of the wife to take action against her husband. If he was wrongfully deprived of the custody, it was his duty to claim it. Rintoul was disposed of on relevancy. This case was more like Reid, where the wife had been ordered to leave the house.

The Court sisted the petition hoc statu.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I do not think that this is a case in which we should pronounce such an order as the petitioner asks for. We have a statement by the respondent's counsel that he has advised his client as to proceeding with the action of separation and aliment, and that the action will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. In these circumstances I think that it would be wrong to do anything on this petition in the meantime.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree.

Lord Low.—I concur.—13*th July* 1907.

105. M'Laren's Trustees v. M'Laren.

I. Succession — Trust Disposition and Settlement — Accretion — Gift to Members of Family — Death of One Member—Terms of Settlement Held Not to Imply Accretion to Other Members—Paxton's Trs., 1886, 13 R. 1191, Followed.

II. Succession — Trust Disposition and Settlement — Vesting — Vesting Subject to Defeasance—Clause Declaring Period of Vesting—Held (Diss. Lord Low) Vesting Suspended till Period Named.

Special Case.

John M'Laren died in 1900, leaving a trust settlement, the third purpose whereof was in the following terms:—

(Third) Subject to the foregoing provisions and payment of any further provisions or legacies I may hereafter make or leave, I appoint my trustees to hold the free residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, above conveyed, and to apply the same for behoof of my sister Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine, wife of John M'Alpine, Grafton Square, Glasgow, and her children or such of them as shall be alive at my death, in manner following; That is to say, the said residue and remainder of my said estate shall be divided into eight equal parts or shares, and the said Mrs Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine shall be entitled to one of said shares, and her children, John M'Alpine, Robert M'Alpine, Elizabeth M'Alpine, and Grace M'Alpine shall each be entitled to one of said shares, and the said Mary Hastie M'Alpine and Agnes Roy M'Alpine shall be entitled equally between them to three of said shares, and that over and above the provisions in their favour contained in article second hereof; but providing and declaring that by acceptance of the provisions herein contained the said Mary Hastie M'Alpine and Agnes Roy M'Alpine shall not be entitled to make any claim after my death against my estate for wages for any period prior to my death; and my trustees shall, to such extent as the provisions contained in article second hereof will permit, pay or make over to the children of my said sister Mrs Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine, his or her share in the case of sons on their respectively attaining or having attained the age of twenty-five years, and in the case of daughters on their attaining or having attained said age or being married, whichever of said events shall first happen, but said provisions of residue in favour of the children of my said sister shall not vest until they respectively attain the said age, or being daughters respectively attain said age or be married; and I provide and declare that, in case any of said children shall predecease me or die before his or her share of residue becomes vested, leaving lawful issue alive at the period for vesting, such issue shall be entitled, and that equally amongst them if more than one, to the share or respective shares which his, her, or their parent would have taken if alive, and the same shall become payable and transferable to them at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after such share or shares would have become payable to their parent or parents; and providing and declaring that it shall be in the power of my trustees, if they see fit, to apply the free proceeds or income of the presumptive share of any child or lawful issue foresaid, or so much thereof as my trustees may consider proper, towards his or her maintenance, education, or advancement in life.

Mary Hastie M'Alpine, one of the truster's nieces named in the settlement, died in 1902, intestate, unmarried, and under the age of twenty-five. This special case was presented to determine the rights of parties in the share destined to her. The share in question was heritable.

The second party was the heir at law of the truster. He maintained and argued that Mary Hastie M'Alpine had died without taking any vested right in her share, and that her share did not accresce to her mother and brothers and sisters, but fell into intestacy, and now belonged to him.

The fourth parties were Mary Hastie M'Alpine's brothers and sisters, and the third party was her mother. They maintained and argued that their sister's share accresced to them. Alternatively, that their sister's share vested in her a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance in the event of her leaving issue, and that it now fell to them as her intestate heirs.

The following cases were referred to: (1) on question of accretion: Paxton's Trs., 1886, 13 R. 1191; Muir's Trs., 1889, 16 R. 954; Menzies, 1898, 1 F. 128; Roberts, 1903, 5 F. 541; (2) on question of vesting: Young, 1862, 4 Macq. 314; Popham's Trs., 1883, 10 R. 888; Simpson, 1873, L.R. 16 Eq. 208; Williams, 1871, 6 Ch. Ap. 782; Snell's Trs., 1877, 4 R. 709.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—

First.—Does the share of the trust estate destined under the settlement to the deceased Mary Hastie M'Alpine fall to be dealt with as intestate succession of the truster John M'Laren; and if so, does it now fall to the second party as heir in heritage of the truster, or equally to him and the third party as sole next of kin of the truster?

OR,

Second.—Does the said share of the trust estate accresce to and fall to be divided amongst the parties hereto of the third and fourth parts according to their respective interests in the residue of the estate, to the exclusion of all others claiming an interest in said residue?

Third.—Did the said share of the trust estate vest in the said Mary Hastie M'Alpine on the death of the truster, and does it now fall to be dealt with as her intestate succession?

The Court (diss. Lord Low) answered the first part of the first question in the affirmative, and the remaining portion of the first question, and the second and third questions, all in the negative

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—Mr John M'Laren, grocer, Dunblane, died in 1900, leaving heritable estate of the net value of £1850 and moveable estate (after deduction of debts) amounting to about £200. He was survived by an only brother who was his heir in heritage. This brother and an only sister, Mrs M'Alpine, were the testator's sole next of kin. Mrs M'Alpine had a family of two sons and four daughters who all survived the testator, and these persons (Mrs M'Alpine and her children) were the sole beneficiaries under Mr M'Laren's trust disposition and settlement. The event which has led to this special case being presented is that one of them, Mary Hastie M'Alpine, died in 1902, without having been married, and before her attainment of the age of twenty-five years, which was expressly declared by the testator, in the case of each of his residuary legatees, to be the date before which their provisions of residue should not vest.

The clause dealing with residue begins with appointing the trustees "to hold the free residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, above conveyed, and to apply the same for behoof of my sister Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine, wife of John M'Alpine, Grafton Square, Glasgow, and her children or such of them as shall be alive at my death in manner following; that is to say, the said residue and remainder of my said estate shall be divided into eight equal parts or shares, and the said Mrs Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine shall be entitled to one of said shares, and her children John M'Alpine, Robert M'Alpine, Elizabeth M'Alpine, and Grace M'Alpine, shall each be entitled to one of said shares; and the said Mary Hastie M'Alpine and Agnes Roy M'Alpine shall be entitled equally between them to three of said shares, and that over and above the provisions in their favour contained in article second hereof." I pause here to say that the second article of the deed had provided that these two ladies and the survivor of them should have the use and occupation, while unmarried, of such one of the testator's dwelling-houses as his trustees might think proper, and also the use and enjoyment of the household furnishings in his usual dwelling-house at the time of his death, with some other directions applicable to the marriage or death of either; and the testator's reason for this preferential treatment of these two sisters is indicated by a provision which immediately follows the words quoted above, declaring that, by acceptance of the provision therein contained, the two sisters were not to be entitled to make any claim against his estate for wages for any period prior to his death.

The clause of residue then goes on to provide that "my trustees shall, to such extent as the provisions contained in article second hereof will permit, pay or make over to the children of my said sister, Mrs Mary M'Laren or M'Alpine, his or her share, in the case of sons on their respectively attaining or having attained the age of twenty-five years; and in the case of daughters, on their attaining or having attained the age of twenty-five years, or being married, whichever of said events shall first happen, but said provisions of residue in favour of the children of my said sister shall not vest until they respectively attain said age or be married; and I provide and declare that, in case any of said children shall predecease me, or die before his or her share of residue becomes vested, leaving lawful issue alive at the period for vesting, such issue shall be entitled, and that equally amongst them if more than one, to the share or respective shares which his, her, or their parent would have taken if alive." The deed goes on to give power to the trustees, if they see fit, to apply the free proceeds or income of the "presumptive" share of any child or lawful issue foresaid, or so much thereof as they might consider proper, towards his or her maintenance, education, or advancement in life. These are, I think, all the provisions of the deed which need be referred to.

On the construction of the clause of residue

2nd Div.
M'Laren's Trustees v. M'Laren.
Lord Stormonth-Darling.

two main questions seem to arise—one being the question on which the special case was originally brought, viz., as between intestacy of the truster so far as the share destined to Mary M'Alpine is concerned, and accretion of that share to the surviving legatees; and the other being the question which the M'Alpine family, with consent of the heir of the truster, were allowed to add to the case, viz., whether vesting in Mary M'Alpine took place a morte testatoris, with the result that the consequent intestacy is on her part and not on the part of the truster. It was not maintained by counsel for the third party (Mrs M'Alpine) that, if there was intestacy of the truster, any but the heir was entitled, and so she made common cause with her children who contended for accretion.

The first of these questions is governed, in my opinion, by the leading case of Paxton's Trs. v. Cowie, 13 R. 1191. The bequest here, though one of residue, is in favour of seven persons named; they are thus within the description of "a plurality of persons," each of whom is "entitled to his own share and no more"; and the case is to my mind a fortiori of Paxton's Trs., because the share which each is to receive, instead of being an equal share with the others, is, in the case of two of them, a larger share than the others. It was argued by Mr Cochran-Patrick that the surviving beneficiaries were a class. I do not know that this is of any particular significance where the beneficiaries are named, because, after all, the question in a case of this kind must always be whether the testator intended a joint bequest or a series of separate bequests, and it is only as favouring the former of these inferences that the fact of their being a class is important. But in my opinion it is vain to contend that a body of beneficiaries which includes a mother and six children can rightly be described as "a class," even apart from the consideration that the shares allotted to them are of varying amount. The cases cited in which the rule of Paxton's Trs. has not been followed are all outside the rule as carefully defined by Lord President Inglis. Muir's Trs., 16 R. 954, fell outside the rule because, as explained by the same learned judge, "the first condition for the application of that rule is that the persons to whom the legacy is left must either be named or sufficiently described for identification," and "it cannot therefore apply to a class of persons of unascertained number." The rule may also be controlled or avoided by the use of other expressions by the testator importing an intention that there shall be accretion in the event of the predecease of one or more of the legatees. Now, Menzies, 1898, 1 F. 128, and Roberts' Trs. v. Roberts, 1903, 5 F. 541, were both cases in which the Court found other expressions in the will indicating that the testator meant that the bequest should be a joint one. I can find no such expressions in this case, and therefore I think there was no accretion.

There remains the other question raised by the added query whether Mary M'Alpine's share of residue vested in her a morte testatoris and now falls to be dealt with as her intestate succession. I quite admit that courts of law are always anxious to avoid such a construction of a will, particularly a will purporting to dispose of a man's whole estate, as will lead to even partial intestacy. I also admit that it is a probable enough conjecture that this testator preferred his nephew and nieces to his heir at law, whom he never mentions throughout his settlement. Still, all presumptions and conjectures must yield to a testator's plain words, and what I cannot get over in this case is that Mr M'Laren not only provided that the shares of residue should be paid to the daughters of Mrs M'Alpine on their attaining the age of twenty-five or being married, whichever of these events should first happen, but expressly declared that their provisions should not vest until they respectively should attain that age or be married. No doubt, when you read on, you find that the testator provides for the issue of any of them taking their parent's share in the event of the parent predeceasing either the testator himself or the period of vesting, and that there is no other contingency expressly provided for. But that is hardly a reason for inferring that the testator had nothing else in view when he postponed vesting—or, in other words, that his postponement of vesting was not, to some extent at least, personal to the legatee. When the question of vesting is a matter of legal construction from the whole terms of a will, such inferences may be permissible, but not, in my judgment, when the testator has himself prescribed the time of vesting and has thus shown that he draws a distinction between vesting and payment. The fact that he makes this distinction seems to me entirely to supersede the necessity of considering those cases in which vesting has been held to mean only what has been termed "vesting in possession," that is to say, the actual enjoyment rather than the obtaining of a right. That the latter—the obtaining of the right as distinguished from its actual enjoyment—is the ordinary meaning of the word "vesting," is fully conceded by Lord Cranworth in the well-known case of Young v. Robertson (1862, 4 Macq. 314) to which reference was made. I see no reason to doubt that this testator used the word in its ordinary sense, else why did he not content himself with the positive direction to his trustees to pay and make over the shares of daughters on marriage or attainment of twenty-five, and why did he think it necessary to add the negative direction that the shares should "not vest until" the occurence of one or other of these events? Either this addition meant what I say it means (and what it usually means), or it was mere surplusage, and had no meaning at all. To say that when he directed that the provisions of daughters should not vest till marriage or the attainment of twenty-five, he meant that vesting should take place a morte, subject only to defeasance in the event of their afterwards having children, looks to me very like a contradiction in terms.

Ingenious as the argument for the M'Alpine family is, I think it lays too much stress on the testator's supposed reasons for what he did and pays too little heed to his express words, whatever his reason may have been. I have always understood that when a testator makes positive directions as to vesting, a court of construction is relieved from the necessity of speculating about his reasons, and has only the duty of interpreting his directions in their ordinary and natural sense so as to give, if at all possible, full value to every clause in his will. If such a mode of interpretation should have the effect of letting in the heir at law, then the heir has at least this to say for himself, that though there may be a certain presumption against intestacy, there is no presumption in favour of disinherison. But however that may be, I base my opinion on the simple ground that the words of the clause about vesting distinguish between vesting and payment, and therefore can only be read as importing a suspensive and not a resolutive condition.

I am accordingly in favour of answering the first part of the first question in the affirmative, the second question in the negative, and the third question also in the negative. Owing to the concession of the third party made at the bar, it is unnecessary to answer the second part of the first question.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion that the share of the residue of the trust estate destined to the deceased Mary Hastie M'Alpine did not accresce to her surviving brother and sisters, but that if no right to the share vested in her it became intestate succession of the truster. So much, I think, is quite clear, and I agree with what has been said by Lord Stormonth-Darling on that point. But the question whether any right to the share vested in Mary Hastie M'Alpine appears to me to be one of novelty and difficulty, upon which I fear that I have the misfortune to have arrived at a different conclusion from that favoured by your Lordships.

It is said that right to the share could not possibly have vested in her because it is expressly declared that the provisions to the children of the truster's sister "shall not vest" until the period of payment. Of course I recognise the force of that consideration, but as I read the settlement the declaration in regard to vesting is, if read as meaning that the children should take no right of any kind to their shares until the period of payment, inconsistent both with the initial gift and with all the other provisions of the settlement.

The residuary clause practically includes the whole of the truster's estate, and the way in which he deals with it is this. He appoints his trustees to "hold" the residue, "and to apply the same for behoof of" his sister Mrs M'Alpine "and her children, or such of them as may be alive at my death, in manner following." The truster then directs his estate to be divided into eight equal parts or shares, and declares that Mrs M'Alpine "shall be entitled" to one share, that four of her children (who are named) "shall each be entitled" to one share, and that the remaining two children, the deceased Mary Hastie M'Alpine and Agnes M'Alpine, "shall be entitled equally between them" to three shares.

It is plain that the division of the estate into eight shares was to take place at the truster's death. It is also plain that Mrs M'Alpine was to be entitled to immediate payment of her share. It is true that there is no express provision to that effect, but it is implied, because the postponement of the period of payment is limited to the shares destined to the children.

It is therefore beyond dispute that when the truster declares that, at his death, Mrs M'Alpine "shall be entitled" to one share, he means that she is then to take an immediate right to that share, and presumably when he uses precisely the same language in regard to the children's shares, he means the same thing—that is to say, that each child shall take an immediate right to his or her share, although such right may be subject to a resolutive condition and payment of the share may be postponed. I should have come to the same conclusion if the children alone had been beneficiaries, because for a testator to say that at his death a certain person is to be entitled to a certain sum, means, according to the ordinary use of the word, that that person is then to have right to the sum, and such a declaration is inconsistent with the idea that unless the beneficiary survives an event which may or may not occur, he shall have no right whatever. I need hardly add that the fact that there is no direct gift to the children, but only a direction to the trustees, is immaterial, because it is the nature of the right, and not the form in which it is given, which is to be regarded.

If the declaration in regard to vesting be left out of view, the clauses of the settlement following the initial gift point in the same direction.

There is, first, a declaration to the effect that the provisions in favour of Mary Hastie M'Alpine and Agnes M'Alpine should be in full of any claim they might have for wages. Mr Craigie founded on that clause as showing that an immediate right was intended to be given, on the ground that a provision to which these beneficiaries might never have a right was not an appropriate or natural way of satisfying a claim for immediate payment of a sum of money in name of wages. That is a legitimate enough observation, but I think that the most that can be said in regard to the clause is that it is not inconsistent with the idea that an immediate gift was given.

There is then a direction to the trustees to pay the children's provisions, in the case of sons upon their attaining twenty-five years of age, and in the case of daughters upon their attaining that age or being married. I need hardly say that that direction is in no way inconsistent with vesting a morte testatoris.

Omitting in the meantime the declaration as to vesting, the next clause is a declaration that in the event of a child dying "before his or her share of the residue becomes vested, leaving lawful issue alive at the period of vesting," such issue shall take their parent's share, which shall be payable to them at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the share would have become payable to their parent.

The first remark which I have to make upon that clause is that its object plainly is to protect the right of possible issue of a child dying before the period of payment leaving issue; and I think that it may be regarded as settled that the effect of such a clause is not to prevent vesting a morte in the child, but to make the right of that child defeasible in the event of his or her predeceasing the term of payment leaving issue.

I have further to remark upon the clause that the only case provided for is the death of a child before the period of payment survived by issue who in turn survive the period of payment. There is no provision for the case of a child dying before the period of payment without leaving issue, or of such issue also dying before the period of payment. It is certain that the testator did not intend to die intestate in either of those events, or indeed in any event, and it is difficult to believe that when the conveyancer who prepared the settlement was providing for the event of a child dying leaving issue, it never occurred to him that a child might die without leaving issue, although that was the more probable event of the two. Still more unlikely is it that when he provided that issue of a child predeceasing the period of payment should only take if they themselves survived that period, he should not have considered the question what was to become of the share if neither child nor issue survived. I think, therefore, that the inference is that these events were regarded as having been already provided for, which would be the case if the children took right a morte testatoris, subject only to divestiture in the event of their death before the period of payment leaving issue who survived the period of payment.

The last clause which has any bearing upon the present question declares—"That it shall be in the power of my trustees, if they see fit, to apply the free proceeds or income of the presumptive share of any child or lawful issue foresaid, or so much thereof as my trustees may consider proper towards his or her maintenance, education, or advancement in life."

I think that a direction or a discretion to trustees to apply the income of a sum destined to a beneficiary for that beneficiary's behoof prior to the period of payment, raises a presumption, more or less strong, that a right to the sum has already vested in the beneficiary. It was said that that was not so in the present case, because the share of a child is described as being "presumptive." That description is perhaps more appropriate to a provision which has not vested to any extent, than to one which has vested subject to divestiture; but I think that a provision which has not vested absolutely and indefeasibly may fairly enough be described as "presumptive."

Now if the settlement had contained nothing more than the clauses which I have been considering, it seems to me that it would have been clear beyond dispute that the shares destined to the children of Mrs M'Alpine vested in them a morte testatoris, subject to the condition protecting the right of possible issue.

But there is the declaration as to vesting. It forms part of the clause postponing payment until the attainment of twenty-five years of age, or marriage, and is in these terms: "But said provisions of residue in favour of the children of my said sister shall not vest until they respectively attain the said age, or, being daughters, respectively attain said age or be married."

That is unequivocally a declaration that vesting shall not take place until the period of payment; and if the words "shall not vest" must be read as being equivalent to "shall not take any right whatever," then it seems to me that there is repugnancy between the declaration and the rest of the settlement, and especially what I have called the initial gift. I have already given my reasons for thinking that that gift, according to the natural meaning of the language used, imports that an immediate right is given to the children in the shares allotted to them respectively, and that the other clauses (apart from the declaration as to vesting) are not only consistent with that view, but are inconsistent with any other view, except in so far as the children's right is made subject to a resolutive condition in favour of issue.

In these circumstances it seems to me that if the declaration is capable of being construed so as to make it consistent with the rest of the settlement, that construction must be adopted. But is it capable of construction? It was argued with great force that the word "vest" when used in a testamentary settlement has come to have a definite meaning, and that when a testator says that a provision shall not vest until a certain date or event, he means that the beneficiary shall take no right at all until that date or event occurs. That is undoubtedly true in the general case, but still I think that the word "vest" may be used in a more limited sense, and may be so construed if to do otherwise would be inconsistent with the initial gift or direction to the trustees, and with the general scheme of the settlement. That appears to me to have been recognised in the House of Lords in the case of Young v. Robertson (4 Macq. 314). Lord Westbury assented to the view that the word "vest," when used in reference to a share of an estate destined to a beneficiary, might, according to the context, mean either that the right to the share had become absolute, or that the share had come into possession, these being the opposing views for which the appellants and respondents respectively contended. In the same case Lord Cranworth said: "The word 'vest' is of at least ambiguous import"; and then he went on to say that "by long usage 'vesting' is ordinarily understood in contradistinction to the not having obtained anything like an absolute and indefeasible right—it is the having obtained the absolute indefeasible right."

Now, in this case substitute for the word "vest" what Lord Cranworth says it has by long usage come to mean, namely, the words "obtain an absolute and indefeasible right," and the difficulty is solved, because a declaration that the children should not obtain an absolute and indefeasible right until the period of payment, would be quite consistent with the rest of the settlement, by which the children are given a right to their shares a morte, defeasible, however, in the event of a child dying prior to the period of payment leaving issue.

It seems to me that that construction gives effect to all the clauses in the settlement, and can be adopted without doing violence to the language used. I prefer such a construction to one which makes the testator say first that the children shall be entitled to their shares at his death, and then that they shall not be entitled to them unless and until they attain the age of twenty-five. The latter construction in my judgment not only makes the testator contradict himself, but upsets the whole scheme of his settlement, and gives a result which he certainly never contemplated.

My opinion therefore is that the third question should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Ardwall.—In this case the share of the trust estate of the deceased John M'Laren destined to the deceased Mary Hastie M'Alpine is claimed by the third parties on two grounds—first, that on the death of Mary Hastie M'Alpine her share accresced to the other legatees mentioned in the third purpose of the trust along with her; and second, that the said share vested in the said Mary Hastie M'Alpine a morte testatoris, and falls to be dealt with as part of her intestate succession. On the other hand, the said share, which is heritage, is claimed as intestate succession of the said deceased John M'Laren by the second party, Robert M'Laren, as his heir in heritage.

I am of opinion that the claim of the heir-at-law should be given effect to.

With regard to the claim of the third and fourth parties founded on the doctrine of accretion, I am of opinion that the principle of the case of Paxton (13 R. 1191) applies, and that in point of fact this is a stronger case for not applying the doctrine of accretion than Paxton's. In Paxton's case there was a more homogeneous class consisting of brothers and sisters of the testator; here, on the other hand, the legatees consist of a mother and her children, being a sister and certain nephews and nieces of the testator, who are all named. But, further, these legatees do not take equal shares of the residue. On the contrary, two of them take each a share and a half, one of these two being the deceased Mary Hastie M'Alpine whose one and a half share is in dispute, and counsel for the fourth parties did not seem very certain whether, in the case of accretion being held to apply, the other more favoured niece of the testator should get one and a half shares of the lapsed share or only one. In short, the whole clause, I think, shows that what was given by the testator was a distinct, separate gift to each of the individual legatees named, and there are no indications to show that in the event of any of the legatees dying before payment of her share that share was intended to be divided among the remaining legatees.

With regard to the second ground on which the fourth parties found their claim to Mary Hastie M'Alpine's share, namely, that it vested in her a morte testatoris and that they are now entitled to it as her next of kin along with her father in the proportions fixed by the Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855, I am of opinion that on this ground also the claim is not well founded. The deed itself expressly provides that the provisions of residue in favour of the nieces and nephews of the testator should not vest until they respectively attain the age of twenty-five, or in the case of daughters respectively attain the said age or be married; and even with regard to issue of nephews and nieces of the testator this somewhat remarkable provision is made: "And I provide and declare that in case any of said children shall predecease me or die before his or her share of residue becomes vested, leaving lawful issue alive at the period for vesting, such issue shall be entitled, and that equally amongst them if more than one, to the share or respective shares which his, her, or their parent would have taken if alive, and the same shall become payable and transferable to them at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after such share or shares would have become payable to their parent or parents; and providing and declaring that it shall be in the power of my trustees, if they see fit, to apply the free proceeds or income of the presumptive share of any child or lawful issue foresaid or so much thereof as my trustees may consider proper, towards his or her maintenance, education, or advancement in life." From this last clause it appears that, supposing one of the nephews of the testator had married at twenty and had left a child, yet if that child had died before his father, if alive, would have attained twenty-five, he would not take what is called in the clause just quoted his "presumptive share." I think accordingly that the testator intended that there should be no vesting of their shares in any of his nephews and nieces till they had attained the age of twenty-five, or, in the case of daughters, had been married before that age.

M'Laren's Trustees v. M'Laren.
Lord Ardwall.

It is suggested, however, that the above declaration as to the date of vesting was only intended to protect the interests of issue; but, looking to the clause I have quoted, I do not think this can be successfully maintained.

But it is said that this declaration is not to be given effect to because it appears from the original words of gift in the deed that, in point of law and on a sound construction of the deed, the shares of residue vested a morte testatoris subject to defeasance. I cannot assent to this argument. The trustees are directed to hold the free residue and remainder of the truster's estate, and to apply the same for behoof of his sister and her children, or such of them as shall be alive at his death, in "manner following." And when we come to the "manner following" we find in gremio of the directions to his trustees this declaration about the postponement of vesting. Now, when there is in a deed a clear declaration as to the period of vesting, and all that can be put against that is a doubtful inference from certain other expressions in the deed, I think the plain words of the deed must be preferred, unless it is clear that by adopting that course the true intention of the testator would be defeated, which I do not think can be said in the present case. Had it not been for the direct declarations above quoted as to the period of vesting, I think that this case would have fallen within the rule of Snell's Trs., 4 R. 709; but here, again, I hold that the clearly expressed intention of the testator must prevail over an artificial though useful rule of construction, the introduction of which can only be defended in cases where, unless it is applied, the intentions of the truster cannot be given due effect to.

I therefore am of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative as regards its first alternative, and in the negative as regards its second alternative, and that the second and third questions should be answered in the negative.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Knowing that there was a difference of opinion in the Court as to the proper decision to be given in this case, I have considered it the more anxiously, but have in the end come to be of opinion that the view taken by the majority of your Lordships is that which should prevail. Agreeing as I do with what Lord Stormonth-Darling has said upon the question of gift to a class, I add nothing upon that matter. As regards the question of intestacy I am entirely in sympathy with the view that where a testator seems to indicate in his will an intention to deal with his whole estate, that intention must be given effect to, wherever it is possible to do so consistently with the provisions of the will itself. But on the other hand, the Court must not seek to make a will effectual to the uttermost according to a supposed intention, where no intention has been so expressed in detail as to be reasonably—or rather indeed necessarily—taken from the words used. In this case I find no such declaration of intention which must be set aside if the second question put to the Court is to be answered in the negative. On the contrary it appears to me that it can only be by a straining of words out of their ordinary accepted and intelligible sense, if vesting a morte testatoris is to be held expressed as an intention of the deceased. I go so far with Lord Low as to hold that there may be cases in which the mere use of the word "vest" as applied to a particular event might not be held to be of crucial importance, but that can only be where there are other expressions in the will of such clear import as would create a plain repugnancy if the word "vest" were held to dominate in its ordinary sense. In this case there is nothing to indicate that the testator, in declaring that certain provisions should not vest until the occurrence of a certain event, meant something different, such as "pay over" or "put into possession." The direction is distinct and positive and must, I think, receive effect, even although the consequence be, contrary to what the testator may have had in his mind, to throw part of his estate into intestacy in the circumstances which have occurred. To hold otherwise would be, in my opinion, to make a different will for the testator than that which he has in fact made—in short, not to carry out an intention which can be spelled out of his deed, but to make a new deed to express what he may have wished to express, but has not really expressed by the writing under his hand, which the Court has to construe.—16*th July* 1907.

106. Lawson's Executors v. Watson, et e contra.

Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sects 3 (1) and (2), and 20—"Inchoate Instrument"—Evidence—Debt—Document Having All Requisites of Bill of Exchange Except Signature of Drawer Found in Deceased's Repositories—Held that the Document, Though Not a Bill of Exchange, Could Be Sued On as a Voucher of Debt.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Orkney at Kirkwall.

The executors of Charles Lawson, Mains of Cults, Aberdeen, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Kirkwall against Robert Watson, horse proprietor, Kirkwall, for payment of £182, made up, inter alia, of the sums of £60 contained in a document dated 11th March 1901, quoted in Lord M'Laren's opinion, and of £32 contained in a bill dated 1st November 1901, drawn by Lawson and accepted by Watson.

Following on the raising of this action, Watson raised a counter-action against Lawson's executors concluding for £61, 10s., being the balance brought out as due to him by Lawson's executors in a statement produced in the action. The actions were conjoined, and proof was led before the Sheriff-Substitute (Harvey).

The document dated 11th March 1901, which was in the form of a bill of exchange for £60 blank in the drawer's name, and the bill for £32 dated 1st November 1901, were found in Lawson's repositories after his death. Watson admitted his liability for the bill for £32. As regards the inchoate bill for £60 he admitted on record and in the proof that he signed it, but explained that in July 1901 he paid Lawson £28 to account of said bill, and thereafter granted the bill for £32 in settlement of the balance unpaid of the bill for £60.

The Sheriff-Substitute issued an interlocutor finding, inter alia, that the instrument dated 11th March 1901 was not filled up so as to be converted into a bill within a reasonable time, and was not enforceable against Watson, and in the whole matter granting decree against Lawson's executors for £50.

On appeal the Sheriff (M'Lennan) issued the following interlocutor:—

Recals the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute: Finds in fact . . . . (3) that the defender Watson admits liability to the pursuers for the sum of £32 due under the bill dated 1st November 1901; (4) that on 11th March 1901 the defender signed his name as acceptor on the stamped bill paper, and delivered it to the said Charles Lawson, authorising him to fill it up as a bill in his own favour for £60, being the agreed on hire of a stallion "Lambton Lad," then hired by the defender from the said Charles Lawson for the season 1901; (5) that in accordance with the authority then given the said document was, on or about the said date, filled up as a bill for £60 in the terms which it now bears by the witness Charles Lawson, junior, but that the said Charles Lawson, senior, died on 5th May 1905, without having inserted his name as drawer of the said bill, and that the said bill has been produced in judgment without any name of a drawer being inserted therein; (6) finds in law that the said document constitutes a valid voucher for a debt of £60 incurred by the defender to the late Charles Lawson, and that the defender has failed to prove that the said sum or any part thereof has been paid by him to the said Charles Lawson or to the pursuers as his representatives; . . . . decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £10.

Note.—Three points were argued under the appeal—(1) whether the document, No. 13 of process, constitutes a valid and subsisting document of debt for the sum of £60, due by the defender Watson to the pursuers, the executors of the late Charles Lawson. The Sheriff-Substitute has decided that the document is inoperative. . . .

The first point raises a question of difficulty, on which there appears to be no recent authority. It is admitted by the defender in his evidence that on 11th March 1901 he visited the late Charles Lawson at his farm at Mains of Cults, Aberdeenshire, and arranged with him to hire for the season Mr Lawson's stallion "Lambton Lad" at a hire of £60, and that on the same date he signed the bill stamp No. 13 of process, which he asserts was then blank, except that the sum of £60 may have been written on it, and delivered the bill stamp to Mr Lawson. He does not, either on record (see Condescendence 2) or in his evidence, dispute that the blank acceptance was handed to Mr Lawson for the purpose of being filled up as a bill for £60; and from the evidence of Charles Lawson, junior, the son of the late Mr Lawson, it appears that the document was filled up in his handwriting. It is in these terms [His Lordship read the document].

There appears to be no room for doubt that the document was filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given; but although Mr Lawson survived until 5th May 1905, he never inserted his name as drawer. The pursuers, his executors, have not inserted their names as drawers prior to raising the action, and the question is whether the document in its present state constitutes an enforceable document of debt.

The learned Sheriff-Substitute has decided against its validity, on the ground that it was not filled up so as to be converted into a bill within a reasonable time, and he relies on sub-sect. 2 of the 20th section of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. It appears to me that the sub-section does not apply to the case, for the reason that it deals exclusively with instruments which have been completed, and not with the effect of an instrument left, like the present, in an incomplete condition. I think it must be conceded that the document in question does not comply with the definition of a bill of exchange given in sect. 3 of the Act, in respect that it does not require the person to whom it is addressed to pay a sum of money "to or to the order of a specified person or to bearer."

Extra Division.

Lawson's Executors v. Watson. et e contra.

Accordingly, whatever be the proper solution of the difficulty, I do not think that the ratio of the Sheriff-Substitute is satisfactory. The real question is, whether the document, not being a valid bill of exchange, is enforceable as a voucher of debt.

Now, if this question is to be decided in accordance with the Scots authorities prior to the Bills of Exchange Act, there cannot, in my judgment, be room for doubt regarding the answer. By a series of decisions, whereof the clearest is Macdonald's Trs. v. Ranken, 13th June 1817, F.C., action has been held competent on a bill found in the repositories of a defunct blank in the drawer's name. I have carefully examined the Session Papers in this case, and find that the bill, when sued upon and produced in judgment by the trustees of the defunct, was in the same condition as the bill in the present case—that is to say, no name at all was inserted as drawer. The Session Papers also disclose that the Lord Ordinary (Lord Alloway) sustained the validity of the document as a voucher of debt, in respect that the subscription of the defender to the document was not denied, and that the action was an ordinary action brought for constitution of a debt. In his note he relied on the cases of Drummond v. Drummond's Creditors, 1785, M. 1445; Hare v. Geddes, 1786, M. 1446; and Fair v. Cranston, 1801, M. 1677, as having completely altered the older practice of not sustaining action on a bill when the drawer's name was left blank. He added: "There seems to be as little doubt in this case, as in the case of Fair, that Glencoe (i.e. Macdonald of Glencoe, the pursuer's author) was meant to be the drawer of the bill, and the representers have not even denied that fact. . . . According to the doctrine laid down in Fair's case, therefore, there is nothing to prevent the pursuers, as standing in the place of Glencoe, to have subscribed the bill or to bring an action, as has been done in the present case." The Faculty Collection Report bears that the Court ultimately allowed a condescendence as to the state of accounts between the parties; but from the Session Papers I infer that this condescendence related to a plea of compensation founded by the defenders on bills granted in their favour by Macdonald. In addition to the case of Macdonald's Trs., and the authorities mentioned in Lord Alloway's note, I may also refer to Ogilvie v. Moss, 1804, M. "Bills of Exchange," Appendix No. 17; Fairlie v. Brown, 1834, 3 S. 5 (N. E. 4)—(a case in which the Session Papers show that the bills when sued upon were still blank in the drawer's name); Lord Ivory's Note to Erskine's Institutes, III. 2, 28; and Dickson on Evidence (Grierson's edition), sect. 807. From these authorities it appears that the statement of Erskine (Institutes, III. 2, 28) puts the matter too strictly.

The case of Elde v. Marshall (1830), 9 S. 133, I have omitted from the authorities relied on, because the bills which were there produced blank in the drawer's name were prescribed, and the debt was held to be proved by holograph letters of the acceptor. There being in the present case no doubt that the document was signed by the defender, and that it was intended to constitute a document of debt for £60 in favour of the late Mr Lawson, it appears to me that upon the authorities above cited it must be sustained, unless rendered nugatory by the Bills of Exchange Act. The common law in England appears to have been different, and prior to the Act action was denied on an acceptance bearing to be "payable to my order," where the drawer's signature had not been inserted (M'Call v. Taylor, 34 L.J. C.P. 365; Stoessiger v. S.-E. Rly. Co., 1854, 3 E. & B. 549, and other authorities quoted in Byles on Bills, 16th Ed., page 99). Since the Bills of Exchange Act it has been held in England that endorsees of a bill had no right of action against the acceptor where the drawer had omitted to sign his name as drawer, although he had endorsed the bill, and although it expressly bore to be drawn to his order (South Wales and Carnock Chase Coal Co. v. Underwood & Son, 1899, 15 T.L.R. 157). Probably a similar judgment would have been given in our Courts, seeing that the action was based upon the document as a complete and negotiable bill, and not merely as a voucher of a debt between debtor and creditor. But once it is conceded, as I think it must be, that the document here in question does not constitute a bill of exchange in any proper sense, there appears to be no reason, notwithstanding the statute, why its validity as a voucher of debt should not be regulated by the common law of Scotland. In England, as well as in Scotland, an I.O.U. is enforceable by the person to whom it is delivered, although it does not bear to be addressed to any person (Curtis v. Richards, 1840, 1 Manning and Granger (C.P.), 46; Macpherson v. Munro, 1854, 16 D. 612).

If I am right in holding the document valid as a voucher of debt, I think it follows that its discharge can be proved only by the writ or oath of the creditor (Robertson v. Thomson, 1900, 3 F. 5; Thiem's Trs. v. Collie, 1899, 1 F. 764). In Robertson's case it was held that no alteration of the requirement for a written discharge in the case of a bill is introduced by the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act. Further, that section must be inapplicable if the document is not a valid bill. Under a mistaken view regarding the scope of that section, however, it appears that parole evidence of payment to account of the £60 has in the present case been allowed without objection; and, this being so, there is authority (Simpson v. Stewart, 1875, 2 R. 673; Kerr's Trs. v. Ker, 1883, 11 R. 108) that the proof led must be considered notwithstanding its incompetency. The proof led, however, consists solely of the statement of the defender, supported to a limited extent by his wife, to the effect that in July 1901, when he returned the stallion to Mr Lawson, he paid £28 to account without receiving a receipt. This evidence seems to me quite inadequate as proof of payment to account of a money obligation constituted by writing. The defender asserts that he gave the bill No. 14 of process for £32, which he admits to be due for the balance of the hire of the stallion. That bill was not granted till 1st November 1901, more than three months after the alleged payment; and, if his story be correct, it is curious that he did not demand delivery of the original document for £60 when he granted the £32 bill, particularly as he had no reason at the time to suppose that the original document had not been completed by Mr Lawson's signature as drawer. It is no doubt curious that the pursuers are unable to explain in respect of what other transactions the £32 bill was given, but there were admittedly a number of transactions between the parties, and I do not think that there is any onus upon the pursuers to explain the ground of indebtedness for which an admitted bill was given. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute's judgment must be altered on this question of the £60.

Watson appealed and argued: (1) The document dated 11th March 1901 was not a bill, because it was not signed by the drawer (Bills of Exchange Act 1882, sect. 3), and had not been completed in terms of sect. 20 of the Act. Consequently no action could be founded on the document as a bill. (2) Neither could it be sued on as a valid voucher of debt. The authorities quoted by the Sheriff showed that prior to 1882 it could have been, but the Bills of Exchange Act had altered that. Prior to the Act of 1882 a document blank in the drawer's name could be described as a bill, since the Act it could not (Erskine's Inst., III. 2, 28; Act 1696, ch. 25). The old cases quoted by the Sheriff were distinguished from this case, because in them the documents were holograph of the drawer, and it was clear from the documents who the drawer was. (3) It was true that the appellant admitted on record and in the proof that he had signed the document, but the admission was qualified by his averment that he had satisfied the debt. An admission must be taken subject to the qualification under which it was made (Kerr's Trs. v. Ker, etc., 1883, 11 R. 108). The admission was thus a proof of the constitution of the debt, not that it was resting owing. The evidence sufficed to show that the debt had been satisfied by payment of £28 and the substitution of the bill for £32 for the balance.

Argued for Respondents: (1) The document was a promissory note (Bills of Exchange Act 1882, sect. 5 (1) and (2)), and could be sued on as such unless it was proved by competent evidence to have been discharged. (2) Admitting that the document was not a bill, it could still be sued on as a valid voucher of debt. The action was really for payment of an account, one item of which was £60 vouched by this document. The old authorities quoted by the Sheriff thus ruled this case, as in them the documents were not treated as bills but as vouchers of debt. (2) Parole evidence of the payment of this item should not have been allowed (Thiem's Trs. v. Collie, 1899, 1 F. 764; Robertson v. Thomson, 1900, 3 F. 5), and should not be looked at. If the evidence was looked at it did not prove that the debt had been discharged.

The Court affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

Lord M'Laren.—I cannot say that the result of the argument has been to displace the inference that the Sheriff's interlocutor was the true solution of these cases. The two actions relate to transactions between the two parties, Mr Lawson, now deceased, farmer in Aberdeen, and Mr Watson, who is a horse proprietor and carter. The parties seem to have trusted each other, and not to have been particular as to vouchers or as to the forms of their accounts. The result of the action, brought in order to clear up the accounts, was to settle all outstanding disputes except what relates to a document in the form of a bill for £60, dated 11th March 1901, which was in this form:—

"£60 stg.

"Mains of Cults, Aberdeen,
"11th March 1901.

"On demand pay to me or my order within the North of Scotland Bank at Aberdeen the sum of Sixty pounds stg. for value received, in season of Shire stallion.

"Robert O. Watson.

"Mr R. O. Watson,
"Broad Street,
"Kirkwall, Orkney."

Now, from the date and address it may naturally be inferred that this bill was to be drawn by the deceased Mr Lawson on Mr Watson. It is addressed to Mr Watson, and is signed by Mr Watson personally as acceptor, but it wants the signature of the drawer.

Along with this we have to consider another bill of later date for £32, 1st November 1901, in the following terms. [His Lordship read the terms of the bill.]

The result of the judgment of the Sheriff is that effect is given to both these documents. No exception is taken to the bill for £32, but exception is taken to the bill for £60, on the ground that it cannot be founded on as an obligatory document after Mr Lawson's death. But then Mr Watson depones that he made a payment to Mr Lawson in July 1901 of £28, and that he granted the bill of 1st November 1901 for the unpaid balance of the £60. The effect of this would be to displace the £60 bill by a kind of novatio.

It is impossible to treat the £60 bill as a bill of exchange, because it is not drawn by anyone, and does not bear to be payable to anyone. Notwithstanding some authority to the contrary, I venture to doubt whether executors could supply the signature of a drawer after his death. But then the Sheriff has allowed the document effect as an acknowledgment of debt, on the authority of certain cases quoted in his note. The principle of these cases is that, by whatever name you may design an uncompleted bill, the two facts that the debtor has put his signature on a document of this description, and that the document is found in the repositories of the creditor, constitute it, if not an acknowledgment, at all events a proof of debt. It was contended by Mr Crabb Watt that, at least in two of these cases, there were other distinct means of satisfying the Court that the document was intended to be completed by the drawer's signature; in this case the only evidence is that it is found in the deceased's repositories, and that it is stated in gremio to be for value therein described. But in two cases, Macdonald's Trs. v. Ranken, 13th June 1817, F.C., and Fair v. Cranston, 1801, M. 1677, which do not turn upon specialties, it was distinctly laid down that the debtor's acceptance would be evidence of his indebtedness although the drawer had not also signed.

Accepting the authority of these decisions, we are not left to depend entirely for proof of the indebtedness on this inchoate bill for £60, because we have the facts that Mr Lawson had yearly transactions with Mr Watson, that bills were frequently used between the parties, and that an action of accounting between them has been found necessary. These facts are sufficient for the application of the principle of Macdonald's case.

Mr Watson has attempted to displace this liability by evidence of payment. No answer could be more satisfactory, if payment were proved. The only evidence of payment is that of the debtor, partially corroborated by that of his wife. For Mr Watson it was contended that this evidence could not now be rejected as incompetent, because no objection was taken to it at the proof. Now, I am not prepared to hold that absence of objection would exclude a party from founding on the incompetency or insufficiency of evidence on appeal. An appeal from the Sheriff Court brings up the whole case, just as in the old process of advocation; and, while it might be competent to found on such evidence with regard to collateral matters, I cannot hold the evidence of the debtor to be in itself good evidence of payment, nor is it sufficiently corroborated.

There being, then, an unexplained acknowledgment of indebtedness found in the creditor's possession, and there being no proof of payment, it follows, in my view, that the sum of £60 must be allowed as an item of credit to the executors of Mr Lawson, and that the judgment of the Sheriff is right and must be affirmed.

Lord Pearson.—This is a small case as regards amount, but it raises a question of some nicety. I agree that the Sheriff is right. There are two questions in the case: first, as to the uncompleted bill for £60; and secondly, as to the alleged payment of £28 by the appellant to Lawson.

As regards the bill, it is practically admitted that it is not a bill within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. It could have been made a valid bill; all that was required was the signature of the drawer. He died without signing it; and though it is an open question whether his executors could have signed it after his death, they did not do so, and the question does not arise.

But though not a bill, this document is sued on as a voucher of debt. A number of authorities were quoted showing that in such a case an incomplete bill may be so used, not having all the attributes of a bill, but yet having the capacity of being used in an ordinary action as proof of the existence of a debt. It is said that the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 has changed all that, but I am not of that opinion. It is clear from the authorities referred to that down to 1882 a document such as this was a good ground for suing and recovering a sum of money. The best authority is perhaps Macdonald's Trs. v. Ranken, 13th June 1817, F.C. There the question was whether a document of this nature found in the repositories of the deceased blank in the drawer's name could be sued on in an ordinary action for debt. This question was regarded as so well settled that the Court would not order answers to the petition against the Lord Ordinary's judgment sustaining the action, lest it should be conceived they had a doubt on the point.

There is, however, a second point in the case. It is said that even if the document can be sued on, the debt therein has been paid or satisfied, first, by the payment of £28 in cash, and secondly, by the substitution of another bill for £32 for the balance. I agree with the Sheriff that the payment of £28 has not been competently proved. As to the £32 bill, there is some difficulty on each side, for the debtor did not get up the £60 bill in exchange for it, while the creditor is unable to point out any other transaction to which this £32 bill can be attributed. But I think that here also the Sheriff has come to a right conclusion.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with your Lordships that the Sheriff's judgment should be affirmed. These two conjoined actions practically resolve themselves into an action of accounting between the parties. There are now two points in dispute in the accounting; first, as to a sum of £60 alleged to be contained in a document which we may call an incomplete bill; and second, as to whether the appellant is entitled to credit for an alleged payment of £28.

It is said that the document in which the £60 is contained is not a bill, and I agree that this is so. It was found in the repositories of Mr Lawson after his death; it was not originally signed by the drawer, and was never completed in terms of sect. 20 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. Now, I do not think that the Act of 1882 innovates on the old law of Scotland so as to render the principles established in the numerous decisions quoted by the Sheriff inapplicable or obsolete. The Sheriff-Substitute apparently holds that a change was made by sect. 20 of the Act. But sect. 20 merely gives power to the holder of an inchoate bill to fill it up and complete it. But that is a power which was always possessed by the holder of a bill, as is clear from the passage in the case of Macdonald's Trs. v. Ranken, 13th June 1817, F.C., quoted by the Sheriff as follows:—"There seems to be as little doubt in this case as in the case of Fair that Glencoe (i.e. Macdonald of Glencoe, the pursuer's author) was meant to be the drawer of the bill, and the representatives have not even denied that fact. . . . According to the doctrine laid down in Fair's case, therefore, there is nothing to prevent the pursuers, as standing in the place of Glencoe, to have subscribed the bill, or to bring an action, as has been done in the present case." Accordingly, under the law as it stood before the Bills Act of 1882, it was open to any holder of a bill in which the drawer's name was blank to fill it up, and sect. 20 does not alter the law at all.

The question, then, is:—Is there anything to prevent the document in this case being regarded as a document of debt? The authorities make it clear that there is not. Mr Crabb Watt endeavoured to differentiate this case from the cases quoted, by urging that in them it clearly appeared who the drawer of the document was. But in this case also there is no doubt who was in right of the obligation, and whose name should have been inserted as the drawer. In the first place the document is stamped and is addressed "Mains of Cults, Aberdeen," Mr Lawson's home; and then it bears in gremio to be "for value received, in season of Shire stallion." That being so, it is vain to say that the identification of the drawer is not perfectly established by the document itself. Then Mr Watt says the document is not holograph; but in the case of such a document as this, that can make no difference. I therefore think that Lawson's executors are entitled to credit for the £60 contained in the document in question, because that document, although not a bill in the sense of the above-mentioned Act, is valid as an acknowledgment of debt.

As to the alleged part payment of £28, I am of opinion that it has not been proved. I quite agree with what has been said by your Lordship, that we must not scan too critically proofs coming up from the Sheriff Court. But where a proof prout de jure is allowed in an action of accounting, it does not follow that each item must not be proved habili modo. The evidence of the debtor, partially corroborated by his wife, is not habile to prove payment or part payment of such a debt as is here in question. I therefore am of opinion that Watson is not entitled to credit for the said sum.

On the whole matter, I agree with your Lordships that the Sheriff's interlocutor should be affirmed.—12*th July* 1907.

Robertson v. Robertson and Others.

Succession—Collation—Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 25), sect. 2—"Heir in Heritage"—Heirs Portioners—Heirs in Heritage, Being Representatives in Heritage of Heirs Portioners of Deceased, but Not Being Next of Kin or Parties Entitled to Take by Representation under sect. 1 of the Act—Right to Collate and Claim Share of Moveables.

This was a multiplepoinding relating to the succession to Miss Ann Stewart, who died intestate on 25th March 1905, leaving heritable and moveable property.

The table on the following page shews the relationship to the said Miss Ann Stewart of the persons entitled to her succession. In the table the word "predeceased" refers to predecease of her. The letter H marks her heirs in heritage, the letter K her next of kin, and the letter C those persons who, without being heirs in heritage or in moveables, were admitted to a share of the mixed estate under sect. 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855.

The following statement of the facts of the case is taken from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

"The succession in question here is to Miss Ann Stewart, who died intestate on 25th March 1905, leaving heritable and moveable property.

"The heritage descends through three aunts, sisters of her father, who would, had they survived the intestate, have been her heirs portioners. Each stirps is therefore entitled to one-third of the heritage.

"The three aunts were: 1, Mrs Robertson, whose heir in heritage is her eldest son, John Robertson; 2, Mrs Dow, whose heirs in heritage are (1) her grandson, John Aitken, as representing his mother, Mrs Annie Dow or Aitken, (2) her daughter, Mrs Janet Dow or Scott, (3) her granddaughter, Margaret Methven, as representing her mother, Mrs Mary Dow or Methven; and (4) her daughter, Mrs Christina Dow or Gillies; and 3, Mrs Stewart, whose heir in heritage is her grandson, Ewan C. Stewart, son of her only son, Donald Stewart.

"The next of kin of the intestate are, 1, the said John Robertson; 2, his sister, Mrs Robertson; 3, the said Mrs Elizabeth Dow or Scott; 4, the said Mrs Christina Dow or Gillies; 5, Mrs Mary Stewart or Drummond; and 6, Mrs Elizabeth Stewart or Dow, both daughters of the said Mrs Stewart.

"There are thus two groups of heirs in heritage, the first composed of the three individuals who are heirs in heritage and are also next of kin; the second composed of John Aitken, Margaret Methven, and Ewan C. Stewart, who are heirs in heritage but are not next of kin. The question raised is whether there is here a right of collation to the effect of entitling the heirs in heritage, including those who are not, as well as those who are, next of kin, to collate, to the effect that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, will be divided into one-ninth shares."

There were also three persons—Mrs Robertson, Mrs Mary Stewart or Drummond, and Mrs Elizabeth Stewart or Dow—who were next of kin but not heirs in heritage.

The Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855, section 1, enacts:—"In all cases of intestate moveable succession in Scotland accruing after the passing of this Act, where any person who had he surdeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate had he survived such intestate, his child, being the heir in heritage of such intestate, shall be entitled to collate the heritage to the effect of claiming for himself alone if there be no other issue of the predeceaser, or for himself and the other issue of the predeceaser if there be such other issue, the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the predeceaser upon collation if he had survived the intestate; and daughters of the predeceaser being heirs portioners of the intestate shall be entitled to collate to the like effect; and where in the case aforesaid the heir shall not collate, his brothers and sisters and their descendants in their place shall have right to a share of the moveable estate equal in vived the intestate would have been among his next of kin, shall have predeceased such intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in the place of such person, and the issue of any such child or children, or of any descendant of such child or children who may in like manner have predeceased the intestate, shall come in the place of his or their parent predeceasing, and shall respectively have right to the share of the moveable estate of the intestate to which the parent of such child or children or of such issue if he had survived the intestate would have been entitled; provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters' descendants, and that the surviving next of kin of the intestate claiming the office of executor shall have exclusive right thereto in preference to the children or other descendants of any predeceasing next of kin, but that such children or descendants shall be entitled to confirmation when no next of kin shall compete for said office."

Sect. 2 enacts:—"When the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate had he survived such intestate, his child, being the heir in heritage of such intestate, shall be entitled to collate the heritage to the effect of claiming for himself alone if there be no other issue of the predeceaser, or for himself and the other issue of the predeceaser if there be such other issue, the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the predeceaser upon collation if he had survived the intestate; and daughters of the predeceaser being heirs portioners of the intestate shall be entitled to collate to the like effect; and where in the case aforesaid the heir shall not collate, his brothers and sisters and their descendants in their place shall have right to a share of the moveable estate equal in amount to the excess in value over the value of the heritage of such share of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, as their predeceasing parent, had he survived the intestate, would have taken on collation."

The Lord Ordinary found:—(1) That the claimants are the children of persons who, had they survived the intestate Miss Ann Stewart, would have been her heirs in heritage, and are therefore entitled to collate in terms of section 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855; (2) that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, is divisible into one-ninth shares falling to, 1, the said John Robertson; 2, his sister, Mrs Robertson; 3, John Aitken, his sister Mrs Margaret C. Aitken or Urquhart, and his brothers Robert Aitken and William Aitken; 4, the said Mrs Janet Dow or Scott; 5, the said Margaret Methven; 6, the said Mrs Christina Dow or Gillies; 7, the said Ewan C. Stewart, his sisters Mrs Jessie Stewart or Wells and Mrs Christina Stewart or Campbell, and his brother John D. Stewart; 8, Mrs Mary Stewart or Drummond; and 9, Mrs Elizabeth Stewart or Dow, both daughters of the said Mrs Stewart; and (3) that each of the one-ninth shares which would have fallen to Mrs Annie Dow or Aitken and Donald Stewart had they survived the intestate, fall to be divided in terms of section 2 of the Act.

Lord Mackenzie [after the narrative given above].—It is contended on the one hand that the decision in Jamieson v. Walker (1896, 23 R. 547) in terms applies to the present case. It was there decided that the only daughter of an uncle of the intestate being his heir in heritage was entitled, under section 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855, to call upon the next of kin to collate, although in consequence of the proviso in section 1, that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' descendants, she would not have been entitled under that section to a share of the moveable estate. It was maintained, on the other hand, by Mr Christie, counsel for Mrs Scott, who is both one of the heirs in heritage and one of the next of kin, that Jamieson does not in terms decide the present case, and he contended that the heirs in heritage here who are not next of kin, have no right to share in the moveables. His argument was that in Jamieson the question arose in regard to a proper heir in heritage, but here in regard to heirs portioners; and that the expression the heir in heritage in sect. 2 should not be extended so as to include heirs portioners. Attention was directed in the course of the argument to the considerations which were urged in Jamieson's case against the view taken by the Court of the relation of section 2 to section 1. I do not think, however, that I can go back in any way upon what was there decided. Accordingly I must take it that section 1 and section 2 deal with separate matters, and are intended to effect changes in the law distinct from each other. Section 2 was there held to be a substantive provision which introduced the right of an heir in heritage who was not one of the next of kin to the benefit of collation.

The question is whether "the heir in heritage" includes heirs portioners. It was argued that heirs portioners in the proper sense of the term means the class that takes through females, but that in a looser sense the term is used to denote females who take through a male. As regards proper heirs portioners under the law as it existed prior to 1855, the question of collation was excluded, or rather it was unnecessary to consider it, because the heirs portioners were also all of them executors. This is referred to in Anstruther v. Anstruther (1836, 14 S. 272, at p. 292). It was impossible there could be collation because the succession did not divide into separate channels. The case of Riccart (1720, M. 2378) is an illustration of this. As regards heirs portioners, using the term in what was termed in argument the looser sense, there might be room for applying a principle which would have the same effect as collation. The succession might devolve on heirs portioners who were not the sole next of kin. The Scotstarvet case (Balfour v. Scott, 1787, M. 2379) is an illustration of this. Under Mr Scott's settlement his heritage went to the elder daughter of his brother. He was also survived by children of his sister. It was held that the niece who took the heritage was not entitled to any part of the executry of her uncle without collating the heritable estate. The reason was that she was not, as was the case in Rickart, competing with heirs portioners only, but with other next of kin.

It was in the present case argued that section 2 of the Act of 1855 did make provision for the latter class of heirs portioners in that part of the clause which provides that "daughters of the predeceaser, being heirs portioners of the intestate, shall be entitled to collate," but made no express provision for the event of the predecease, not of one individual, the heir in heritage, but of several individuals, who are heirs portioners. Stress was laid on the fact that, if heirs portioners in the proper sense of the term were admitted, then the class who might be entitled to come in and share the moveables with the next of kin might be increased to an extent never contemplated by the judgment in Jamieson. In point of fact that is so. The question, however, is whether, standing the judgment in Jamieson, the term heir in heritage can be limited so as to exclude heirs portioners. I do not think it can, and I refer to the opinion of the Lord President in Turner and Others (1869, 8 Macph. 222). In that case it was held that one of the heirs portioners of the intestate was not entitled to take a share of the moveable estate as one of the next of kin without collation. No doubt in that case section 1 of the Act did not apply, because none of the next of kin had predeceased. On the question, however, whether "heir in heritage" includes "heirs portioners" in a question of collation arising at common law, the Lord President says: "In that event the common law says quite unmistakably that the heirs in heritage, whether the heir be a single heir, or whether they be heirs portioners, cannot take a share of the moveable estate along with the other next of kin without collating the heritage. I do not think it is suggested that that rule does not apply equally to heirs portioners as to a single heir."

The Court declared in Jamieson's case that the right of collation, existing at common law, should be extended so that when the person who would have been heir in heritage of an intestate, predeceased the intestate, his child (being the heir in heritage of the intestate) should have the same right to collate which his parent would have had had he survived. The opinion above quoted in Turner's case is sufficient, I think, to warrant the conclusion that the necessary consequence of the decision in Jamieson is that the whole of the heirs in heritage here are entitled to collate.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie.

Robertson v. Robertson and Others.

I understand that they all wish to do so, and that it is therefore desired that a finding should be pronounced to the above effect. In the view taken, the subsidiary questions argued do not arise. The case of Innes v. Coghill (1897, 25 R. 23) lays down the rule for applying the principle. —25*th June* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire.

This was an action at the instance of William Morton & Co., Lace Manufacturers, Newmilns, against Muir Brothers & Co., Lace Manufacturers there, concluding for interdict against the defenders from using for their own behoof in the manufacture of lace curtains and curtain nets, the cards in their possession made from designs belonging to the pursuers, and from selling curtains and curtain nets made from said designs.

Proof was led before the Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie), the import of which, and the facts of the case, sufficiently appear from Lord M'Laren's Opinion.

The Sheriff-Substitute issued the following interlocutor:

Finds (1) that the pursuers and defenders are lace manufacturers at Newmilns; (2) that for some years the pursuers were in the habit of employing the firm of Robert Muir, lace manufacturer, to manufacture curtains and curtain nets to their order, and that designs for that purpose were supplied to the said firm of Robert Muir; (3) that from these designs so supplied by the pursuers the said firm of Robert Muir had cards punched as a necessary process in the manufacture of said curtains and curtain nets; (4) that the designs for curtains and curtain nets enumerated in the prayer of the petition were so supplied by the pursuers, and were their property; that orders were given at various dates for curtains and curtain nets to be made from these designs, and that the cards therein mentioned were made from these designs; (5) that the contract between the pursuers and the said Robert Muir was constituted by letters giving orders for certain quantities of curtains and curtain nets, under reference to the custom of trade hereinafter explained, and also by verbal communications by the managing partner of the pursuers' firm to the manager of the said firm of Robert Muir; (6) that Nos. 33/1/6/7 of process are orders given respectively on 2nd May, 7th June and 5th August 1904; (7) that in giving said orders the pursuers' managing partner drew the attention of the manager of the firm of Robert Muir to the fact that they were only to be used for their (the pursuers') orders, and that the said managing partner replied that he quite understood that; (8) that the district in which the pursuers' manufactory is situated, and which is referred to in the evidence as "The Irvine Valley," is an important centre of the lace curtain manufacturing industry; (9) that it is proved that in that district there prevails a custom of trade to the effect that when designs are handed, as above, by one manufacturer to another for the purpose of having curtains made from them, there is an implied understanding that curtains from these designs are not to be made or sold by the second manufacturers, except to the orders of the first, or with his express consent; (10) that in Nottingham, which is also an important centre of this industry, the custom of trade to this effect is not so well defined, but that it is not wholly inconsistent with the above understanding; (11) that said custom of trade or understanding was known to both the pursuers and the firm of Robert Muir, and that it formed an implied condition of the contracts between them, entered into as above; (12) that the estates of the said Robert Muir were sequestrated on 14th November 1904, and Alexander Mitchell, chartered accountant, Glasgow, was appointed trustee thereon; (13) that the said Alexander Mitchell had carried on the business of the said firm for the period from 3rd September 1903 to 26th July 1904; (14) that on 15th March 1905 the factory belonging to the estates of the said Robert Muir, known as the Annabank Factory, was exposed to public roup in terms of the Articles and Conditions of Roup and Sale (No. 12 of process), and that the said factory was purchased by the defenders, with entry as at 31st March 1905; (15)

that by the tenth clause of said Articles and Conditions of Roup and Sale, it is provided that the purchaser of said factory should have the option, within fourteen days after the date of sale, to purchase and take over at mutual valuation the stock of cards in or about the said factory, whether in actual use at the date of entry or not, including, inter alia, such as might fall to be dealt with under an agreement between Messrs Heyman & Alexander, manufacturers, Stoney Street, Nottingham, and Samuel Ross, manufacturer, Newmilns, then sole trustee of the said Robert Muir, dated 4th and 5th June 1896, or under any other similar agreement with them or any other person, and that, if the purchaser should elect to take over and purchase said cards, he should only be entitled to use the same subject to his implementing the obligations undertaken by, or incumbent on, the second party to said agreement, or his successors, in relation to said cards, or under any other similar agreement in connection with said cards, or any of them; (16) that the said agreement with Messrs Heyman & Alexander is No. 42 of process, and that the second party thereto agreed not to manufacture any goods according to designs supplied to them by the said Heyman & Alexander (the first party thereto) except to the order of the first party, and not to show or communicate or deliver such designs or anything used in the manufacture of such goods to any other person, and on the other hand the first party agreed not to have goods manufactured from any designs supplied to the second party by any manufacturer other than the second party; (17) that the agreement between the pursuers' firm and the said Robert Muir, with regard to the designs and cards mentioned in the prayer of the petition, including the condition referred to by the pursuers' managing director in conversation with the manager of the said firm of Robert Muir, above referred to, which condition was implied by the custom of trade in the circumstances, constituted a "similar agreement" within the meaning of the said tenth clause of the Articles of Roup and Sale; (18) that said condition implied by the custom of trade was known both to the said Alexander Mitchell and the defenders; (19) that the defenders purchased the whole stock of cards from the said Alexander Mitchell and paid for the same; (20) finds that since purchasing the said stock of cards, the defenders on receiving a cancelling order from the pursuers for certain goods then on order, on 22nd March 1905, wrote to them the letter, No. 5 of process, in which they say: "We have a number of your patterns here, and assuming they are worthless, we propose destroying them"; (21) that the pursuers replied through Mr Coubrough, their salesman, that defenders were not to destroy the cards, to which they agreed; (22) that in the month of April following, some negotiations took place for a repeat order, but the parties did not agree as to terms; (23) that in the following month it came to the pursuers' knowledge that the defenders were manufacturing and putting on the market curtains made from some of the cards mentioned in the prayer of the petition, otherwise than to their order, and that the goods so manufactured were being offered at lower prices than those charged by them; (24) that the defenders assert a right to so manufacture goods from said cards, and have intimated their intention of continuing to do so. Finds in law that the rights acquired by the defenders in the said cards by the said sale from the trustee were subject to the implied condition constituted by the said custom of trade, and that the pursuers have a right and title to interdict the defenders as craved. Therefore repels the defences and grants interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition.

The defenders appealed and argued: (1) It was not proved that there was a custom of trade such as the pursuers contended for. A custom to be upheld by the Court must have three essential conditions, which were lacking in this case. It must be (a) uniform throughout the trade (Armstrong & Co. v. M'Gregor & Co., 1875, 2 R. 339; Brown v. M'Connell, 1876, 3 R. 788; Holman v. Peruvian Nitrate Co., 1878, 5 R. 657; Morrison v. Allardyce, 1823, 2 S. 434; Bell's Prin., sects. 83 and 101); (b) uninterrupted for a long space of time (Clacevich v. Hutcheson & Co., 1887, 15 R. 11); (c) not contrary to any rule of law (Anderson v. M'Call, 1866, 4 M. 765; Woolley v. Broad [1892], 1 Q.B. 806). The effect of this alleged custom would be to give the pursuers the same protection for their designs as the law gave them by registration, and was meant to be given by registration alone. (2) Assuming the custom proved and that the bankrupt firm held the cards under a restriction, that restriction flew off when the cards were transferred to the trustee in bankruptcy, or, at any rate, when they were sold by him to the defenders, who were bona fide onerous purchasers. No vitium reale attached to corporeal moveables in Scotland (Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, etc., 1876, 3 R. 1078; Bell's Com., 7th ed., pp. 302, 304, and 306). The seller of a corporeal moveable could give a better right than he himself possessed. This case was distinguished from M'Cosh v. Crow & Co. (1903, 5 F. 670), because the copyright in the negative remained with the sitter (Fine Arts Copyright Act 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 68), sect. 1; and secondly, because a photograph obviously belonged to the sitter as his features were on it. Copyright could only be acquired by a written transfer. (3) It was argued that the pursuers had a jus quæsitum under the articles of roup by which the cards were sold to the defenders. But a jus quæsitum tertio did not emerge out of an agreement unless the condition was irrevocable (Peddie v. Brown & Co., 1857, 3 Macq. 65; Henderson v. Stubbs Ltd., 1894, 22 R. 51; Finnie v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 1857, 3 Macq. 75). Here the condition was subject to alteration between the parties to the sale. Also the tertius must be designed, which here was not done (Welsh & Forbes v. Johnston and Others, 1906, 13 S.L.T. 805).

Argued for Respondents: (1) The alleged custom of trade was proved, and was such a custom as the Court would uphold (Bruce v. Smith, 1890, 17 R. 1000). The case was analogous to that of M'Cosh v. Crow & Co., cit. The photographer had a similar limited right of property in a negative as the defenders had in the cards (Pollock on Contracts, 7th ed., p. 253). (2) The bankrupt firm held the cards sub modo, and they were conveyed to the trustee in bankruptcy tantum et tale, and from him to the defenders (Heritable Reversionary Co. Ltd. v. Millar, 1892, 19 R. (H.L.) 43) The defenders could not not say that they got the cards subject to no limitation, because they were themselves in the trade, and must be held to have known of the existence of the custom.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor :—

"Recal the ninth finding in fact of the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor of 30th May 1906, and in place thereof find that it is proved that in 'The Irvine Valley' there prevails a custom of trade to the effect that, when designs are supplied by one manufacturer to another for the purpose of having curtains made from them, it is an implied condition of the contract that curtains are not to be made or sold by the second manufacturer from such designs otherwise than to the orders of the first, except with his consent, either express, or implied from a refusal to give further orders, or from the cessation of orders for a year ; quoad ultra, find in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the said interlocutor ; therefore dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute in said interlocutor, and decern ; of new, repel the defences and grant interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition, and decern."

Lord M'Laren.—The question in this case relates to the legal construction of a form of contract which appears to be in general use in a branch of the weaving industry, videlicet, the manufacture of lace curtains as carried on in Irvine and the neighbourhood. According to the evidence, it is a case of very frequent occurrence that a manufacturer who is unable to overtake all the work that he has in hand, commissions another manufacturer to weave a stated number of curtains according to a design which he supplies. The lace design is wrought out by means of the well-known apparatus of the Jacquard loom ; and I need hardly add, in speaking of such a very familiar process, that to the production of any given design it is necessary to prepare a system of perforated cards by means of which the threads of the warp are shifted in the process of weaving so as to produce the required design.

When an order is given, the manufacturer who accepts the order has to prepare a system of cards corresponding to the design supplied to him. The preparation of the cards is a very material element in the cost of production. The weight of the evidence is to the effect that the maker, in estimating for the cost of the number of curtains ordered, includes the whole cost of preparing the cards, although some witnesses say that such estimates do not always cover the entire cost of preparing the cards, and that to a certain extent the manufacturer trusts to the chance of getting what is termed a "repeat order" to indemnify him completely for his outlay. It would thus appear that in general it is for the interest of both parties that such repeat orders should be given. The manufacturer who gives the original order (and who in this transaction may be regarded as a merchant employing the other manufacturer) will naturally wish to sell as many copies as possible of his design, and the maker of the curtains will wish to supply as many as possible, because then his original outlay in making the cards is spread over a larger quantity of goods.

The practice seems to be (I am not now considering its legal effect) that at least for the season in which the order is given the cards are held at the disposal of the person who gives the order, and are only used for orders given by him. But as the cards are the maker's property, it is considered that when the person giving the order has no further use for them, e.g., if he intimates that he is not going to give a repeat order, the maker of the cards may use them for the purposes of his own business, or, it may be, for the execution of orders received from other parties. This practice is said to flow from, or at least to establish, an implied condition of the contract for the supply of the goods.

In this connection one other feature of the trade may be noticed. I have hitherto spoken of the case where a manufacturer being unable to overtake all the work he desires to execute, employs another maker in his own branch of the trade to weave for him. But it is explained that in Nottingham, which is or was the chief seat of the lace industry, there are makers who do not manufacture lace-goods on their own account, but make their living by doing work for other manufacturers. This is called by the witnesses the "brown trade," because the goods are in the brown or unbleached condition while they are in the hands of these auxiliary makers. I only mention this circumstance because it entered into the arguments. But, as I understand, there has only been one maker of the "brown trade" in Irvine, and in my opinion the distinction is of no consequence for the purposes of the present action.

The respondents, William Morton & Co., employed Robert Muir, now insolvent, to make lace curtains for them according to designs which they supplied. The work was executed on the usual terms ; that is to say, the price charged to Messrs Morton was understood to cover the preparation of the cards, and the cards were the property of Robert Muir, and passed to the trustee on his sequestrated estate.

The trustee sold the machinery and plant by auction ; and in the articles of roup a special condition was inserted regarding the cards which were disposed of, which I shall afterwards consider, because it is a disputed point whether that condition applies to the cards made by Robert Muir to the order of Morton & Co. To complete the narrative of the facts of the case, I have only further to say that Messrs Morton, respondents in the appeal, who wished to make further use of the cards which had been made by Robert Muir in pursuance of their orders, found that the appellants were using these cards for their own purposes, in contravention of the preferential right which they assert, and they instituted this process of interdict in the Sheriff Court to have the appellants interdicted from using the cards made from their designs for the manufacture of lace curtains, and from selling the lace curtains which they had made from the said cards.

In these circumstances the following are the questions which, as I think, arise for decision:—

1. Is the condition alleged by the respondents within the region of usage of trade, or customary implied condition, and is this customary condition proved?

2. Assuming that a trustee in bankruptcy takes no higher right than that of a gratuitous alienee (which I take to be the meaning of the expression tantum et tale), was the trustee in this case affected by the condition that the cards made to Messrs Morton's order were not to be used without their consent?

3. Are the appellants, who are purchasers from the trustee, affected by the condition?

On the first question, I may begin by stating what I take to be the fair result of the evidence, videlicet, that according to the general understanding of the trade in Scotland, a maker who works to a design supplied to him has not an unqualified right to the use of the cards which he makes from that design, but is held to have received the design for the purposes of the order given to him and any further orders from the same manufacturer or merchant. The witnesses naturally vary to some extent in their way of expressing the condition which limits the use that may be made of the cards; but the substance of their evidence is that the maker of cards to a design which is not his own is subject to a two-fold condition: first, that the cards are to be kept unused for a reasonable time to admit of the merchant or purchasers of the goods giving repeat orders if he so desires; second, that the cards are not to be used by the maker for his own purposes unless and until the merchant or purchaser has no further use for them. I do not propose further to analyse the evidence on this subject, because I hold that its import is reasonably clear, and because, as I understand, this appeal has been taken mainly in the view of getting a decision in the legal questions arising out of the case. I proceed, therefore, to consider what are the limitations on the right of ownership in the cards which may reasonably be implied from the nature of such contracts, and the usage which has prevailed in carrying them into execution.

The conception of an implied condition is one with which we are familiar in relation to contracts of every description, and if we seek to trace such implied conditions to their source, it will be found that in almost every instance they are founded either on universal custom or in the nature of the contract itself. If the condition is such that every reasonable man, on the one part, would desire for his own protection to stipulate for the condition, and that no reasonable man, on the other part, would accede to it, then it is not immaterial that the condition should be taken for granted in all contracts of the class without the necessity of giving it formal expression. A very good illustration of such an implied condition is the case of photographic portraiture referred to in the argument, and which was the subject of decision in the case of M'Cosh v. Crow & Co., 5 F. p. 670. It was there held that while the property of the negative portrait is in the photographer, he is not entitled to make copies from it for sale or exhibition without the consent of the person giving the order. This is a decision of our own Court; and from the authorities there cited, and particularly the opinion of Mr Justice North, which is quoted by Lord Moncreiff, I have no doubt that the law of England is to the same effect as our own. Indeed the laws could not well be different. The decision is an adaptation to the comparatively new process of photography of the established principle that an artist who paints a portrait to order is not entitled to multiply copies of it without the purchaser's consent. But the interest of the decision as bearing on the present case depends on the peculiarity that photographic prints are obtained by means of an intermediate production, the negative plate, through the instrumentality of which the positive plates are produced, just as in the process of weaving the lace curtain is produced by the action of the perforated cards on the warp in the loom. The cases have also this element in common, that they relate to the multiplication of an artistic design by mechanical methods.

I should desire, however, to guard myself against too readily accepting the suggested analogy and applying it to a special industry like the weaving trade; and without proposing to rest the decision on what is technically known as usage of trade, I think that evidence of the general understanding of the trade may very usefully be considered in determining whether there is or is not an implied condition in such contracts, whereby the merchant who furnishes the design reserves to himself a certain control as to the use to be made of the cards which are prepared from his design.

If I had to consider the question without the aid which this evidence affords, I should think it a very unreasonable result of the bargain, that the manufacturer, as soon as he had furnished the number of lace curtains that were ordered, should be at liberty to make use of the design and the cards prepared from the design to make an equal number of pieces for himself and so to compete in the market with his employer. I should not consider that the non-registration of the design made any difference; because the employer might be prepared to take the risk of numbers of the public copying his design and making sets of cards for themselves, and might yet consider himself protected by the nature of his contract against such a breach of confidence as is implied in the act of competing with him by the sale of goods made directly from his design and from the cards for which he had paid. If the employer had intimated that he had no further use for the cards, and especially if a sufficient time had elapsed to enable him to dispose of the goods supplied to his order, I should not be prepared to hold that the owner of the cards was put under any further implication not to make use of them. But now, when I learn from the evidence that what I should suppose to be a reasonable implication, from the nature of the contract, is in exact accordance with the understanding of the trade, uniformly accepted and acted on, although not hitherto brought to the test of a legal decision, I think the implication is very much strengthened. The two grounds of judgment are not distinct; they support each other. First, the condition must be one which the law will regard as reasonably arising from the nature of the contract when fully understood. But as the Court is not conversant with the details of commercial business, we receive evidence on this subject, and the result of the evidence on my mind is that I am satisfied that such a condition is implied; in other words, that no merchant would furnish a design and give an order except on the understanding that the maker of the goods was not to make use of his design to compete with him in the market.

On the second question which I have put I shall say very little, because I think it is perfectly clear that the trustee in bankruptcy is bound by any personal condition which limits the right of the bankrupt. The argument that was rejected by the House of Lords in the case of The Heritable Reversionary Co. v. Millar was that the trustee was only bound by conditions which entered into the real right. The bankrupt was the manager of a loan company, for whose convenience the titles to their securities are taken in the manager's name. The trustee on the bankrupt's estates proposed to sell these securities for the benefit of creditors, but the decision was that as the bankrupt held the properties in trust, although the trust was not reduced to writing, the creditors took nothing but the legal estate. In the present case, if we are right in holding that Robert Muir could not conscientiously use these cards for his own purposes, standing Messrs Morton's right in them, it follows that the trustee was under a similar disability.

There remains for consideration the third question, whether the appellants, who are purchasers from the trustee in bankruptcy, are affected by the implied condition? Now I think it is quite possible that a trustee on a sequestrated estate, like any other owner of restricted property, might be able to give an unrestricted title to a bona fide onerous purchaser without notice of the restriction. This, however, could hardly ever occur in the ordinary course of business; because, first, unless we suppose fraud or incredible ignorance on the part of the trustee, he would certainly give the purchaser notice of the restriction affecting the subject of sale; and secondly, even if there was no express notification, in the case of a sale of moveables the purchaser would most probably discover the restriction for himself.

In the present case the articles of roup contained a special stipulation as to the cards. I should here state that one of the firms (Messrs Heyman) that had given orders to Robert Muir, had put him under an obligation in writing not to use the cards made from their designs to their prejudice. Now with reference to the sale of the stock of cards pertaining to the sequestrated estate, the articles of roup contain this clause: "The purchaser shall only be entitled to use the same, subject to his implementing the obligations undertaken by or incumbent on the second party to said agreement (Heyman's agreement) or under any other similar agreement in connection with said cards or any of them."

I think that the effect of this clause was that the trustee did not profess to give an unqualified right to the use of any of the cards sold, and that the purchasers are put on their enquiry as to the existence of any similar agreement affecting cards other than those which belonged to Messrs Heyman. That the purchasers so understood the clause I do not doubt, because the price paid was only £1 per ton, which according to the evidence is the value of the cards as waste paper. The appellants in a sense were bona fide onerous purchasers, but then the price which they paid is not consistent with the supposition that they bought the cards with a right to use them for the manufacture of curtains for themselves. I do not, however, attach much weight to this consideration, because we know that bankrupt stock is often purchased for a sum much below its intrinsic value, and this was a sale by auction. But on the question whether the purchasers had notice of the condition affecting the use of the cards, I think that the expression "or under any other similar agreement," was sufficient notice that other persons in a similar position to Messrs Heyman had claims of a like nature on the cards made to their designs; and as the appellants purchased the stock and plant, including the cards, with the intention of continuing the business carried on by Robert Muir, or engaging in a new business of the like nature, they must be held to have had knowledge of the customary conditions under which the designer has a preferential right to the use of the cards.

For these reasons I am unable to affirm that the appellants acquired the cards free from the conditions affecting their use.

According to the uncontradicted evidence of Mr Morton, he in April 1905 asked the appellants for a quotation for the making of certain nets applicable to certain of his designs. The price quoted was 20 per cent. higher than he had previously paid, and he did not see his way to giving a repeat order. He afterwards learned that the appellants had offered the same goods to another trader at a lower price. I think that this action of the appellants was inconsistent with the respondents' rights as designers of the pattern, and that interdict must follow. In granting interdict in this case, we do not in any way disaffirm the claim of the makers of such cards to make use of them in the case where the designer or owner of the design has intimated that he has no further use for them, or in the case where a reasonable time has elapsed (which the witnesses put as a year), without a repetition of the original order having been given.

I have only further to say that I do not think that the case of the respondents requires that they should have a jus quæsitum under the articles of roup. If these articles had proposed to give a new right, or to create a new restriction as to the use of the cards, the question would arise whether the respondents, who are not named in the articles, could claim the benefit of the right. But the object of the articles is the conservation of existing rights, and the motive of the trustee who put forward the articles was to protect himself against claims which might have arisen against himself if he had professed to give a higher right than he himself possessed. In such a case the party who founds on the implied condition does not found on any right arising out of the articles of roup. He only refers to the articles for the purpose of shewing that the purchaser had notice of a claim inconsistent with the full right of property which he asserts. For this purpose the respondents may refer to the articles of roup without founding on the instrument as a source of title or right.

In all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the decree of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

Lord Pearson.—This is an action of interdict, of a somewhat peculiar nature. The question raised is as to the extent to which the defenders, who are lace manufacturers, are entitled to make use of certain loom pattern cards now belonging to them in the manufacture of lace curtains for their own behoof. These cards originated from patterns designed for and belonging to the pursuers, none of which, however, were registered under the statutes as to the registration of designs. Each design requires to be translated from the design sheet into a set of pattern cards, so as to reproduce the pattern in the web. When occasion requires, as, for instance, when a manufacturer has more work in hand than his looms can overtake, he agrees with some other manufacturer to undertake part of the work for him, forwarding at the same time the design which he desires to be reproduced. The other manufacturer prepares a set of cards from the design, and he then sends back the design, and keeps the pattern cards to be used in the fulfilment of the order.

The question now arises as to the right of the second manufacturer to use the cards thus obtained in making curtains of the same pattern for himself or for a third manufacturer, so as to compete with the firm from whom he got the design for the special purpose I have described. It is obvious that by using the patterns for his own behoof, or for behoof of a third party, he might easily compete with and undersell the manufacturer who entrusted the design to him.

Although the pursuers aver on record that the cards are their property, that is not the form of their claim, nor is it any part of their case. On the contrary, the conclusions of the summons are framed on the footing that the cards themselves are the property of the defenders. Accordingly the pursuers do not ask for delivery of the cards. The decree which they seek is an interdict against the defenders using the cards in question for their own behoof, in the manufacture of lace curtains and curtain nets, and also against their selling curtains and curtain nets made from the said cards.

Accordingly it is incumbent on the pursuers to establish that the defenders' admitted right of property in the material of the cards themselves does not carry with it an absolute right of user, but is subject to some qualification or restriction in the pursuers' favour.

The case is further complicated by the fact that the defenders, Muir Brothers & Co., were not originally parties to the contract. That was entered into between the pursuers, on the one hand, and a firm designed as Robert Muir, lace manufacturer, on the other. The estates of that firm were sequestrated in the year 1904, and the trustee in the sequestration (Mr Alexander Mitchell, C.A., Glasgow), proceeded to sell the business and the factory, and also the stock of cards which were in the hands of the sequestrated firm, including the cards now in question.

There are therefore two distinct questions raised. The first is, Did the firm of Robert Muir, with whom the pursuers entered into the original contract, hold the cards under any qualification or restriction enforceable by the pursuers as to the use they could make of them; and in particular, were they at liberty to use them for the production of curtains which might be put on the market so as to compete with the pursuers? The second question is, Whether in the circumstances under which the defenders Muir Brothers & Co. acquired the business and the cards, they are affected by any such restrictions or qualifications as to the use of the cards, which might have been enforceable as between the original parties?

One argument which was urged for the defenders I may notice at this stage. It was pointed out by the defenders that the patterns being unregistered designs had no protection, and became public property when once they were put on the market; and it was argued that the pursuers are here attempting to get the benefits of registration by means of private agreements. I must say that this does not strike me as an accurate or fair representation of the pursuers' position. I think they are entitled by private agreement to limit the area of publicity as much as they can, and so to arrange matters by contract that their own patterns shall not be used against them in the trade through any act of the firm to which they have entrusted them for a specific purpose. That position seems to be quite reasonable, and all the more so because the arrangement is really for the advantage of both parties. It was represented as an arrangement by which the defenders were said to have bound themselves not to take advantage of these patterns as public property, which all the rest of the world were entitled to do. But it is to be remembered that the arrangement is for mutual advantage. It is entered into when one manufacturer has his mill running full, and another has not. The former sends his own new and private patterns, prepared (as the proof shows) at considerable cost; and with them he sends an order for so many hundred or thousand pairs of curtains. The other is perfectly free to decline the business; but if he does not, he makes an offer to manufacture the goods at so much per pair, allowing for the cost of preparing the pattern cards. It is obvious that if, in addition to the agreed quantity, he were to manufacture from the same cards for his own private business, or for a third party, he might do a great deal of harm to the firm which owned the patterns. He himself, having no outlay on patterns, could undersell the firm in that pattern of goods in the general market; or he might put other firms in a position to compete with them. So far, therefore, from there being anything undue or unfair in the pursuers' contention, it seems to me to be quite fair and natural that it should be part of the contract, that so long as the manufacturer who so employs the other has it in contemplation to continue his orders, that other shall not be entitled to make any other use of those cards; but that he is free so to use them if the other party either notifies that he is done with his orders, or has allowed a whole season to elapse without renewing them.

The pursuers put their case alternatively, maintaining that a contract of such a nature would of itself imply some such limitation, but that in any view there is a custom of trade to that effect. I am disposed to think that the first alternative would suffice for the pursuers' case, and that the contract between the parties really constitutes one of those confidential business relationships in which one party is entrusted with something which he is to use for a specific purpose and no other—as where private patterns are handed to an ironfounder, or confidential papers to a typewriter. But it is not necessary, in my view, to decide the case on this ground; for the pursuers have averred, and in my opinion quite satisfactorily proved, the existence of a custom of trade to the same effect. On this point I consider it sufficient to refer to the careful and accurate analysis of the evidence by the Sheriff-Substitute. I hold that the terms which the pursuers seek to import into this contract by usage of trade are (to use the words of Sir Frederick Pollock), "proved to be an accustomed part of such contracts made between such persons as the Court has before it."

The second question in the case, as to whether the defenders, who come in as purchasers from the trustee, are bound by the contract to this effect, is, I think, a question of some difficulty. I do not refer to the question whether the trustee in the sequestration is so bound, for I think it clear that he is. But the contract must be transmitted against the purchasers. Now, I think it is proved (1) that the purchasers took up and completed all the pursuers' orders which were actually in hand at the transfer; (2) that as regards current orders not actually in hand, they accepted from the pursuers a cancellation of so much of them as applied to nets, but not of the others; and (3) that in response to their suggestion that they should destroy the pursuers' cards in stock, they were requested by the pursuers not to do so, which was tantamount to leaving those cards open for further orders. The defenders, however, instead of waiting till the end of the season, set about immediately to manufacture curtains from those cards and to put them on the market in competition with the pursuers. This I hold they were not entitled to do, inasmuch as upon the proved facts they had adopted the original contracts, with all their terms, express and implied.

Lord Ardwall.—The pursuers and defenders are both manufacturers of lace curtains and curtain nets at Newmilns in Ayrshire. About three or four years ago the pursuers, finding that they had more work ordered in the way of making curtains and nets than they could overtake in their own factory, commenced to employ the now defunct firm of Robert Muir to manufacture curtains and nets for them from their designs. It may be explained that the firm of Robert Muir were engaged in what is referred to in the evidence as the "brown trade," which merely means that they carried on the manufacture of lace curtains and nets up to the stage when these articles had passed through the looms, but had not been bleached and finished, whereas, what are known as manufacturers in the "white trade" not only do all that the "brown" manufacturers do but complete the finishing of the curtains and nets so as to make them fit for the market. The said designs had either been designed in their own factory by the pursuers' designer, or had been purchased from outside designers and paid for by the pursuers.

It is proved that it is a common practice amongst lace manufacturers when one firm cannot fulfil their orders quickly enough, that they should employ other firms of manufacturers, either in the "brown" or "white" trade, to manufacture curtains and nets for them up to a certain stage. The process of manufacturing curtains from designs is as follows:—

After a design has been drawn it is transferred to what is known as a "draft," which is a large sheet of paper covered with lines crossing each other at very short distances, and showing the texture of the lace at different places by various colours and shades of colours. When the "draft," or, as it is sometimes called, the "pattern," is handed to the manufacturer who is to make the curtains or nets, his first process is to put that pattern on to cards. With a view to this the design is first "read" on to strings, and after these strings have been placed in proper positions on a large card or piece of pasteboard it goes to the punchers, and under the guidance of these strings the cards are punched with holes in such positions as to produce from the looms curtains according to the desired design. It requires a greater or less number of punched cards to carry out a design, and when these cards are placed in a loom the manufacture of the lace curtain or net commences and proceeds till the articles are completed. So far as the loom is concerned, they are then ready for bleaching and finishing. The numbers set forth in the prayer of the Note are the numbers of the designs handed by the pursuers to the said Robert Muir for the purpose of manufacturing curtains and nets according thereto, and the cards mentioned in the prayer of the Note are cards punched from these designs and intended for the purpose of manufacturing curtains and curtain nets in conformity with such designs. It is matter of admission by both parties that the material of the cards belong to the manufacturers who supplied and punched them. The question at issue is as to the use of the cards.

The estates of the firm of Robert Muir were sequestrated on 14th November 1904, and Alexander Mitchell, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed trustee thereon. He had previously carried on the business of the said firm for the period from 3rd September 1903 to 26th July 1904, under a family arrangement. On 15th March 1905 the factory belonging to the estate of Robert Muir was exposed to public roup, along with the moveable contents thereof, and the defenders, Muir Brothers & Co., became proprietors of the factory and of the cards in question by purchase. I shall afterwards refer particularly to the circumstances and conditions under which these cards were taken over by the defenders.

Since the defenders got possession of the said factory and cards they have been manufacturing for their own behoof lace curtains and curtain nets from cards made in conformity with the pursuers' designs, and have been selling them or offering them for sale. In these circumstances the present action of interdict was raised.

It will be convenient to consider the pursuers' case under two distinct heads, and to enquire, first, whether the firm of Robert Muir got possession of these designs and held the cards made from them under a contract which prevented them from using them otherwise than for executing the pursuers' orders or repeat orders; and, second, assuming that this was so, whether the defenders as purchasers of these cards are barred by delegation, adoption, or otherwise from repudiating the conditions of the contract under which Robert Muir held these cards.

The contract under which the designs in question were handed over to Robert Muir was one of a simple description. The designs were sent along with an order for curtains or nets, which took the form of a letter setting forth the numbers of the designs sent, the number of pairs of curtains or lengths of net wanted, the quality, and the price at which they were to be manufactured. It is proved that in accepting orders or estimating for the manufacture of curtains the manufacturer who is to weave them is accustomed to take into consideration the cost of making the cards necessary to carry out the designs. It is maintained for the pursuers that in all such contracts there is an implied term arising from the custom of the trade to the effect that the manufacturer to whom designs are sent by another manufacturer in order that the first manufacturer may weave curtains and curtain nets therefrom for behoof of the second manufacturer, is not entitled to utilise cards punched for the purpose of carrying out the designs of the manufacturer who gave him the order, except for the orders or repeat orders of such manufacturer; or, to put it more shortly, that a manufacturer employed to carry out a design furnished to him by another manufacturer for the purpose of executing orders for him, is not entitled to utilise these designs or the cards made from them for his own purposes. This custom, of course, may be expressed in a variety of ways applicable either to the use of the designs on the cards or the curtains and nets manufactured from them, but the above statement of it sufficiently sets forth the custom as averred by the pursuers.

EXTRA DIVISION.

William Morton & Co. v. Muir Brothers & Co.

Lord Ardwall.

In considering whether the alleged custom of trade has been proved to exist, I think it is of importance to observe that, apart from such custom altogether, and assuming nothing to have been said or done beyond the handing over of the design and the giving of the order, it seems to be a condition necessarily implied in a contract of a confidential nature, such as that in question, that a manufacturer to whom a design is entrusted by another manufacturer for a particular purpose should not make use of that design for any other purpose than that for which it was given to him; and in particular should not, having been entrusted with the design for a particular purpose, endeavour to turn it to his own benefit contrary to the trust under which he received it. A number of analogous cases may be given; e.g., when a person hands a manuscript intended only to be printed for his own use or for private circulation to a printer, such printer would not be entitled to print and then publish copies taken from that manuscript; and again, suppose an inventor of some new machinery or the like sends a rough model of his invention to some one more skilled than himself in the same trade, and employs him to make drawings from it with a view to taking out a patent, it would necessarily be implied that the person so trusted with such model should not employ it for the purpose of taking out a patent himself or selling the invention to some other person. All this, I think, holds good in regard to such confidential contracts even where no patent has been taken out, or no trade mark or design has been registered, or no printed matter has been entered at the Stationers' Hall. It is, I think, entirely beside the point to say that the present interdict is an attempt to get the benefit provided by the Designs Act without applying for registration; and it is out of the question, in my opinion, to say that such a custom of trade as that alleged, or such a condition of contract, is to any extent illegal or contrary to public policy.

Now if the limitation of the rights of a maker of cards for a design is so natural and reasonable as almost to amount to an implied condition of contracts such as those in question, it does not require a great deal of evidence to prove that such a limitation has become crystallised into a recognised custom of the trade.

The Sheriff-Substitute has set forth in his note an excellent analysis and criticism of the evidence, and I do not think it is necessary for me to go into it further than he has done. I agree generally with the view that he has taken with regard to the district in question, which it now seems is the centre of the lace curtain trade, to the effect that the custom is undoubtedly proved to exist there; while with regard to Nottingham and other places, it seems certain that whatever the witnesses may say as to the particular wording of the condition which custom is understood to imply in contracts of this kind, they all practically admit that when one manufacturer hands a design to another to carry out, that other manufacturer gets possession of the design and makes cards from it subject to certain conditions more or less stringent in favour of the person from whom he received the design; but I may observe that the greater part of the evidence from Nottingham is inapplicable to the present case, for the cases which are spoken to by the witnesses from that district are for the most part cases arising between manufacturers and merchants, where the circumstances are very differnt from the present case, inasmuch as a merchant who has either made or bought a design is only concerned to have a certain number of curtains made from it, generally only for a season; he keeps no stock of cards, and no warehouse to put them in, and when once he has got as many curtains to dispose of as he requires for the season, the cards are of no further value to him, and indeed, would be probably an incumbrance, and therefore, as might be expected, the rules regarding merchants are not nearly so stringent as those regarding manufacturers.

Taking the evidence as a whole, I am of opinion, without any serious doubt or difficulty, that the pursuers have established that there is a custom of trade in virtue of which there is an implied condition such as they contend for in all contracts where designs are handed by one lace manufacturer to another for the purpose of executing his orders, that condition being that the manufacturer to whom the designs are entrusted is not entitled to use them or the cards made for the purpose of carrying them out except for the purpose of executing the orders of the manufacturer from whom the design was received. It follows that I hold that the firm of Robert Muir received the designs and held the cards made therefrom, subject to the said implied condition.

It is almost unnecessary to observe that the evidence shows that if the manufacturers to whom the designs belong either expressly or impliedly notify the holder of the cards that they do not intend to manufacture from these designs any more, the holders of the cards are entitled to use them as they please. Such notification is frequently held to be implied from long abstention from giving orders for curtains of a particular design.

The second, and perhaps more difficult, question in the case, is whether the defenders are affected with the condition under which the firm of Robert Muir held the cards. In answering this question some attention requires to be paid to the circumstances under which the defenders took over these cards. Robert Muir's trustee in bankruptcy, Mr Mitchell, had for some time before the sale to the defenders been carrying on the factory belonging to the sequestrated estate, and it is noticeable that he had, as a trustee has a right to do, adopted the current contracts which the pursuers had with Robert Muir, because, up to the time of the factory being handed over to the defenders, he was manufacturing goods from the pursuers' designs in fulfilment of orders given by them. This appears from the evidence of Mr Bryson, a partner of the defenders' firm, and it also appears from the same evidence that the defenders took over these contracts from the trustee. Mr Bryson says: "When we had fixed the price of the cards with Mr Mitchell, we made an arrangement with him with regard to the orders in the books. We agreed to execute them without making any claim against the trustee. . . . Among these orders were certain orders for the pursuers." He then goes on to say that they received a general cancellation of all work for the pursuers, and then they wrote the letter of 22nd March 1905, which is in these terms: "We accept with pleasure your cancellation of goods and orders, excepting those made and on machine. We have a number of your patterns here, and, assuming they are worthless, we purpose destroying them." Following on which the pursuers instructed the defenders not to destroy them in the meantime. I think this must be taken to mean that they might require to give them further orders, and the result was that Mr Robert Muir, junior, who was then in the employment of the defenders, answered verbally on their behalf that it was all right, and that they would not be destroyed.

The importance of all this is that it appears that first the trustee and then the defenders adopted the current contracts between the pursuers and the firm of Robert Muir, and I think it is not unfair to the defenders to hold that they undertook to retain the cards in question under the same conditions as the firm of Robert Muir had held them. As throwing light upon this, it is noticeable that the price at which the cards were sold was fixed at £1 per ton, which is the price at which waste cards and waste paper is usually sold. So far from their observing the conditions under which these cards were held by Robert Muir, the defenders proceeded to compete with the pursuers in the market, for about the beginning of April 1905 Mr Morton of the pursuers' firm asked them for a quotation for the making of curtain nets according to certain of the designs. The price quoted was 20 per cent. higher than the pursuers had previously paid, and they accordingly did did not give a repeat order. In the following month a customer came asking for a quotation for one of the designs mentioned in the prayer of the note, and when Mr Morton quoted the price he was told that the customer could buy the same number from the defenders at 4d. per pair less. The pursuers at once found fault with what was being done, and after certain correspondence, and receiving no satisfaction from the defenders or any undertaking from them that they would cease to compete with them in curtains made from their own designs, they gave instructions for the raising of the present action of interdict.

In the whole circumstances I am of opinion that first the trustee in bankruptcy of Robert Muir, and then the defender's firm, adopted the current contracts between the pursuers and the firm of Robert Muir, and must therefore be held to be bound by the same conditions as those under which the firm of Robert Muir had received the designs and held the cards. I consider there is considerable force in the view taken by the Sheriff-Substitute that under the articles of roup there was a jus quæsitum in favour of the pursuers, but I prefer to put my decision upon the ground that the defenders adopted the contract between the pursuers and Robert Muir, and after recognising that the pursuers had rights in the designs and cards made therefrom, proceeded, in breach of the condition of the contract, to compete with the pursuers by offering for sale curtains made from their designs at a lower price than they were quoting to the pursuers for the same curtains made from their own designs.

For these reasons I think the Sheriff-Substitute's decision ought to be affirmed.—13*th July* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The following narrative of the facts is taken from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion:—

Extra Division.

Brownlee's Executor v. Robb.

This action of multiplepoinding has been raised to determine the rights of parties in the contents of a policy of insurance with the Scottish Provident Institution on the life of the late Joseph Robb. These amount, with bonus additions, to the sum of £160 odds. The claimants are George Brownlee, dairyman, Davidson's Mains, the husband and executor of the late Elizabeth Scott Robb or Brownlee, a daughter of the deceased, founding upon the document No. 7 of process, dated 9th December 1901, and alleged to be a deed of gift of the policy and its contents by the deceased to his daughter Mrs Brownlee. The deceased's widow, Mrs Mary Scott or Robb, also claims the fund in medio as executrix-dative of the deceased, having been appointed such, qua relict of her deceased husband, on 2nd June 1905.

The action, as things stand on the record, might be disposed of by determining the question merely of the validity of the alleged assignation in favour of Mrs Brownlee, as, if that document is not effectual as an assignation, Mrs Robb, as executrix, must take the fund for the purposes of administration. But the case is really intended to raise the whole question of the proper distribution of the proceeds of the policy, which, in direct competition with Mrs Brownlee's executor, are claimed by the widow under an alleged will of the deceased, No. 16 of process, and in which, in any view of the alleged assignation in favour of Mrs Brownlee, the widow claims her legal rights. Though the record is not well drawn to raise all the questions at issue, it is only fair to the parties interested in this small succession, to decide, if possible, all questions among them. And though the sum at stake is small, these questions present considerable difficulties, both in fact and in law, and particularly in fact.

I shall deal with the questions in fact first. Mr Robb, who had been a flesher in Edinburgh, and was apparently in his later years a small carting contractor, died on 8th March 1905. For some years he had been addicted to drink, which had led to periods of separation between himself and his wife, and to disagreements between himself and other members of his family. So far as the facts can be ascertained from the loose statements of the witnesses, a serious quarrel between Mr and Mrs Robb took place in July 1899, which led to Mrs Robb going out to Davidson's Mains, where her daughter Elizabeth, who in 1895 had married George Brownlee, then resided. She was followed by her husband, and a scene there occurred which justifies my saying that it is no discredit to Mrs Robb or her daughter Josephine if their recollection of the events of the afternoon is indefinite and uncertain. But there occurs here one of the discrepancies between the claimants' witnesses for which it is very difficult to account. Mrs Jane Wallace and her son James, witnesses for the defender and real raiser, assert that when the deceased was struggling with some men who were trying to control him, Mrs Robb took from his pocket papers assumed to be his policy of insurance, gave them to her to keep for the night, and took them away next morning. On the other hand, Mrs Robb and her daughter Josephine both assert that no such thing occurred, and that it could not have done so, as the policy was never out of a desk in her possession both before, during, and after the periods when her husband left her.

As I gather, this episode in 1899 did not lead to an immediate separation between Mr and Mrs Robb. But his habits did induce such separation, from about October 1901 to the middle of June 1902, and again from July 1904 till his death on 8th March 1905. During this first period of separation the deceased, on the allegation that he had lost the original of his policy of insurance, obtained, on 3rd October 1901, a certified copy thereof from the Scottish Provident Institution. He then, while, more or less, living with his daughter Mrs Brownlee, on 9th December 1901, executed the alleged deed of gift No. 7 of process. This is spoken to by James Girvan, police constable, Davidson's Mains, whose evidence is very clear and distinct. He speaks to its preparation and to its execution with greater formality than, under the circumstances, was to be expected, and he makes it quite clear that, whatever the intention of the deceased, and the virtue of the document he executed, he was not, ostensibly at least, giving his daughter the custody only of the certified copy policy. He indicated that he was due her recompense for services and attention, and in handing the paper to Mrs Brownlee he said, "That is yours, keep it, give it to no one." In this evidence Girvan is otherwise supported. With the document No. 7 of process, the certified copy of the policy of insurance was also handed over to Mrs Brownlee and retained by her till after her father's death. She herself only survived him a few months. The document No. 7 of process bears, "I, Joseph Robb, hand over my life policy to my daughter Elizabeth Scott Robb, now wife of George Brownlee, dairyman, Bonnyfield." It is not disputed that it was signed by the deceased, and attested by Mrs Brownlee and her husband and three other persons.

Mrs Robb's evidence is that her husband imposed upon the Scottish Provident Institution, and obtained from them the certified copy of the policy, knowing perfectly well, not only that the policy was not lost, but where it was all the time; that he admitted the imposition, and told her that what he had done would never avail the Brownlees.

The last episode referred to in the proof was the execution of the deceased's will, No. 16 of process, on 5th January 1904. There is no doubt that it was written by the deceased's son Walter, then a lad of thirteen or fourteen, to his father's dictation, while his father was still in the house recovering from a bout of drinking; that it was signed by his father, and witnessed on the spot by James Hay, a young lad of about seventeen, a friend of young Walter Robb. No other witness signed at the time, or was present at the execution, but, on the advice of her agent, Mrs Robb, who had been present at the execution, signed it as a second witness after her husband's death. The assertion of the two lads, James Hay and Walter Robb, that the document was witnessed by Mrs Robb shortly after its execution, is contrary to that of Mrs Robb and her agent, and is quite inexplicable. But I cannot attribute to either of the lads concerted falsehood. On the contrary, their demeanour led me to think that their evidence was truthful, to the best of their knowledge and apprehension. But it is proved that the important words which terminate Mr Robb's alleged will, viz., "Also insurance papers go to Mary Scott Robb," were not the spontaneous dictation of the deceased, but were suggested by Mrs Robb, and, though written before execution, were written after a little interval. As, however, the will remained from the date of its execution in Mrs Robb's possession, though I believe the above to express the truth of the matter, it must always remain open to the suspicion that these words were written by young Robb on his mother's suggestion, after the will was signed, if not after the deceased's death. And to this suspicion I admit that the writing itself, and the collocation of the words in question with the signature, lend some support.

On 30th July 1906 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—

The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, Finds that the alleged Deed of Gift No. 7 of process did not validly or effectually transfer the deceased Joseph Robb's policy of insurance with the Scottish Provident Institution to the deceased Elizabeth Scott Robb or Brownlee, wife of the claimant George Brownlee, either as an inter vivos or a mortis causa assignation or donation. . . . Finds that the alleged will of the late Joseph Robb, No. 16 of process, was improbative at the date of his death, and was not rendered probative by the signature of Mrs Robb, his widow, and substantially his universal legatory, after his death, and therefore that the said alleged will, No. 16 of process, is invalid and ineffectual: Finds that the proceeds of said policy of insurance were intestate succession of the late Joseph Robb, and fall to be administered by the claimant Mrs Robb as his executrix-dative; therefore sustains the claim for her as executrix-dative, No. 21 of process. . . .

Lord Johnston [after the narrative quoted above].—I am convinced that the policy being the only asset that the deceased had, was during his lifetime a bone of contention among those connected with him, and at the same time a convenient and useful instrument in the old man's hands; that he found himself liable to fall between two stools—his wife on the one hand, and his daughter and her husband, Brownlee, on the other; that he had no real quarrel with, or animosity to, his wife, who had borne him, I think, thirteen children, of whom six or seven were alive, and against whom there is no imputation, except that in the end of the day she found his intemperate and violent habits past bearing; that he was under pretty rough pressure from Brownlee; and that he took the expedient to keep himself fair with Brownlee and his wife, on whom he was sometimes dependent, without, as he thought, putting his one asset beyond his control, or defeating his wife's legitimate claims, by pretending to the insurance association that he had lost his policy, and so getting a duplicate, which he made the basis of a somewhat ostentatiously formal gift to Mrs Brownlee, while knowing all the time that the policy was not really lost, but was in his wife's keeping, and never intending to divest himself of the control of it. I may add that I have no belief in, though I cannot explain, the story of Mrs Robb having taken from her husband's pocket in 1899 the policy papers; I believe it to have been, to her husband's knowledge, in her custody throughout.

In these circumstances the following questions arise:—

First.—What was the effect of the so-called deed of gift, No. 7 of process, in Mrs Brownlee's favour?

It bears: "I, Joseph Robb, hand over my life policy." In one view it has reference only to the actual document handed over unico contextu, which was not Joseph Robb's life policy, but only a certified copy. In another, it is an informal assignation of what, by extrinsic evidence, can be proved to have been his only life policy, and therefore the one intended to be transferred. In the view which I take of the evidence, and the inference which I draw from it, I accept the former interpretation, and therefore conclude that the so-called deed of gift was never meant to carry and did not carry the real policy or its contents. But it is right that I consider also the opposite view. Assuming that the deceased intended by "life policy" to indicate his real interest under the insurance (and under the insurance it was "his heirs, executors, administrators and assignees" who were to be entitled to payment), what is the effect of the document? Was it an assignation? Was it an inter vivos or a mortis causa assignation? And was the transference completed by its delivery with a copy of the policy, and intimation made subsequently to the death of the assured?

An assignation transfers "the right to receive, and if necessary to raise action or suit for recovering from a third party, a sum of money due on a bond," or other obligation (Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, Title II., chapter 1). Short forms are introduced by The Transference of Moveable Property Act 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 85), and a special form for the assignation of policies by the Policies of Insurance Act 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144), from both of which it is clear that it is competent to assign the contents of a "policy of assurance" by merely assigning the policy, without saying anything about the sums due or to become due under it. It is also, I think, clear that the word "assign," or other vox signata, need not be used. "The letter of the late Robert Strachan to her (Miss MacDougle), and the delivery of the policy, I have no hesitation in considering to be equal to an assignation," per Lord Balgray in Strachan v. MacDougle, 1835, 13 S. 954; but then the letter clearly disclosed the purpose of "sending" the policy. And the same may be said of the letter in Caledonian Insurance Company v. Beattie, 1898, 5 S.L.T. 349, where the same words as here, "I hand you," were used. And the question is, Do the terms used in the present case, which in themselves have no defined significance, disclose a purpose of assignation or transfer of the right to receive the proceeds; and if they do not, can they be supplemented by parole evidence? The former they certainly do not. As to the latter, had the same thing been expressed verbally, no supplementary proof of intention would have raised the verbal expression into an effectual assignation, at least in Scotland (Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen & Co., 1888, 16 R. 112), and I do not think that the fact that the words which, if spoken, could not have been supplemented so as to make them effectual, when written would be any more effectual, or could be permitted to be explained by extrinsic evidence. But even if I could admit extrinsic evidence, for the reasons already explained, I do not think that the evidence led is sufficient to satisfy the onus on the party standing upon the alleged deed of gift, to prove that assignation was intended. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the document No. 7 of process cannot be regarded as an assignation. I am therefore relieved from determining the questions whether it was an inter vivos or mortis causa assignation, and whether the transference was completed.

Second.—It was maintained that, even if the document No. 7 of process was a mortis causa assignation or donation, it did not affect the legal rights of the widow and children; and Third.—It was maintained, on the same assumption, that the mortis causa donation was revoked by the document No. 16 of process, whether that document was valid as a will or not.

These questions also, in the view which I take, I do not need to consider.

Fourth.—There remains the question whether the document No. 16 of process is a valid will. I have come to the conclusion that it is not. At the date of Mr Robb's death the document in question bore the signature of only one witness, and was therefore improbative. After his death, on the advice of her agent, Mrs Robb signed as an additional witness. At one time it was held that women, particularly married women, were incapable of acting as instrumentary witnesses, and they were not in use to be accepted as such. But that view and practice has been departed from, and in the case of many deeds a wife may be a witness to her husband's signature, but it is another thing to accept her signature as attesting a deed where she herself is interested, and here she is substantially the universal legatory. I think that even had she signed as a witness at the time of execution, the validity of the attestation would have been more than doubtful; but I think that it is quite impossible to admit her signature as witness ex post facto, as validating a deed entirely in her own favour, which was left improbative by her husband at his death. I therefore think that the document No. 16 of process was invalid and ineffectual as a will.

Extra Division.

Brownlee's Executor v. Robb.

The result therefore is, that the proceeds of the policy of insurance are intestate succession of the deceased Joseph Robb, which fall to be administered by Mrs Robb as his executrix for the benefit of his representatives, that is, of his widow and children. Mrs Robb will take her jus relictæ, and his children who survived him the legitim and dead's part.

The claimant George Brownlee reclaimed.

Argued for Reclaimer: The deed of December 1901 was an assignation of the insurance policy in favour of Mrs Brownlee (Policies of Insurance Act 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144, sects. 1 and 5, and schedule; Strachan v. MacDougle, 1835, 13 S. 954; Carter v. M'Intosh, 1862, 24 D. 925; Caledonian Insurance Co. v. Beattie, 1898, 5 S.L.T. 349). If this were doubtful ex facie of the deed, the parole evidence showed that a gift was intended. Intimation was not necessary to obtain a right which would be good against the cedent or his representatives (Bell, Prin., sect. 1462; Lillie's Trs. v. Gray and Others, 1828, 6 S. 489).

Argued for the Respondent: There was a strong presumption against donation (Ersk. III. 3, 92; Dickson on Evidence, sect. 158; Jamieson v. M'Leod, 1880, 7 R. 1131; Sharp v. Paton, 1883, 10 R. 1000; Dawson v. Mackenzie, 1891, 19 R. 261). The deed of December 1901 was not a deed of gift, but was intended only to preserve evidence of the fact of the policy having been handed over. (2) Parole evidence to prove intention was incompetent, but the evidence showed that no gift was intended. (3) If the deed were to be read as an assignation, it had not been intimated until after the death of the assured, and his executrix had right to the policy (Strachan v. MacDougle cit.; United Kingdom Life Assurance Co. v. Dixon, 1838, 16 S. 1277; Bell, Lect., bk. II. tit. 2 cap. 1). (4) If the deed constituted a gift at all, it was a mortis causa gift (Blyth v. Curle, 1885, 12 R. 674). If so, it was revoked by the deceased's will. That was so even if the will were invalid as a will, because it was plain that the granter intended to revoke the deed of gift. Kirkpatrick's Trs. v. Kirkpatrick (1874, 1 R. (H.L.) 37) and similar cases were distinguishable, the intention to revoke not being clear. But, in point of fact, the will was valid (Tener's Trs. v. Tener's Trs., 1879, 6 R. 1111; Simsons v. Simsons, 1883, 10 R. 1247; Beattie v. Bain's Trs., 1899, 6 S.L.T. 277). (5) In any event, a mortis causa gift being revocable, could not exclude legitim and jus relictæ (Morris v. Riddick, 1867, 5 M. 1036).

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary dated 30th July 1906: Find that the deed No. 7 of process is a valid assignment of the deceased Joseph Robb's jus crediti in the policy of assurance (which he held from the Scottish Provident Institution) in favour of the claimant's wife Mrs Elizabeth Scott Robb or Brownlee, and that the same is now vested in the claimant George Brownlee; therefore sustain the claim of George Brownlee, and repel the claim of Mrs Robb.

Lord M'Laren.—This is an action of multiplepoinding raised in the name of the Scottish Provident Institution to determine the competition as to the right to the sum assured by a policy of assurance between George Brownlee, as representing his deceased wife, who is said to be assignee under a deed of gift, and Mrs Mary Scott or Robb, who claims under the double title of legatee under her husband's will, and alternatively as his widow and executrix-dative. The Lord Ordinary has held that neither the alleged deed of gift nor the testamentary paper is valid or effectual to pass the policy of assurance, and has sustained the claim of Mrs Robb in the character of executrix-dative.

The first question for consideration, in logical order, is obviously the validity of the deed of gift, because if this were effectual as a transfer of the right to the policy of assurance in the lifetime of the assured, it is unnecessary for the purposes of the competition to consider whether the writing purporting to be a testamentary gift was effectual, or capable of taking effect upon the sum assured.

The deed of gift is in these terms:—

"Bonnyfield, etc., 9th December 1901: I, Joseph Robb, hand over my life policy to my daughter, Elizabeth Scott Robb, now wife of George Brownlee, dairyman, Bonnyfield. Signed, Joseph Robb. Witnessed by" (here follow the names and designations of the witnesses).

The writing is not holograph, but it is subscribed by the granter and five witnesses. Mrs Brownlee was a daughter of the granter. She and her husband were among the subscribing witnesses, and their attestation is open to the observation that they were interested parties. A third witness is said to have signed ex intervallo. As to the other two witnesses, no objection is taken, and it is proved by their own statements, corroborated by other persons who were present, that they saw the granter subscribe, and were asked by him to witness his subscription. It is also proved that the deed of gift was delivered to Mrs Brownlee the grantee immediately after subscription, and that it remained in her possession during the remainder of her father's lifetime. It follows in my opinion that this must be taken to be a valid and a delivered deed, and the only question for consideration is, What is the import of the deed?

On behalf of Mr Brownlee it is urged that no formal words of assignment are necessary to transfer a moveable right or jus crediti, and that the expression "hand over" is equivalent to assign or make over. A modified statement of this proposition is, that the words used are capable of operating as an assignment, provided they were used with this intention; but the intention must be evidenced by the deed itself taken in connection with the external circumstances in which it was prepared, executed and delivered.

On behalf of Mrs Robb, the executrix, it is contended that the expression "hand over," when used with reference to a policy of assurance, transfers nothing but the paper on which the policy is written, and that its only legal effect is to put the grantee into the position of custodier of the policy of assurance.

In my opinion the true principle of construction is that which I have indicated in the modified form of Mrs Brownlee's argument; because, if no words of style are necessary to the assignment of a moveable right, it follows that effect must be given to the words of gift according to the intention with which they were used. I therefore proceed to consider whether there are legal grounds for inferring, in relation to this deed, that the words "hand over" were used with the intention of transferring the jus crediti in the policy.

It is made clear by the terms of the Policies of Insurance Act 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144) and relative schedule, that words purporting to assign the policy are sufficient for the purpose of assigning the right to the money assured. This removes one difficulty in the construction, but we have still to consider the meaning of the words "hand over." It is proved that on the morning of the day when the deed was executed Mr Robb called on the witness, James Girvan, a police constable, who was supposed by Mr Robb to have more knowledge of business than he himself possessed, and asked Girvan to write a paper in favour of his daughter. If Girvan is to be believed, and I do not think his testimony is in any way impeached, he understood that what Robb wanted him to write was a gift to his daughter. Not being a lawyer, Girvan very sensibly confined himself to the business of an amanuensis, and wrote the paper in the terms dictated by Robb. Now if this were a question as to a will—e.g. whether the paper in question was a will or a mere paper of instructions or mandate—I cannot doubt that it would be competent to interrogate the solicitor who prepared it as to the nature of the instrument which he was called in to prepare. We cannot have direct evidence of the granter's intention, i.e. as to the meaning of the words to which he has put his signature; but under the head of what are called "surrounding circumstances" we may at least begin by enquiring what kind of deed or instrument the granter proposed to make. In the next place we know that the granter meant some purpose which could only be carried into effect by a formal deed, because, instead of at once signing the paper which the constable had written for him, he made arrangements for executing it at a later hour of the day when witnesses should be present to attest his subscription. We have also the fact that, as Mr Robb was not in possession of the policy of assurance, he had previously obtained from the Scottish Provident Institution a certified copy of the policy which he thought would serve his purpose, and this certified copy together with the deed of gift was delivered to his daughter in presence of the witnesses. I cannot conceive that he would have taken all this trouble if his intention were to transfer to his daughter only a worthless piece of paper; but, if his intention were to transfer the right to the policy, the precautions taken were just what the law required, except that he might have done the business a little better if he had not employed a constable to do the work of a solicitor.

It is further proved that when Robb handed the deed and the copy of the policy to his daughter he said, "That is yours; keep it and give it up to no one," or words to this effect. I have some difficulty in acting on this evidence, because it comes very near to direct evidence of intention. But it is part of the res gestæ, and the words "that is yours" are entirely consistent with the notion that Robb believed he was giving something that was of value, and are quite inconsistent with the idea that he was making a gift of a piece of paper, or handing the paper over for safe keeping. But I think the best evidence of the intention to make a gift is the deed itself, because, unless we hold that "hand over" is equivalent to assign, we deny effect to the deed altogether, and that is a conclusion which can never be reached if the words used admit of an intelligible and effective meaning. I have only further to add that by a well-known rule of construction, which I give in the words of Lord Blackburn (Fowkes v. Manchester and London Life Assurance and Loan Association, 1863, 3 B. & S. 929):—"In all deeds and instruments the language used by one party is to be construed in the sense in which it would be reasonably understood by the other,"—I think that the granter's daughter, when she received this deed, would in reason understand it to mean that she was assigned into the benefit of the policy.

This being premised, it follows in my opinion (1st) that this was a transfer inter vivos, and not a testamentary gift, because the deed was delivered to the transferee; (2nd) that no opinion which we may form as to the character, conduct or motives of the granter of the deed can have any effect in controlling the right of the assignee, which is founded on written title followed by delivery of the writing.

Against the effect of the assignation it was argued that the transfer was incomplete because it was not intimated to the assurance company in Mr Robb's lifetime, but I think this argument is founded on a misapprehension. Intimation is necessary to give a real right to the subject assigned. All the authorities who speak to the importance of intimation limit its effect in this way, and I can see no reason for doubting that an assignment of a policy of assurance, like any other deed purporting to give a contract right, is binding on the granter and his heirs. The law is so stated in Bell's Principles, sect. 1462, and unless this were the law there never could be an effectual intimation, because intimation always presupposes a valid contract right which is to be notified to the debtor. It follows that the executrix being under obligation to warrant the assignment, cannot set up her title in opposition to that of the assignee.

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to consider the question of the validity of the so-called will. It was signed by one witness at the time when the testator signed, and by another, the executrix, after her husband's death, and months after the execution of the will. This is said to be a good subscription on the authority of the case of Tener's Trs., 1879, 6 R. 1111. I am not quite clear as to the ground of decision in the case of Tener's Trs., but if it supports the contention of the executrix in this case, I hope the question may be hereafter reconsidered by a larger Court; because I cannot admit that a witness who does not sign the deed is an instrumentary witness, or that the omission to sign is an informality of execution which can be corrected or supplied after the death of the maker of the deed.

I am of opinion that Mr Brownlee is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

Lord Pearson.—The fund in medio is the sum due under a paid-up policy of insurance on the life of the late Joseph Robb; and the first and most important question is, whether the proceeds of that policy are in bonis of the deceased, or were effectually assigned by him to his eldest daughter Mrs Brownlee by the writing No. 7 of process, dated 9th December 1901. That writing bears: "I, Joseph Robb, hand over my life policy to my daughter Elizabeth Scott Robb, now wife of George Brownlee, dairyman, Bonnyfield." The writing is duly attested; and it was delivered to Mrs Brownlee, along with a certified copy of the policy, and remained in her possession until his death. The question is, whether the terms of the writing import an assignation of the policy, or are merely an expression of the fact that a copy of the policy was handed to Mrs Brownlee. Taking the question as one of the construction of the words used, I do not think it can be maintained that they are not capable of the larger construction. Nor do I think that it aids the solution to say that they are capable of the narrower construction, unless it can be made out either that that is the sound construction in law, or that the words used are so ambiguous that it is impossible to say what they mean. The Lord Ordinary says the words have in themselves no defined significance; and it is true that they are not words of art such as lawyers would use. The writing was drafted and written out by the village constable, who repeated in the writing the language used to him by Mr Robb. Now, in my opinion, the words used are not only capable of importing the transfer of the beneficial right, but they are apt words to do so according to their common colloquial use by ordinary Scotch people in that position in life. I am convinced that a large majority of such people, on a perusal of the writing itself, would at once attribute that meaning to it. That to my mind is conclusive as to the sense in which it was intended by the grantor and received by the grantee, unless perhaps it could be made out by competent evidence that there were surrounding circumstances which compelled a different construction. But so far is this from being the case, that I think all the surrounding circumstances (assuming that it is competent to regard them) strongly support the view I have expressed; but, as your Lordship has fully treated that aspect of the case, I content myself with expressing my concurrence in what you have said, and also as to the alleged necessity for intimation. But, as I have said, I hold that according to the natural and ordinary construction of the words used, as these would be construed by the parties concerned, they are apt and sufficient to pass the beneficial right in the insurance policy. I am further of opinion that no case is made out for regarding the assignation as a gift mortis causa, or as being affected by the operation of the will, if the will is to stand.

Lord Ardwall.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from the views expressed by your Lordships.

This action of multiplepoinding has been raised in name of the Scottish Provident Institution for the purpose of determining who is entitled to the proceeds of an insurance policy on the life of the deceased Joseph Robb.

The widow of the deceased claims it now only in the character of executrix-dative of her husband; Mr George Brownlee claims it as executor of his wife, who was a daughter of the deceased, and who, he maintains, acquired right to the policy by a valid assignation executed by the deceased.

The deed by which it is maintained that the assignation was accomplished is in these terms:—"Bonnyfield, etc., 9th December 1901: I, Joseph Robb, hand over my life policy to my daughter, Elizabeth Scott Robb, now wife of George Brownlee, dairyman, Bonnyfield. Signed, Joseph Robb. Witnessed by" (here follow the names and designations of the witnesses).

I may observe that in the Print of Documents the claimant Mr Brownlee thus titles this document, "deed of gift," but these words do not appear on the document itself, and are apt to be misleading as begging the question. I prefer to call it a deed of transfer, and the first and most important question in the case is whether it operates as a valid assignment of the rights under the contract of insurance so as to defeat the rights of the deceased's legal representatives, who, but for it, would be entitled to the proceeds of the policy in terms of the destination contained in the policy itself.

The Lord Ordinary has repelled Mr Brownlee's claim and sustained Mrs Robb's, and I am of opinion that his judgment is well founded.

A proof at large before answer was allowed and led, but except for the purpose of laying before the Court the circumstances under which the said deed was made and delivered, I am of opinion that the parole proof, so far as regards the point now under consideration, is incompetent and irrelevant. It was pleaded for the claimant Brownlee that this was a donation, and that a donation could be proved by parole evidence, and the Court was referred to a number of cases regarding deposit receipts in support of this view. Parole evidence undoubtedly is admissible for the purpose of shewing whether a sum of money or a deposit receipt, which is practically in the same legal position, has been handed by one person to another animo donandi or not; but when it is maintained that a donation has been constituted by a written deed, I am of opinion that the question whether such donation was constituted or not depends on the construction of the deed. I think it is as incompetent to refer to parole evidence in order to shew what intentions the granter expressed to the donee or other people, as it would be to refer to similar evidence for the purpose of construing a contract that had been reduced to writing or of interpreting the will of a person deceased.

I shall now proceed to consider whether the deed of transfer on a sound construction thereof does or does not constitute a valid assignation of the policy in question.

It is common ground that according to the law of Scotland the execution and delivery of an assignation is the appropriate method of transferring a contract of assurance contained in a policy, and all sums of money due or to become due in respect thereof. The mere corporeal handing over of the paper on which the policy is engrossed, or a certified copy of it failing the principal, gives no right to the contract of assurance contained in a policy, or any sums of money due or to become due under that contract. This is trite law in Scotland, though apparently a different rule prevails in England. (See Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen, 1888, 16 R. 112.)

What purports to be handed over in the deed of transfer is "my life policy." Now while I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, having regard to the terms of the Transference of Moveable Property Act 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 85) and the form for the assignation of policies introduced by the Policies of Insurance Act 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144), it is competent to assign the contents of a policy without saying anything about the sums due or to become due under it, I must yet observe that the words "my life policy" would quite aptly describe the corporeal document on which the contract of assurance was written, and might apply to it as well as to the rights which the policy represented.

Coming to the alleged words of assignation, which are simply "hand over," the question arises whether these words in themselves are words of assignation and are to be held as equivalent to "make over" or "assign."

In the first place, it must be observed that the phrase "hand over" is capable of two meanings: the first is the primary, simple, and literal meaning, and signifies simply to pass a thing from the hand of one person to that of another; it has also, however, undoubtedly come to have a secondary or figurative meaning, namely, to assign or transfer. This meaning most frequently attaches to the phrase when used as a merely colloquial one, as, for instance, when we speak of a father handing over his estate or his business to his son. Now, prima facie, the simple and primary meaning of a phrase is to be accepted as its true interpretation, unless there is something in the context or in the circumstances to shew that it ought to bear its secondary meaning. So far, however, from that being so in the present case, it appears to me that a consideration of what actually was done at the time this alleged assignation was made and delivered is entirely in favour of the primary meaning being adopted as the true one, because what was done was this, that at the time the so-called deed of gift was delivered a certified copy of Joseph Robb's life policy was de facto handed over to his daughter. As we have seen, the words "my life policy" are quite appropriate to describe the document itself, and I therefore arrive at the conclusion that this deed of transfer merely

Extra Division.

Brownlee's Executor v. Robb.

Lord Ardwall.

records in writing what was done at the time, namely, the handing over of his life policy by Joseph Robb to his daughter. Accordingly, I am of opinion that in the deed under consideration the words "hand over" must receive their primary and literal meaning, there being nothing inconsistent with that meaning in the remainder of the deed, and there being everything consistent with it in what was actually done at the time. The cases of Strachan v. M'Dougle, 1835, 13 S. 954, and the Caledonian Insurance Co. v. Beattie, 1896, 5 S.L.T. 349, where the word "hand" was used, were founded on by the claimant Brownlee, but an examination of these cases shews that the intention to make an assignation clearly appeared from the terms of the documents of transfer, from which it was apparent that nothing less than a transference of the policy and of the rights under it was meant.

Some difficulty, however, is presented by the fact that the deceased thought it necessary, not only to hand over the policy, but at considerable trouble to record the fact in a carefully witnessed deed. It was argued that his having done so raises a presumption that he must have intended something more than a mere handing over of the corpus of the policy. I think that, on the assumption that Joseph Robb was acting honestly in the matter and not with intent to deceive his daughter or her husband, as the Lord Ordinary holds, the answer to this difficulty is, that at the time he handed over the policy and executed the deed in question, he really believed that in doing so he was transferring to his daughter not merely the policy, but all the rights under it, and he therefore thought it sufficient to hand over the document and record the fact in his deed, without any words which in law are sufficient to import an assignation. Obviously this does not aid the reclaimer's case, because although what Joseph Robb did may have been done with the intention of making an assignation in favour of his daughter, yet, if what he did is not sufficient in law to effect such assignation, no valid transference of the right to the contract in the policy and the sums that might become due thereunder was completed.

I therefore arrive at the conclusion that, assuming the deed of transfer to represent an honest transaction, it amounts to nothing more than this, that the deceased handed over the corpus of the policy to his daughter; and that cannot give her or her executor a good title to the proceeds of the policy in competition with those who, failing an assignation, are described in gremio of the policy as the parties having right to it. In other words, the title to the incorporeal rights secured by the policy was not transferred from the deceased and his legal representatives to Mrs Brownlee by the delivery to her of the policy and a deed recording that fact.

But if I am mistaken in my opinion as to the admissibility or relevancy of parole evidence in this case, and if the evidence of the deceased's true intentions is to be gathered from evidence of what he is reported to have said in regard to his policy of insurance to police constable Girvan, the deceased Mrs Brownlee and other people, I think it is plain that the whole parole evidence in the case, so far as bearing on the intentions of the deceased with reference to his life policy, must be examined. That evidence shows that the original policy was all along in the custody of Mrs Robb, from the day she got it from the insurance company till she took it to the insurance company after her husband's death. It further appears that the deceased knew that the policy was in his own house and under his wife's control all along, and that he obtained the certified copy he got from the insurance office by telling them a falsehood. All this, while spoken to by Mrs Robb, is established by the actual facts of the case as to the custody of the policy. The story told by neighbours of the claimant Brownlee about the policy being taken from Mr Robb's pocket by Mrs Robb seems to me to be manufactured evidence. Then Mrs Robb says that her husband told her that he had given the paper he had got from the insurance company to Mrs Brownlee, but that he said that "they would never get the money, for it was no use to them," the words used being, "Don't put yourself about, old one; they will never get the money."

She further says that when he signed the will he said that she was all right as to getting the assurance money. This last piece of evidence is corroborated by James Hay, who says that when Joseph Robb on his death-bed was asked by his wife what about the insurance, he said, "Oh, you will be getting that," and she replied, "You had better put it down," and thereupon the last words to that effect were added to his will. Walter Robb also corroborates this evidence, and says that his father told him to write down the words, "also insurance papers go to Mary Scott or Robb." This last piece of evidence confirms the view I have already expressed, to the effect that Mr Robb regarded the possession of the insurance papers as an important matter in claiming the insurance money, and thought that so long as his wife had the original policy she was quite safe, and that the handing over of the copy of the policy to his daughter did not matter.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the whole of the deceased Mr Robb's conduct with regard to the policy of assurance and Mrs Brownlee was attributable to the fact that he found it convenient, during or after some of his drinking bouts, to escape from his wife's supervision and reproaches by going to the Brownlees, and that he went through the solemn farce of executing a deed purporting to hand over his insurance policy to Mrs Brownlee merely for the purpose of ingratiating himself with her husband, who, according to the Lord Ordinary's opinion, was a sort of man who would not be likely to give anything for nothing. But all along he believed that the interests of his wife and the rest of his family were secured by the former possessing the policy of assurance which at first had been issued to him by the insurance office.

I do not go further into the evidence, as I adopt entirely the Lord Ordinary's remarks upon it and upon the surrounding circumstances. The matter could not, I think, be better put than by the Lord Ordinary when he says that "Robb took the expedient to keep himself fair with Brownlee and his wife, on whom he was sometimes dependent, without, as he thought, putting his one asset beyond his control or defeating his wife's legitimate claims, by pretending to the insurance association that he had lost his policy and so getting a duplicate which he made the basis of a somewhat ostentatious gift to Mrs Brownlee, while knowing all the time that the policy was not really lost, but was in his wife's keeping, and never intending to divest himself of the control of it." Accordingly, on the assumption that parole evidence is competent in this case to explain the intentions of the deceased, I arrive at the same conclusion as I do on the deed itself, that Mr Brownlee's claim must be rejected.

With regard to the will, it is unnecessary to go into that matter, as counsel for Mrs Robb has intimated that he is satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and content to accept the policy as forming intestate succession of the deceased Joseph Robb, and that his client should administer it as his executrix-dative.

I accordingly am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's decision was well founded.—19*th July* 1907.

110. Jenkins v. Gascoigne.

Sheriff—Summary Application—Act of Sederunt 10th July 1839, sect. 137—Lease—Repair of Fences—Circumstances of a Fugitive Nature.

Appeal against an Interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Argyllshire at Oban.

The pursuer in this action was tenant of the farm of Gartcharron, of which the defender was proprietor. The tenancy was under missive letters dated in 1904, under which the duration of the lease was five years from Whitsunday in that year, with a mutual break at the end of the first three years. The pursuer presented this petition in the Sheriff Court under sect. 137 of the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1839. He craved the Court—

2nd Div.
Jenkins v. Gascoigne.

"To remit to a person of skill to visit the farm and lands of Gartcharron, in the parish of Craignish and County of Argyll, as occupied by the pursuer as tenant under the defender, and to inspect the fences thereof, and to report to the Court the condition thereof, and whether they are in a properly tenantable, habitable, and sufficient condition, and fit for the purposes of the said farm, and if not, what repairs, alterations, and works are necessary to put the said fences into said condition, and thereafter to ordain the defender to make and execute such repairs, alterations, and works on said fences, at the sight and to the satisfaction of an inspector to be appointed by the Court or otherwise, or failing the defender doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to grant warrant to the pursuer to make and execute said repairs, alterations, and works, at the sight and to the satisfaction of said inspector; and, on the cost thereof being ascertained, to ordain the defender to pay the same to the pursuer, including the costs of said report, and the expenses incurred to and by said inspector in the premises"; and the petition contained an alternative crave to ordain the defender to concur with the pursuer in entering into a reference to arbiters in reference to said fences, and an additional crave for damages.

The pursuer averred, inter alia:—

Cond. 6. In terms of said missive letters, and also at common law, the defender was, as at the said term of Whitsunday 1904, inter alia, bound and obliged to put the fences on said farm in a properly tenantable, habitable, and sufficient condition, and fit for the purposes of the farm, in order that the pursuer, in his continued tenancy of the subjects, might receive the full use and enjoyment thereof, and be able to manage and cultivate the same in a regular and proper manner.

Cond. 7. Notwithstanding the defender's said obligation to so put the said fences in order, the same, in so far as attempted to be repaired, or to be put up and in order by the defender (by substituting iron fences for the former old rotten wooden fences, which he has entirely removed), are totally insufficient and useless for the purposes of the farm in keeping in the pursuer's cattle and sheep, and protecting his crops, and enabling him to manage and cultivate the farm in a regular and proper manner. . . . The pursuer has thus, in consequence of the defender's wrongful failure to properly and timeously repair the said fences, sustained, and continues to sustain, serious loss and damage, for the recovery of which (and under reservation of his claim for which he paid his Martinmas 1905 rent) he reserves all right of action competent to him against the defender in the event of the same not being settled under the proposed reference. Since the present action was raised the defender has had two men working on the fences and trying to put them right for about three weeks, but the work was originally so defective and the material used so unsuitable as almost to baffle improvement, and the fencing still remains insufficient.

Jenkins v. Gascoigne.

Cond. 8. The pursuer has repeatedly since Whitsunday 1904 remonstrated with the defender and his factor and law agent, and with his estate manager, against the insufficiency of said fences, and the serious and undue delay in putting them in proper order; but, notwithstanding this, the defender, in breach of his said obligation, refuses or delays to put the same into proper order, and has thus rendered this application necessary.

Cond. 9. The pursuer offered, in terms of the said conditions of lease, to refer the matters in dispute between him and the defender to arbitration, but the defender refused to do so. The offer is hereby repeated, and the draft deed of submission and reference proposed by the pursuer is herewith produced, and will fall to be adjusted by the Court, if necessary.

The defender denied that he was bound to repair the fences; but stated that he had, in fact, repaired them, and that the work was done in a workmanlike manner; that it was completed in April 1905, and that the fencing was then in a proper tenantable condition.

The petition was presented on 3rd April 1906; and on 7th November 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute dismissed the petition.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. The defender took advantage of the break in the lease to put an end to it at Whitsunday 1907; and the pursuer, at the hearing, only insisted in the prayer of the petition to the effect of asking a remit as craved.

Argued for Pursuer: The process was suited to the condition of affairs at the time when the petition was presented. The fact that the landlord had altered the pursuer's position into that of an outgoing tenant should not prejudice his position. The condition of the fences was a circumstance of a fugitive nature. The fact that the pursuer was no longer in occupation of the farm made it all the more incumbent on the Court to assist him in having the condition of the fences determined, as he was no longer in right to go on the land and inspect them himself. Counsel referred to Barclay v. Neilson, 1878, 5 R. 909; Gordon's Trs. v. Melrose, 1870, 8 M. 906; Dickson v. Graham, 1877, 4 R. 717; Davidson v. M'Pherson, 1889, 30 S.L.R. 2, per Lord Justice-Clerk at p. 5; Magistrates of Kilmarnock v. Reid, 1897, 24 R. 388, per Lord President Robertson at p. 392.

Argued for Defender: This was really an action, not for remit, but for implement of the conditions of the lease. In such an action a remit was incompetent (Sutherland v. Squair, 1898, 25 R. 656). Further, a remit would be of no use. It was suited only to a matter of a fugitive nature, and a remit now would not be of any use to shew the state of the fences during the three years of the lease, which was the only matter in question. The remedy asked was a very special one, and it was not reasonable to ask a remit now. It came much too late (Baird v. Mount, 1874, 1 R. 1119).

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This is an ordinary action in the Sheriff Court brought during the currency of a short farm lease in Argyllshire by a tenant against his landlord, the conclusions of which are to have the fences of the farm inspected and reported upon by a person of skill as to whether these fences are in a tenantable condition, and if not, what repairs and alterations are necessary to make them so. There are also consequential conclusions to have the landlord ordained to make such repairs at the sight and to the satisfaction of an inspector to be appointed by the Court or otherwise, and failing his doing so, for warrant to the pursuer to make such repairs at the expense of the defender. The Sheriff-Substitute has dismissed the petition with expenses, finding that certain conditions of a former lease founded on by pursuer and not admitted by the defender are not applicable to the case and do not warrant the procedure craved. It is admitted that since this interlocutor was pronounced on 7th November last the situation has changed, because the landlord has availed himself of a break in the lease and brought the tenancy to an end, and the pursuer is no longer in occupation except of a small portion of the arable land. Any question which still remains to be decided between the parties must necessarily therefore be simply a claim of damages. In these circumstances the question arises whether this is a proceeding with any sort of application to the pursuer's case. I humbly think not. An inspection by a man of skill would not serve any useful purpose, for his report would not settle anything conclusively, and it would not be competent for us to delegate to him the right of ordering repairs and compelling their execution. Cases were cited to us in some of which use had been made of the summary procedure allowed by the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1839, which relates to "cases requiring extraordinary dispatch and where the interest of the party might suffer by abiding the ordinary induciæ." There are cases like Baird v. Mount, 1 R. 1119, in which Lord Ardmillan admitted the competency of such application with regard to buildings, fences, drains, and the like, where it is important to preserve evidence of their condition at the time; but in that case the petition was thrown out, because it was six months too late. Of the same class was the case of Gordon's Trs. v. Melrose, 8 M. 906, in which it was held competent for a landlord to present a petition of this summary kind at the tenant's outgoing to have the state of the fences reported on, in order to determine, under reservation of all pleas of parties, a question of the tenant's liability under the lease. In the Kilmarnock case, 24 R. 388, to which we were referred, Lord President Robertson conceded the competency of application "in cases of a somewhat limited class," where the facts to be ascertained were of a fugitive nature—to use Lord Neaves's expression in Gordon's case—but he held such an application quite inappropriate to the case before him. I say the same here. I do not see of what use to either party an inspection by a skilled reporter would be, and I therefore agree with the Sheriff-Substitute that the petition is inapplicable to the circumstances—in fact, even more so than when the Sheriff's interlocutor was pronounced—and accordingly that the petition should be dismissed.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling and Low.)

111. Rosslund Cycle Co. v. M'Creadie.

Diligence—Bill of Exchange — Bill Signed by All Partners of Firm—Partnership Debt—Summary Diligence Against Partnership Property.

Appeal from an Interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Ayrshire at Ayr.

The pursuers in this action, the Rosslund Cycle Company, and Thomas Ross and Simon Lundy, the sole partners of that firm, sought to have the defender interdicted from selling certain goods poinded by him under a warrant of sale granted by the Sheriff-Substitute of Ayrshire at Ayr.

The pursuers, Thomas Ross and Simon Lundy, accepted a bill of exchange drawn upon them by the defender. On 4th July 1905 the defender protested the bill for non-payment, and charged Ross and Lundy for the contents thereof on 10th July. On 18th July, the days of charge having expired, the defender poinded the goods to which the present action referred. On 27th July a warrant was granted by the Sheriff-Substitute at Ayr for the sale of the poinded goods, and the sale was appointed to proceed on 7th August. The goods poinded were the property of the firm, the Rosslund Cycle Company, and it was held to have been proved in this case that the bill of exchange was granted for a partnership debt.

The Sheriff-Substitute, after a proof, refused the prayer of the petition.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for Pursuers: The poinding and sale were not justified, because the debt was a debt of the individuals, and the goods were the goods of the firm. No doubt the individuals were the sole partners, but the name of the firm was not on the bill, and, that being so, summary diligence against the firm's goods was incompetent. It was necessary, in order to do diligence against the firm's goods, to bring an action against the firm and constitute the debt against them (Jack v. M'Caig, 1880, 7 R. 465, per Lord Deas at p. 468). Under the Debtors (Scotland) Act 1838 it was the person charged whose goods were to be sold. There was no warrant to charge the firm, only the individuals whose names were on the bill. An action might be brought to shew that it was signed for the firm (British Linen Co. v. Alexander, 1853, 15 D. 277), but, unless the person against whom diligence was done was plainly the same as the person whose name was on the bill, diligence was incompetent. Summary diligence was not competent where there was any doubt (M'Rostie v. Halley, 1850, 12 D. 816; Summers v. Marianski, 1843, 6 D. 286; Whitehead v. Henderson, 1836, 14 S. 544). Summary diligence against the goods of the firm, when the firm's name was not on the bill, was making the messenger-at-arms the judge of whether the firm was liable on the bill.

Argued for Defender: (1) The cases quoted for the pursuers were cases where there was a defect on the face of the bill. There was no such defect in the present case. There was no case where the bill had been signed by all the partners of the firm, and it was held that the firm's goods were not liable to be poinded therefor. A firm's goods could not be poinded for the debt of one or more partners, being less than the whole number, because the firm's goods were in that case not the property of all the debtors in the bill. But where the whole partners signed, the goods of the firm were the goods only of the persons liable on the face of the bill. The property belonged to them jointly, and their liability on the bill was joint (Parnell v. Walter, 1889, 16 R. 917, per Lord Kinnear at p. 924). (2) The present action was incompetent. After the Sheriff had granted warrant for sale, it was incompetent to apply to him to interdict proceedings on that warrant (Mackay's Practice, Vol. II. p. 211; Graham Stewart on Diligence, p. 354, and cases there cited). The pursuers ought to have appeared before the Sheriff and objected to the warrant being granted. It was competent so to appear in the poinding (Lamb v. Wood, 1904, 6 F. 1091).

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord Low.—The main ground upon which the appellants seek to have the interlocutor of the Sheriff recalled and interdict granted in terms of the prayer of the petition, is that the articles

2nd Div.
Rosslund Cycle Co. v. M'Creadie.
Lord Low.

which were poinded, and which are enumerated in the prayer, were the property of the Rosslund Cycle Co., and not of the individual appellants.

The appellants, Ross and Lundy, were joint acceptors of the bill in question, and, of course, are jointly and severally liable thereon, and they carry on business together under the name of the Rosslund Cycle Co., of which they are the sole partners. Now when all the partners of a firm carrying on business under a descriptive name grant a bill, I see no reason in principle why the bill should not be a good ground of diligence against the assets of the firm, if it was in fact granted for the purposes of the firm. In such a case I think that the presumption rather is that the bill is granted for trade purposes (Yorkshire Building Co., 5 C. P. Div., p. 109), but it is open to the granters to prove the contrary. That is what the appellants undertook to do in this case, because they aver in the condescendence that the bill was accepted by them in their individual capacities. Not only have they failed to prove that averment, but it is established, and is not now disputed, that the bill was granted in consideration of assistance which the respondents gave them for the purpose of enabling them to obtain stock in trade and tools for their business. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute should be affirmed.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling and Johnston.)

112. Mackintosh and Others (Mackintosh's Trustees) v. Mackintosh and Others.

Succession—Vesting—Vesting a Morte—Joint or Several Legacy—Legacy to a Class—Accretion—Terms of Bequest of Residue to Children in Which Each Held to Take a Several Share a Morte Testatoris.

Special Case.

This was a Special Case presented for the determination of certain questions arising on the will of the late Hugh Mackintosh, shipowner in Nairn. The parties to the case were (1) the trustees of the testator, of the first part; (2) five surviving children of the testator, of the second part; and (3) the testator's widow as executrix-dative of a son of the testator who had survived his father but died in 1905, of the third part. The case set forth the facts as follows:—

1. Hugh Mackintosh, shipowner in Nairn, hereinafter called the testator, died on 19th October 1900, leaving a trust disposition and settlement by which he nominated and appointed the first parties to be his trustees and executors.

2. By the second purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the testator directed as follows:—"(Second) That my trustees shall pay to my said wife (the said Mrs Henrietta Isabella Lawton or Mackintosh), in the event of her surviving me, the allowance for mournings, interim aliment and alimentary annuity provided to her under our contract of marriage, and shall also deliver over to her as her property the whole household furniture, plenishing and effects that may be in and about our dwelling-house at the time of my death, including linen, china, plate, books, pictures and liquors." The allowance to the testator's wife for mournings and interim aliment provided in the said antenuptial contract of marriage is £30, and the alimentary annuity is £100, and these provisions are declared to be in full of the widow's legal rights.

4. By the fourth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the testator directed:—"(Fourth) That as soon as conveniently may be after my death, my trustees shall set aside an amount equal to what they shall deem to be one-sixth of the residue of my means and estate, valued as at the date of my death, and ascertained after deducting the capital required to be held to meet the foresaid annuity to my widow, and shall hold and invest said one-sixth share of residue for behoof of the said Henrietta Isabella Lawton or Mackintosh, if and so long as she shall survive me and remain in viduity, paying to her the free income of the sum so to be set aside and invested, and that half-yearly, or at such other terms and periods as may be found convenient and suitable: Declaring that on the death or second marriage of my said wife, said capital sum shall fall back into residue, and be held and applied for my children as after mentioned."

5. By the fifth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the testator directed:—"(Fifth) That subject to payment of said annuity to my widow, and subject also to fulfilment of the fourth purpose hereof, my trustees shall hold and apply the rents, interests and other income of the residue of my means and estate, heritable and moveable (including the capital sum required to meet said annuity, if and when set free by the death of my widow, and the foresaid sixth part of residue to be invested for her as above mentioned, if and when set free by her death or second marriage), or such part of said income as my trustees may deem necessary for the maintenance, education and advantage of my children until payment of their shares of capital as hereinafter mentioned, and that in such proportions as my trustees may think proper, and the sum so to be allotted for the maintenance and education of my children while they live in family with my widow shall include such an allowance to her for their board as shall be suitable to her and their circumstances in life."

6. By the last purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the testator directed:—"(Lastly) That the fee or capital of the whole residue of my said means and estate shall be held, applied and paid by my trustees to and among my six children [nominatim] and any other children to be hereafter born to me who may survive me, equally among them, each of them being entitled to his or her share, or so much thereof as my trustees may be in a position to divide, on attaining twenty-five years of age; declaring that while my said wife survives and remains entitled to said annuity and the income of the capital sum to be set aside for her behoof as aforesaid, payments of capital to children shall be made on the footing not only of retaining the full amount of capital required at the time to meet said annuity and the sixth share of capital to be set aside as aforesaid, but also such further capital sum, if any, as my trustees shall deem it prudent to retain for the purposes of said annuity, and to guard against any shortcoming in respect thereof; and it is further provided and declared that notwithstanding the foregoing provision as to the period at which children shall become entitled to their shares of capital, my trustees shall have power to make advances of capital to or for behoof of any of my children at an earlier period than the attainment of twenty-five years, and even during minority, for their advancement or settlement in life, or otherwise for their advantage, in the discretion of my trustees, such advances to form deductions from the ultimate shares of the children receiving the same, or for whose behoof the same are made; and the receipts of minors for such advances or of third parties to whom payments are made for behoof of minors under this provision shall sufficiently discharge and exonerate my trustees for the same respectively."

8. The testator was survived by the six children mentioned in the said trust disposition and settlement, as well as by his widow, the said Mrs Henrietta Isabella Lawton or Mackintosh. The amount of the trust estate in the hands of the first parties amounts to £23,000 or thereby. [One child], Hugh Harold Mackintosh died while still in minority on 25th December 1905, intestate, and the third party was appointed executrix dative qua mother to him. Of the surviving children, [three] are in minority, and [two] are in pupillarity.

9. Questions have arisen with reference to the share of the trust estate destined by the said trust disposition and settlement to the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh. The third party maintains that the said share vested in the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh a morte testatoris, and that (all the parties being agreed that the said share is to be regarded as moveable estate) it has now passed to her as his executrix-dative foresaid, and is divisible between her, to the extent of one-third, and the second parties, equally among them, to the extent of the remaining two-thirds. The second parties maintain that the said share has either fallen into intestacy and is divisible among them equally as the testator's heirs in mobilibus, his widow's rights having been excluded by the said antenuptial contract of marriage, or that the said share has accresced to their original shares of the trust estate.

10. Questions have also arisen as to the period of division of the said share of the trust estate. The first parties maintain that in any view the whole trust estate must be retained by them, in order that they may distribute the income among the children in terms of the fifth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement and "in such proportions as they may think proper." The second parties maintain that in the event of the said share being held to be intestate succession of the testator, it falls to be divided among them immediately, so far as it is not required to provide the marriage-contract provisions and the sixth part of the trust estate set aside for the widow. The third party maintains that in the event of the said share being held to have vested in the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh a morte testatoris, it falls to be immediately paid over to her as executrix-dative foresaid, so far as it is not required for the purposes foresaid.

The Questions of Law for the opinion of the Court were as follows:—

1. (a) Did the share of the said trust estate destined to the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh under the said trust disposition and settlement vest in him a morte testatoris, and has it now passed to the third party as his executrix-dative, divisible between her, as an individual, to the extent of one-third, and the second parties, equally among them, to the extent of the remaining two-thirds; or (b) has the said share fallen into intestacy; or (c) has it accresced to the shares destined to the other children of the testator by his said trust disposition and settlement?
2. In the event of it being held that the said share vested in the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh a morte testatoris, does the said share fall to be paid immediately to the third party as executrix-dative of the said Hugh Harold Mackintosh, so far as it is not required to provide the marriage-contract provisions and the sixth part of the trust-estate set aside for the widow, or must the said share be retained by the first parties, in order that they may distribute the income among the testator's children in terms of the fifth purpose, and in such proportions as they may think proper?
3. In the event of the said share being held to have fallen into intestacy, does the said share fall to be paid immediately to the second parties so far as it is not required for the foresaid purpose, or must the said share be retained by the first parties in order that they may distribute the income in manner foresaid?

The following cases were cited by counsel at the discussion:—Menzies' Factor v. Menzies, 1898, 1 F. 128; Roberts' Trs. v. Roberts, 1903, 5 F. 541; Taylor's Tr. v. Christal's Trs., 1903, 5 F. 1010; Adam's Trs. v. Carrick, 1896, 23 R. 829; Waters' Trs. v. Waters, 1884, 12 R. 253.

The Court answered questions 1 (a) in the affirmative, 1 (b) and 1 (c) in the negative, the first alternative in question 2 in the affirmative and the second alternative in the negative, and found it unnecessary to answer the third question.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This special case raises questions as to the construction of the 2nd Div.

Mackintosh and Others (Mackintosh's Trustees) v. Mackintosh and Others.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

trust disposition and settlement of Hugh Mackintosh, shipowner in Nairn, who died in October 1900, survived by his wife and six children. Of these six children one (Hugh) died in 1905 while still in minority; and the main difficulty arises from the fact that the residuary clause provides that "the fee or capital of the whole residue of my said means and estate shall be held, applied, and paid by my trustees to and among my six children" (naming them) "and any other children to be hereafter born to me who may survive me equally among them, each of them being entitled to his or her share, or so much thereof as my trustees may be in a position to divide, on attaining twenty-five years of age"; and then follows a declaration that, so long as his wife survives and remains entitled to her marriage-contract and other provisions, payments of capital to children are only to be made on the footing of the trustees retaining the full amount which they may think prudent to retain for these purposes, and also a further declaration that the trustees are to have power to make advances of capital to or for behoof of any of his children at an earlier period than the attainment of twenty-five years, and even during minority, for their advancement or settlement in life, such advances to form deductions from the ultimate shares of the children receiving the same, or for whose behoof the same are made. It will thus be seen that the gift of residue is in the form of a direction to the trustees to "hold, apply and pay," and that, although the direction to pay is only to those children who may survive the testator on attaining the age of twenty-five, there is no clause of survivorship among the children themselves, no conditional institution of issue, and no express declaration as to vesting, as we had in the case of M'Gregor's Trs. decided yesterday.

In these circumstances, the second parties, who are the surviving five children of the testator, maintain, with regard to the share of residue destined to Hugh, that it has either fallen into intestacy and is divisible equally among them as the testator's heirs in mobilibus (his widow's rights having been excluded by marriage contract), or that the bequest of residue was a joint bequest, not a series of several bequests, and therefore had accresced to survivors. The third party, on the other hand (being the executrix-dative of the deceased child Hugh), claims that Hugh's share vested in him a morte testatoris, then passed to his executrix, and is now divisible between her, as an individual, to the extent of one-third, and the second parties, equally among them, to the extent of the remaining two-thirds.

I am of opinion that the latter is the sound view. There being no time of vesting prescribed by the testator himself, it must depend simply on the legal inference to be derived from the general directions of his trust deed. The primary inference is that vesting took place a morte testatoris, in the absence of anything to displace it. I can find nothing to displace it, unless it be the direction that each of the children are to be entitled to his or her share "on attaining twenty-five years of age." But a direction of this kind has again and again been held to be a mere postponement of payment and not of vesting, particularly where there is no destination over. One of the purposes of this postponement of payment is expressly said to be "to guard against any shortcoming in respect of" the provisions in favour of the testator's wife. The postponement is therefore, at least to a large extent, for a purpose not personal to the legatees themselves, which is always an element favourable to early vesting, and so far as the personal interests of the legatees are concerned, the testator shews that he has no rooted objection to them receiving payment before their attainment of the age of twenty-five, so long as such payments can be made with due regard to the safety of the widow's provisions, for he gives power to his trustees to advance capital at an earlier period, and even in minority, "for their advancement or settlement in life, or otherwise for their advantage," and declares that such advances, if made, shall form deductions from their "ultimate" shares. All this is consistent with immediate vesting, and not consistent with vesting being postponed to any later period.

The other suggestion made by counsel for the second parties as an alternative to the lapse of Hugh's share, viz. that it had accresced to the surviving brothers and sisters, is, I think, equally inadmissible, for there could be no accretion unless the bequest of the residue was a joint one, and there is nothing in the language of the deed to indicate that it was other than a several one.

I am therefore for answering question 1 (a) in the affirmative and 1 (b) and (c) in the negative.

The only other question which requires to be answered on the footing of vesting having taken place a morte is the second, which, in my opinion, ought to be answered in the affirmative, so far as the first alternative is concerned down to the words "set aside for the widow," and in the negative so far as regards the second alternative. The third question is superseded.

Lord Johnston.—The question in this case has been represented as one of several or joint legacy, involving the result of lapse or accretion respectively, in the event of the predecease of an individual legatee. I think that the case has been somewhat misconceived by the parties, and that the real question is one of vesting in a class, and that it is a very simple one.

I have used the word "predecease" advisedly, as it is a necessary element in the question either of lapse or of accretion. But then predecease involves the determination of the point of time to which it is to be referred (Young v.

Robertson, 1862, 4 Macq. 314). Now, once that point of time in the present case is ascertained, I think that the key to the determination of the question at issue is found without the necessity of solving such difficult questions as the Court had to deal with in Menzies' case (1898, 1 F. 128) and the other cases cited by counsel.

Turning to Mr Mackintosh's settlement, we find that after providing for implement of his marriage-contract obligations to his widow, and disposing specially of his share of his father's estate, which had not yet fallen in to him, he practically makes a settlement of residue only. Thus, in the fourth place, he directs his trustees to set aside a sixth of the residue of his estate and to hold and invest it for behoof of his widow, paying her the free income of the same, the capital to fall back into residue on her death or second marriage, and to be held and applied for his children as after-mentioned. Then, in the fifth place, subject to such payment to his widow, he directs his trustees to apply the proceeds of the residue of his means, including therein the capital required to meet his widow's marriage-contract provision, and the sixth of residue to be invested for her liferent, if and when set free, or such part of said income as his trustees should deem necessary "for the maintenance, education, and advantage of my children until payment of their shares of capital as hereinafter mentioned, and that in such shares as my trustees may think proper." And then, in the last place, he directs that the fee or capital of the residue of my whole "means and estate shall be held, applied, and paid by my trustees to and among my six children, Hugh, Charles, Annie, Margaret, James, and Jane, and any other children to be hereafter born to me, who may survive me, equally among them, each of them being entitled to his or her share, or so much thereof as my trustees may be in a position to divide, on attaining twenty-five years of age."

The important words appear to me to be "who may survive me." There is a postponement of payment till the children attain twenty-five in any case, and possibly longer, so far as capital requires to be retained in their mother's interest; but on the testator's death not only is the class which is to take, but also the members of the class who are to take, definitely ascertained. At the date when he wrote his settlement, there were children nati, who therefore could be named, and also children who might be nascituri, but it was conditioned in either case that they should survive him. Hence during his life the gift was joint, and there would be accretion, in a sense, in the event of any predeceasing him; but on their survivance of him there was no further room for accretion; from that point of time onwards their interests then became several. The postponement of payment did not make the children's interests conditional or postpone vesting, so as to admit of accretion. That there should be any subsequent accretion, something must be found equivalent to a survivorship clause, but then there is none such. In fact, there is no point of time to which a survivorship clause could relate except the testator's own death. And the result is what I have already stated, that the children took interests in severalty as at that date.

The rest of the deed confirms this. I pass over the provision which immediately follows, because it has merely reference to the necessity of retaining the full amount of capital during her life, in the widow's interest. But there are other provisions which have an important bearing on the question at issue. In the first place, as already mentioned, until the period of payment of the children's shares arrives, the income of the whole or of what remains undistributed, is thrown into hotch-pot and directed to be applied for the benefit of the children who have not yet received their shares. This at first sight does not appear consistent with a vested interest in a several share a morte. But it is not so inconsistent as not to be intelligibly explicable and as to override the further consideration that power is given to the trustees, "notwithstanding the foregoing provisions as to the period at which children shall become entitled," not to take a vested interest in but merely to payment of their shares of capital, to make advances of capital to them before they attain twenty-five and even during minority, "such advances to form deductions from the ultimate shares of the children receiving the same." I cannot read "ultimate" as equivalent to "prospective," and I cannot understand how a deduction could be made from an ultimate share of a child who should subsequently predecease twenty-five, if that share never was or became his but is to accresce to those who survive him. Lastly, the provisions in favour of the children are to be in satisfaction of legitim, and as legitim vests a morte this also indicates, though not by itself conclusively, that the provisions given in satisfaction are given a morte. This, therefore, adds weight to the last-mentioned consideration.

I have considered the cases of Paxton's Trs. (1886, 13 R. 1191), Menzies' Factor (1898, 1 F. 128), and the other cases cited, but while I do not think that reference to them is necessary for the judgment, nothing in these decisions appears to me to conflict with the opinion which I have formed.

I therefore answer the first question in its first alternative in the affirmative, and in its second and third alternatives in the negative, the second question in its first alternative in the affirmative, and in its second alternative in the negative, and find it unnecessary to answer the third query.

113. Motion v. M'Ginnes.

Justiciary Cases—Summary Procedure—Instance—Public or Private Prosecutor—Inspector of Poor—Right of Inspector to be Represented by Law Agent—Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sect. 80—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sect. 9 (1)—Wilson v. M'Laughlin (1907, 14 S.L.T. 850) Followed — M'Murdo v. M'Cracken (1906, 14 S.L.T. 418) Distinguished.

Bill of Advocation.

John M'Ginnes was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, at the instance of, and signed by, James Russell Motion, Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Glasgow, setting forth that the accused had contravened the Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845, sect. 80, by deserting or neglecting to maintain his wife and his child.

The Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sect. 80, enacts—

"Every husband or father who shall desert or neglect to maintain his wife or children, being able so to do, and every mother and every putative father of an illegitimate child, after the paternity has been admitted or otherwise established, who shall refuse or neglect to maintain such child, being able so to do, whereby such wife or children or child shall become chargeable to any parish or combination, shall be deemed to be a vagabond under the provisions of the aforesaid Act of the Scottish Parliament passed in the year 1579, and may be prosecuted criminally before the sheriff of the county in which such parish or combination or any portion thereof is situate, at the instance of the inspector of the poor of such parish or combination, and shall upon conviction be punishable by fine or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, at the discretion of the said sheriff."

The minutes of procedure bore as follows:—

"At Glasgow, the 7th day of February 1907, in presence of Alastair Oswald Morison Mackenzie, Esquire, advocate, Sheriff-Substitute of the county of Lanark, appeared John M'Ginnes, complained against. On the case being called, the Sheriff-Substitute enquired of Mr Lamond, writer, who appeared to conduct the prosecution, whether the inspector of poor was present, and being informed that he was not, he asked Mr Lamond whether it was competent to proceed in his absence. Mr Lamond produced a letter from Mr Motion appointing him his deputy to prosecute for him under sect. 80 of the Poor Law Act 1845, and was heard on the competency.

"Eo Die.—The Sheriff-Substitute dismisses the complaint as incompetent in the absence of the inspector of poor."

"The Letter of Authority by Complainer appointing Mr R. P. Lamond, Writer, Glasgow, as his deputy was as follows:—

"Parish Council Chambers,
266 George Street,
Glasgow, 7th February 1907.

"I, James Russell Motion, inspector of poor of the parish of Glasgow, hereby appoint Mr Robert Peel Lamond, writer, Glasgow, whom failing, Mr Robert Lamond, writer in Glasgow, to be my deputy to prosecute for me and in my name all complaints under sect. 80 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1845, 8th and 9th Victoria, chapter 83.

"Jas. R. Motion, Inspector and Clerk."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia:—

"3. The complainer having been represented at the hearing of the said complaint by a duly qualified law agent, or otherwise having been represented by his duly appointed deputy, the proceedings were competent and regular, and the interlocutor dismissing the same ought not to have been pronounced.

"4. The complainer being a private prosecutor within the meaning of sect. 9 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, a duly qualified law agent may, in the complainer's absence, appear in Court and conduct prosecutions under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts on his behalf."

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sect 9, subsect. (1), enacts—

"Every complaint at the instance of a private prosecutor or complainer under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts may be signed either by such private prosecutor or complainer or by a duly qualified law agent on his behalf; and such law agent may, in the absence of the private prosecutor or complainer, appear in Court and conduct the prosecution on his behalf."

Argued for the Complainer: (1) This was the first case in which the right of an inspector of poor, prosecuting under sect. 80 of the Poor Law Act of 1845, to be represented by a law agent, had been called in question. If the inspector of a parish like that of Glasgow must of necessity conduct all such prosecutions personally, he would have little or no time for the other and more important duties of his office. Sect. 80 did not in terms require that the inspector should prosecute personally; what the Act said was that the complaint should be "at the instance of" the inspector. All that the Sheriff-Substitute appeared to think necessary was simply the bodily presence of the inspector. Had the inspector been present, the Sheriff-Substitute would apparently have allowed the actual conduct of the prosecution to be in the hands of the law agent. That was to reduce the Act to an absurdity. Presence of a party in court did not necessarily mean bodily presence; a party was quite properly said to be present in court if he was represented by a duly qualified lawyer. (2) The prosecutor here was a private prosecutor, not a public prosecutor, and was therefore entitled, under sect. 9, sub-sect. (1), of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1881, to be represented by a duly qualified law agent. Thomson v. Scott (9 S.L.T. 60, 3 Adam 410) and M'Murdo v. M'Cracken (14 S.L.T. 418, 5 Adam 164) were decisions under the Education (Scotland) Act 1872, and turned on the special terms of sect. 70 of that Act, and were really applications of the rule delegatus non potest delegare, as was explained in Wilson v. M'Laughlin (1907, 14 S.L.T. 850), which last decision shewed clearly that a prosecutor such as an inspector of poor was a private prosecutor, not a public prosecutor.

There was no appearance for the respondent.

The Court advocated the cause, recalled the interlocutor complained of, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have no doubt that the Sheriff-Substitute is wrong. I confess that I listened to the earlier part of Mr Clyde's speech with some impatience, because it seemed to me so clear that the judgment must be set aside on another ground. If it had been the fact that the prosecutor here was a public prosecutor I must say that I should have had very great difficulty in following Mr Clyde's argument that the personal presence of the prosecutor was not necessary provided he was represented by a qualified law agent. But I do not think that we have to determine any question of that sort here, because I am satisfied that this prosecutor is not a public prosecutor in the sense in which that expression is understood in our law. This is a case of a prosecution for the purpose of preventing what is not in any proper sense a crime, but is simply a malum prohibitum. It is just a prosecution under the Summary Procedure Acts. I entirely concur in the views expressed by Lord Ardwall in the case of Wilson v. M'Laughlin as to the distinction between public prosecutors and private prosecutors, and I also entirely concur in what Lord Ardwall there said in regard to the decisions under the Education Acts. It seems to me that these decisions were absolutely right, because the Act there expressly enacted that the procurator-fiscal or other person appointed by the School Board "shall prosecute," and it was held that the person so appointed had no power to delegate his duties to anyone else in accordance with the rule delegatus non potest delegare. There is no question of that sort here. The prosecutor here is not appointed to prosecute by anybody. It is simply a prosecution at the instance of an inspector of poor, and such an officer is not a public prosecutor. Under section 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1881, therefore, he was entitled to be represented by a duly qualified law agent. I think, therefore, that the complaint should be sent back to the Sheriff to proceed.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree. I think that the Sheriff-Substitute must have been misled by recollecting that public prosecutors must personally undertake the actual conduct of the trial, or he may have been misled by judgments under the Education Acts; but the fact that confusion has arisen shews the danger of interpreting one Act by the terms of another. The Education Act expressly enacts that the procurator-fiscal or other person appointed by the School Board shall prosecute; and in M'Murdo v. M'Cracken it was held that a person to whom was thus delegated the duty of prosecuting could not delegate that duty to another. Personally I adhere to every word of the judgment in M'Murdo v. M'Cracken. I observe that I there limited my own opinion to this: "When he" (that is, the person deputed by the School Board to conduct a prosecution) "is so deputed, I hold that he is a public prosecutor, and that he cannot at his own hand delegate his duty to some one else." To that I adhere, but in the case now before us there is no question as to this gentleman being deputed by any one to prosecute. He is simply an inspector of poor prosecuting as such under the statute. He is not necessarily, or even probably, a trained lawyer. I agree with what my brother Lord Ardwall said in Wilson v. M'Laughlin. I think that the Sheriff-Substitute went too far in refusing to go on with the trial in the absence of the inspector, and that the inspector having given his name to the instance, was entitled to be represented by a duly qualified law agent under section 9, sub-section (1), of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1881.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree. Section 80 of the Poor Law Act of 1845 enacts that a prosecution of a parent for failure to maintain his child "shall be at the instance of the inspector of the poor" of the parish or combination. That gives the inspector this advantage, that he is entitled to prosecute without obtaining the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, but that does not make him in any sense a public prosecutor; and that being so, he is entitled as a private prosecutor to the benefit of section 9, sub-section (1), of the Summary Jurisdiction 1881, and may be represented by a duly qualified law agent. The case of Wilson v. M'Laughlin (9th March 1907, 14 S.L.T. 850) has been referred to on the subject of the employment of law agents by certain classes of private prosecutors, and I need therefore say no more, but refer to my opinion in that case.—18*th July* 1907.

I. Justiciary Cases — Complaint — Relevancy—Possession of Article Without Being Able to Give a Satisfactory Account Thereof—Discrepancy Between Complaint and Proof—Locus—Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), sect. 25.

II. Justiciary Cases — Trial — Record of Proceedings—Failure to Note Documents — Police Charge Book — Summary Procedure Act 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sect. 16—Avery v. Hilson (1906, 13 S.L.T. 913, 5 Adam 56) Distinguished.

Bill of Suspension.

Thomas Rice Reid was charged in the Northern Police Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, setting forth as follows:—

"That Thomas Rice Reid, presently in custody, a known thief, was, about half-past six o'clock on the morning of 7th July 1907, found in Garscube Road, at Lyon Street, Glasgow, in possession of a revolver loaded with ball cartridges, without being able to give a satisfactory account of his possession thereof, contrary to the Glasgow Police Acts, particularly The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act 1892, sect. 25, whereby the accused is liable to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding sixty days."

The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), sect. 25, enacts—

"Every known or reputed thief, or associate of known or reputed thieves, who is found in or on any house or building or part of a house or building or enclosed space, or in any street or place adjacent, with intent to commit any crime, or who is found in possession of any picklock, key, crow, jack, bit or other implement usually employed in housebreaking, or who is found in possession of any money or article without being able to give a satisfactory account of his possession thereof, may be apprehended, and on conviction be imprisoned for a term not exceeding sixty days; and it shall not be necessary in proving the intent to commit a crime to prove that such person did any particular act or acts tending to shew his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case and from his known character, as proved to the magistrate, it appears to such magistrate that his intent was to commit a crime. Any money or article found upon the accused, if not claimed by the owner within twelve months, may be forfeited and applied for the purposes of the Police Commissioners. For the purposes of this section the word 'crime' means any description of theft, robbery, housebreaking, reset of theft, and any similar offence involving dishonesty."

On 10th July 1907 the magistrate adjourned the diet until the following day. On 11th July the agent for the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that the statements libelled did not amount to a contravention of the Act. The magistrate repelled the objection. The accused then pleaded not guilty, and witnesses were examined in support of the complaint and also in exculpation, after which the magistrate convicted the accused and sentenced him to be imprisoned for sixty days.

He presented a Bill of Suspension, in which he stated:—

"1. About half-past six o'clock in the morning of Sunday, 7th July 1907, the complainer was apprehended in Garscube Road, at Lyon Street, Glasgow, by Constables Robert Watson and James Smith of the Glasgow Police (Northern District), and conveyed by Constable Watson to the Northern Police Office, Maitland Street, Glasgow, where he was locked up and detained for inquiry as to having, on 13th or 14th July 1906, broken into premises in Dundee and stolen £515, 18s. 6½d.; (2) on 20th or 21st January 1907, broken into the Pavilion Theatre in Renfield Street, Glasgow, and stolen £301; and (3) on 5th or 6th November 1906, broken into a pawn office at 15 Main Street, Bridgeton, and stolen £76,600 gold rings, and a quantity of other jewellery; and (4) on 7th inst., been found in Lyon Street with intent to commit crime.

"2. On the morning of Monday, 8th July 1907, he was brought before the magistrate officiating in the Northern Police Court, Glasgow (Edward Guest, Esquire), and on the motion of the acting fiscal, was remanded for forty-eight hours for inquiry into the second, third, and fourth of said charges.

"3. On Wednesday, 10th July 1907, the complainer was again brought before said Court and magistrate, when" the complaint above quoted was presented.

"5. The said complaint at the instance of the respondent was and is irrelevant, and the conviction and sentence following thereon are illegal and inept. The complaint does not set forth, as it should, that the complainer was ever asked to account for his possession of the revolver referred to, or that he was apprehended in respect that he was found in possession of it without being able to satisfactorily account for his possession of it. As a matter of fact it was admitted by the respondent, and was proved by the witnesses Macphater and Watson [two police officers], that the complainer never was asked to explain how the revolver came into his possession, and it was further proved by them that the complainer's possession of said revolver was not discovered until he was searched in the police office after his apprehension in connection with the charges then preferred against him as aforesaid. It was further admitted, and it was proved, that no intimation was made to the complainer that any charge was to be made against him in respect of said revolver until the said complaint was presented to the magistrate on 10th July as aforesaid. It was proved by the witnesses examined in exculpation that the said revolver was on 11th April 1907" the property of one of these witnesses, that he had recently sold it to another of these witnesses, who had given it to the complainer on 6th July 1907 in order that the complainer might clean it.

"6. Notwithstanding the foregoing facts, the respondent maintained that in order to escape conviction it was incumbent upon the complainer, not only to account satisfactorily for his acquisition of said revolver, but to explain to the satisfaction of the magistrate why he had acquired it and the purpose to which he proposed to put it, and to shew that his purpose was a lawful one, and the magistrate accepted these views, and convicted the complainer."

"9. The witness Donald Macphater produced in evidence the blotter in use at said Northern Police Office at the time of the complainer's apprehension, containing particulars of the charges against him, but no note of such documentary evidence appears in the record, as directed by sect. 16 of The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act 1864. Said blotter was put in evidence by the respondent. . . . The parties requested the magistrate to have the proceedings noted under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and the magistrate ordered accordingly."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia:—

"1. The said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the complainer set at liberty, in respect (1) that the complaint against him is irrelevant on the grounds stated in the objections thereto and as herein founded on; (2) that on the facts proved in evidence, and admitted by the respondent, the charge against the complainer was disproved; and (3) that the complainer, having satisfactorily accounted for his acquisition of the revolver in question, fulfilled every duty thereanent imposed by said statute upon him, and that the question of use was irrelevant.

"2. Separatim, the said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended in respect that documentary evidence produced in the complainer's trial has not been noted in the record of the proceedings, as required by sect. 16 of The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act 1864.

The procurator-fiscal lodged answers in which he stated:—

"1. Admitted. Explained that suspender is a notorious housebreaker, who has undergone many sentences for crimes as shewn in the extract conviction, with previous sentences, put in process at the trial. These include" three sentences to penal servitude.

"2. Admitted, under reference to the minutes of procedure."

"5. The complaint is referred to for its terms. Quoad ultra, denied. Explained that it was proved at the trial that about half-past six on Sunday morning, 7th July, suspender, who was suspected of having committed various acts of theft by housebreaking, and of being in Lyon Street with intent to commit crime, was, in terms of general police powers, and particularly of Glasgow Police Act 1866, sect. 88, apprehended when walking out of Lyon Street into Garscube Road. On being taken to the Northern Police Office and being searched, there was found upon his person a five-chambered revolver fully loaded with ball cartridge. The lieutenant on duty at the bar of the police office was Dugald Macphater. Immediately on seeing the revolver brought from suspender's pocket Macphater asked him what he had the revolver for. He answered that it was to protect him from 'these hooligans and ruffians.' He also stated that he would not use it on the police but might do so on ''tecs.' This explanation was not adhered to at the trial, for the suspender gave evidence and tendered other witnesses to endeavour to prove that the revolver had been handed to him on the preceding Saturday for the purpose of being cleaned. The magistrate held, after hearing the whole evidence, that the suspender had not been able to give any satisfactory account of his possession of the said revolver. . . ."

"9. Denied. Explained that said blotter was not produced or put in evidence either by the suspender or by the respondent. The witness Macphater, when under cross-examination about the original grounds of suspender's apprehension, was incidentally asked by the agent for the accused to shew him the entry made on the blotter at the time, and the book was therefore sent for and shewn to contain the entries to which Macphater had spoken, and which are set forth by the suspender in Article First of his Statement of Facts. Neither party put in the book or any extract from it, and it was never laid before the magistrates. . . ."

Argued for the Complainer: The complaint was irrelevant. It did not set forth that the accused was ever asked to give an account of his possession of the revolver. Further, the facts admitted by the respondent disproved the charge in the complaint. The charge was that the accused was, at about half-past six in the morning of 7th July, found "in Garscube Road at Lyon Street," in possession of a loaded revolver without being able to give a satisfactory account thereof. Now the prosecutor admitted that the accused was not found at the place specified in the complaint in possession of a loaded revolver, for the revolver was not found until the accused was being searched in the police office. The conviction therefore was bad, because the locus libelled was not the locus proved. The conviction was bad on the further ground that the production of the police book was not noted in the record of the proceedings. (Avery v. Hilson, 7th March 1906, 13 S.L.T. 913, 5 Adam 56).

The Court refused the bill.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have no hesitation in holding that this suspension cannot be sustained. Under section 25 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act 1892, where a person of a certain character is found in possession of an article without being able to give a satisfactory account of his possession thereof, he may be apprehended, and on conviction may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding sixty days. I see nothing in the statute to indicate that it is the duty of the police officer to ask the man whether he can give a satisfactory account of his possession of the article. That is not a question for the police officer but for the magistrate. The police officer would not be entitled, after apprehending the man, to liberate him because he thought the explanation given by the man was satisfactory, unless, indeed, the explanation was capable of instant verification then and there. But this is not a case of that kind at all. The complainer was not apprehended on account of the possession of the loaded revolver on account of which he was ultimately charged. He was apprehended on account of serious charges of another character altogether, and it was only when he was being searched in the police office that he was discovered to be in possession of the revolver. Whether he gives his explanation of the possession at the police office or at the trial is immaterial; if his account of his possession is satisfactory in the opinion of the magistrate, he is entitled to be acquitted. He was charged in the Police Court on the 10th of a particular month, when the magistrate adjourned the diet till the following day. The magistrate then heard evidence for the prosecution, and also for the defence, and he must have held that the accused had not given a satisfactory account of his possession of the revolver, for the magistrate convicted the accused and sentenced him to be imprisoned. Now, all that was absolutely regular, and does not present any ground whatever for suspending the conviction.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY

The only remaining question arises in this way. In the course of the trial the agent for the accused asked to see the police book containing the particulars of the charges against the accused, and it is said that this request having been complied with, the book was documentary evidence which must be noted in the record of the proceedings in terms of section 16 of the Summary Procedure Act 1864. I am quite clear that this book was not a production in causa. It was no more a production than the note-book of a policeman would be a production which he might use in order to refresh his memory and which he takes away as soon as his evidence is over. The case of Avery v. Hilson, to which Mr Trotter referred, was very different from the present. That case related to a letter which plainly might have a very important bearing on the case as evidence. The failure to note the production of that letter in the record of the proceedings was obviously fatal to the conviction.

On the whole matter I see no ground for suspending this conviction.

JUSTICIARY CASES—SUMMARY JURISDICTION — SENTENCE — IMPRISONMENT WITH HARD LABOUR—COMPETENCY OF SENTENCE TO IMPRISONMENT WITH HARD LABOUR AS A MEANS OF ENFORCING PECUNIARY PENALTY—PRISONS (SCOTLAND) ACT 1877 (40 AND 41 VICT. CAP. 53), SECT. 44.

Bill of Suspension.

Thomas Anderson, farmer, residing at Biggings, and Thomas Isbister, farmer, residing at Northhouse, both in the parish of Harray, Orkney, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Kirkwall on a summary complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal.

The complaint, which was headed "Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, and the Trout (Scotland) Acts 1845–1902," set forth—

That the accused "on the 19th day of April 1907, in the Loch of Harray, in the said Parish of Harray, did take with a set line or lines seven trout weighing in all 6 lbs. or thereby, contrary to the Trout (Scotland) Act 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 45), section 1, as amended by the Freshwater Fish (Scotland) Act 1902 (2 Edward VII. cap. 29), sections 2 and 5, whereby the said Thomas Isbister and Thomas Anderson are each liable to a penalty not exceeding £5, together with the full expenses of the conviction as restricted by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, section 4, and in default in payment of the said penalty and expenses, to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, section 6, and in addition to the said penalties, expenses or imprisonment, to the forfeiture of the said trout, and also every boat, tackle, instrument, or other article in or by which the said offence was committed.

"May it therefore please your Lordship to grant warrant to cite the said Thomas Isbister and Thomas Anderson to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict them of the contravention charged, and to adjudge them to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts."

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Sheriff-Substitute (Harvey) convicted them.

The conviction and sentence against Anderson was in the following terms:—

"At Kirkwall, the 13th day of May 1907 years, the Sheriff-Substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, finds the said Thomas Anderson guilty of the contravention charged, and therefore fines and amerciates the said Thomas Anderson in the sum of £4 sterling of penalty, with 16s. 6d. of expenses, to be paid to the Procurator-Fiscal of Court, and in default of immediate payment thereof, sentences and adjudges him to be imprisoned for the space of one month with hard labour from this date unless said fine and expenses shall be sooner paid, and grants warrants to officers of the law to convey him from the bar to the prison of Kirkwall, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law; and declares the trout, boat and implements forfeited, and directs the expenses of the complainer's witnesses to be paid out of said penalty."

Anderson brought a suspension in which he pleaded, inter alia:—

"2. The sentence and warrant of imprisonment with hard labour, being unauthorised by statute, was incompetent and illegal."

[A similar conviction and sentence was pronounced against Isbister, but at the hearing before the High Court the procurator-fiscal admitted that this conviction could not be supported on account of an addition thereto which had not been authenticated by the Sheriff-Substitute.]

Argued for the Complainer: The only place in which hard labour was mentioned in any of the Acts libelled in the complaint was sect. 18 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), but sect. 18 authorised a sentence to imprisonment with hard labour only where the Acts founded on authorised a sentence to imprisonment with hard labour, which the Trout Fisheries Acts here founded on did not do. The Prisons (Scotland) Act 1877, sect. 44, on which the respondent now endeavoured to support the conviction, did not apply. In the first place, that Act was not mentioned in the complaint, and it was settled that where an Act was to be founded on in proceedings under a summary complaint, the Act, and as a rule the particular section or sections, must be specified in the complaint (Jackson v. Stevenson, 6th February 1897, 4 S.L.T. 277, 2 Adam 255; M'Kenzie v. Cadenhead, 17th December 1897, 5 S.L.T. 228, 2 Adam 443). In the second place, the Prisons Act of 1877 dealt solely with matters of prison administration, and had nothing to do with the sentences that were competent in proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which were intended to be an exhaustive code. The scale of imprisonment set forth in sect. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 was obligatory in all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts (Gray v. Dewar, 18th July 1889, 2 White 290).

Argued for the Respondent, the Procurator-Fiscal: The first branch of the first sentence of sect. 44 of the Prisons Act of 1877 did not relate to a matter of prison administration, because it in terms conferred powers on courts of law. There was nothing to exclude courts of summary jurisdiction from its scope. In effect it enacted a general statutory addition to the powers conferred on such courts by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

The Prisons (Scotland) Act 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 53), sect. 44, enacts—

"A court of law having jurisdiction to sentence to imprisonment may also sentence to hard labour, either for the whole or a portion of a sentence, and the Secretary of State may make any general or special regulations in regard to carrying out sentences of hard labour, and may from time to time vary any regulation so made. In making any regulations in pursuance of this section, the Secretary of State shall have regard to the previous convictions, the industry, and the conduct of the prisoners."

The Court passed the bill and quashed the conviction.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This is a bill of suspension brought against a conviction for illegal trout fishing by set lines under the Trout (Scotland) Act 1860 and the Freshwater Fish (Scotland) Act 1902, in respect that the suspenders were convicted and sentenced to £4 of penalty with 16s. 6d. of expenses, and in default of immediate payment thereof, to be imprisoned for the space of one month with hard labour. The objection is not to the conviction or to the penalty imposed, which are admitted to have been within the power of the Sheriff-Substitute, but is limited to that part of the sentence which adjudges him to be imprisoned for the space of one month with hard labour in default of payment; and the objection which has been stated by Mr Mair is that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts under which the complaint was brought do not authorise or empower the Sheriff to impose a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour as in default of payment of a penalty.

The part of the sentence objected to is attempted to be supported, not on the ground that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts do justify that part of the sentence, but because it has been discovered that the Prisons (Scotland) Act of 1877 contains a clause in these terms:—"A court of law having jurisdiction to sentence to imprisonment may also sentence to hard labour either for the whole or a portion of the sentence," and then it goes on to enact that special or general regulations in regard to the carrying out of sentences of hard labour may be made by the Secretary of State, who, in making these regulations, shall have regard to the previous convictions, the industry, and the conduct of the prisoners.

Now, the accused replies that that section, which occurs in the Prisons Act, and not in any summary jurisdiction Act, relates not to summary procedure at all, but to a matter of prison administration, and is intended simply to regulate questions of prison administration.

I am of opinion that that objection is a good one. Moreover, I think that, reading the words of the section in their natural and reasonable sense, the section is intended to cover a case of imprisonment where that is inflicted as the sentence for the crime, and not as a mere means of enforcing a pecuniary penalty. The imprisonment referred to, therefore, is no part of summary procedure, nor is the section intended to regulate summary procedure. The imprisonment is simply the sentence that may be imposed, as a part of the sentence for the crime—or rather, is the sentence for the crime. All the rest of the Act is devoted to matters of proper prison administration and discipline, which is what one would naturally expect in a Prisons Act. I admit that the 44th section (which is in the portion of the Act headed "As to Miscellaneous Matters") does deviate into matters relating to the functions of the judge who has to consider the sentence to be imposed, but it immediately returns in the latter part of the section to its proper business of regulating how sentences are to be carried out, for it gives the Secretary of State power to make these regulations, and does so in a way which clearly shews that the sentence referred to in the first part of the section is a sentence for the crime itself, and not a mere alternative to payment of a fine. Who ever heard of imprisonment of this latter kind having anything to do with either "previous convictions" or the "conduct of the prisoners"?

Anderson v. Begg.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

That of itself is sufficient for sustaining this bill of suspension, and therefore I am of opinion that this sentence must be quashed as ultra vires of the Sheriff-Substitute.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with what has been said by Lord Stormonth-Darling. I think the section of the Prisons Act referred to may possibly apply generally to sentences of imprisonment for common law crimes, but I think it is impossible to hold that it has the effect of putting it in the power of any judge, administering statutes under which persons are tried under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour in cases where no such sentence is specially authorised by statute. A very much more specific and distinct enactment would be required to infer such an alteration in the law, and I think it is certain that such an alteration was never intended to be introduced by an Act which really deals with matters of prison discipline, and by a section which seems to be designed for the purpose of providing for the Secretary of State making due provision for sentences of hard labour being carried out in the prisons under his control. I think, therefore, that the section referred to does not apply so as to make imprisonment with hard labour competent under Acts which only prescribe a sentence of imprisonment failing a fine.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur, and have nothing to add.—18*th July* 1907.

Succession—Trust Disposition and Settlement—Revocation—Conditio si Testator sine Liberis Decesserit—Presumption—Elder's Trustees v. Elder (1895, 22 R. 505) followed.

Special Case.

This was a Special Case presented in the following circumstances:—Robert William Knox, thread manufacturer, Kilbirnie, Ayrshire, died on 19th June 1905, and was survived by a widow and three children of the marriage, viz. (1) William, born 9th April 1888; (2) Annie Montgomerie, born 28th June 1891; and (3) Barbara Jean, born 22nd July 1897. The deceased had not been previously married, he had no child who predeceased him, and he had no marriage contract. He left a trust disposition and settlement, dated 14th January 1896, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his widow, the fourth party to this case, and to certain trustees, the first parties to this case, and appointed the trustees to be his executors and tutors and curators to such of the beneficiaries under his will as should be in pupillarity or minority at the date of his death. This will was prepared by Messrs Fulton & Kirkhope, writers, Dalry, from certain jottings in the testator's own handwriting, and after its execution remained in their hands until 16th September 1904, on which date it was sent by them to the testator at his verbal request. The jottings remained in Messrs Fulton & Kirkhope's hands.

In 1894 Messrs Love & Williamson, writers, Beith, received instructions from the testator to prepare a trust disposition and settlement for him, and a draft was prepared and sent to the testator. This draft was never completed. It was retained by the testator. On 4th February 1901 the testator gave verbal instructions for the preparation of a fresh draft, and on 6th February 1901 he returned the 1894 draft to Messrs Love & Williamson by letter, in which he said: "I enclose draft trust disposition, dated 1894, which please go over and alter on the lines spoken of on 4th curt., or draft a new one if needed. Should you want more details than spoken of, I will call." In compliance with these instructions Messrs Love & Williamson re-drafted the 1894 draft, and on 28th March 1901 sent the new draft to the testator under a covering letter in these terms:—"As recently instructed, we enclose draft of trust disposition and settlement for your consideration. The purposes as ex pressed will probably not give effect to what you decide on doing, but may afford assistance in coming to a conclusion." The 1894 draft was not returned to the testator, but remained in Messrs Love & Williamson's custody until his death. It was endorsed, "Drafted afresh 1901," and bore various jottings and alterations made by Messrs Love & Williamson after it had been returned to them with a view to the preparation of the new draft. These jottings and alterations were never seen by the testator.

The completed will of 1896 made provision for the widow of the testator and for the two children of the marriage existing at the date of its execution, and no provision was made for any other child or children of the testator. On 22nd July 1897, eighteen months after the date of the execution of the 1896 will, the third child, Barbara, was born. The uncompleted draft made provision for all the children of the marriage.

The testator died suddenly on 19th June 1905, and in his repositories were found (1) an envelope addressed in the handwriting of Mr Robert Fulton, one of the trustees named in the 1896 will, containing an endorsement in pencil by the testator himself, "Trust Disposition and Settlement, 1896"; (2) another envelope addressed in the handwriting of Mr Williamson of Messrs Love & Williamson, containing the 1901 draft. No other testamentary document, either complete or incomplete, was found.

In consequence of the testator's death questions arose as to the validity of the 1896 will, and the following question of law was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—

Was the said trust disposition and settlement of the said deceased Robert William Knox, dated 14th January 1896, revoked by the subsequent birth of his daughter the said Barbara Jean Knox, either (a) in whole, including the appointment of trustees and executors and tutors and curators, or (b) in so far only as it disposes of the testator's estate in favour of the beneficiaries therein named?

Argued for the First and Second Parties: The trust disposition and settlement of 1896 was valid, notwithstanding the subsequent birth of the third party, and it effectually disposed of the testator's whole estate. Although there was authority in favour of the presumption of the will being revoked by the subsequent birth of the third child, the particular circumstances of this case were sufficient to rebut the presumption. The testator left the 1896 will unaltered and undestroyed for nearly ten years, and also had the draft for a new will before him, but never completed it.

Argued for the Third and Fourth Parties: The birth of the testator's third child Barbara, subsequent to the execution of the 1896 will, revoked that will in whole, or at any rate in so far as it disposed of the deceased's estate in favour of the beneficiaries therein named; and the deceased's estate, heritable and moveable, was thus undisposed of and should be divided according to the rules of intestate succession.

The following cases were referred to: Elder's Trs. v. Elder, 1895, 22 R. 505; Colquhoun v. Campbell, 1829, 7 S. 709; Millar's Trs. v. Millar, 1893, 20 R. 1040; Stuart-Gordon v. Stuart-Gordon, 1899, 1 F. 1005; Adamson's Trs. v. Adamson's Exrs., 1891, 18 R. 1133; Rankin v. Rankin's Factor, 1902, 4 F. 979; Hughes v. Edwards, 1892, 19 R. (H.L.) 33; Crow v. Cathro, 1903, 5 F. 950; Dobie's Trs. v. Pritchard, 1887, 15 R. 2.

The Court answered the question in its first alternative in the affirmative, holding that the 1896 will was revoked in all its parts by the subsequent birth of the third child.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the doctrine of law which is involved in the questions put in this special case is, if I may say so, in a somewhat artificial condition; and I think that that springs from the fact that the law of Scotland, and for the matter of that in older times the law of England, seems to have adopted a doctrine from the law of Rome, and at the same time to have rejected the only strict logical basis on which that doctrine rested. But it is impossible at this time of day to treat the question as an open question, and I am of opinion that the case before us is practically ruled by the case of Elder's Trs., 21 R. 704, which is a binding authority upon us, and I can see no good reason for reconsidering that decision by taking it to a larger Court. Elder's Trs. for the first time in terms decided that the application of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit might take effect equally in a case where the person at the time of the will already had children, as in the case where the person at the time of the will had no children. Now, that being so, we have an undoubted presumption in favour of this will being revoked, and the only question that arises is whether there are special circumstances sufficient to rebut that presumption. I entirely associate myself with the remarks that were made by some of my brethren as to the question of Lord Watson's dictum in the case of Hughes, 19 R. (H.L.) 33. I do not think it is possible to use Lord Watson's dictum in the case of Hughes as subversive of the idea that there is any legal presumption. My Lords, I do not find that there are circumstances in this case to rebut the presumption, because truly I think that there is no circumstance tending in that direction except the mere efflux of time. On the contrary, such circumstances as there are seem to me rather to point the other way, because we have the fact that this testator was reconsidering his will, and was reconsidering it in such a way as points, in my opinion, to the idea that he looked upon the will of 1896 rather as a draft for his future will than as his existing will at the time. I cannot help thinking that the fact that he sent for the will from the one set of agents, whom he was no longer going to employ in the preparation of his new will, and that he put jottings upon it, and left it in his repositories in the same place as he left the draft of the second or new will, which he never made, all points to the idea that he practically looked upon his old will as merely material for the making of his new will and not as an existing will. I am not at all by these observations meaning to throw any doubt upon the fact that the old will was a will, because it would be impossible to dislodge the general doctrine that when a man leaves in his repositories a testamentary document duly signed, that is a delivered document, although it is in his own repositories. We cannot go back upon that at this time of day, but nevertheless, I mean that so far as presumption is concerned, the circumstances I have referred to, so far from tending to rebut the general presumption which is laid down in Elder's Trs., and the cases which preceded it, rather go to support the observation that was made by the learned counsel on the other side, which I thought a weighty one. They said, and I think with force, that if this gentleman had been given his choice, under the circumstances which have now happened, as to whether he would sooner have his estate divided under the rules of intestacy or whether he would sooner have his old, and in his own view imperfect, will carried into effect, he would have preferred the latter alternative; because it would have given a certain preference to his son, which, so far as all his attempts at testing were concerned, seems to have been enixa voluntas. It would have given that preference to his son which a distribution under intestacy would have denied. My Lords, if the question is put in that way, "Which, under the circumstances that have arisen, he would sooner have done?" I agree with the learned counsel; but then that is not really the question. The question is, What was his state of mind at the time? Now, I think it is quite in accordance with human experience that a man, if asked after the event, if such a thing could be possible, "Would you prefer to die testate or intestate?" would always say "I would prefer to die testate"; yet he may have died in a state of conscious intestacy, with the view of probably making a will. In other words, I think that probably the state of mind of every man who commences operations for a new will by tearing up his old one, is that he does not at all mean to die intestate when he is sitting down to write his new will. But he puts it off and death surprises him; and he may put it off, according to the nature of his dilatoriness, for a very long time. I think that was the case here. I think this man undoubtedly meant to make his new will, and he was surprised by death. That, I think, is quite consistent with the idea that he knew for the moment that he was in a state of intestacy, although I agree that if you could ask him now he would probably prefer that he should have died testate, even with the old will, than intestate. My Lords, while I make these observations, I base my decision upon this, that the case is really ruled by the case of Elder's Trs., and there are no special circumstances to overcome the presumption. I am therefore for answering the first portion of the question in the case in that sense. As to the other question that was mooted, I have no doubt that the revocation is a complete one.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. If the question were open, I should think it one of some difficulty; but I am of opinion with your Lordship that the case is ruled by authority, and we must follow it.

Lord Dundas.—I agree with your Lordships, and have nothing to add.—10*th July* 1907.

117. Magistrates, etc. of Motherwell v. Colville.

Local Government—Rating—Water Rate—Assessment—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sect. 264—Motherwell Water (Additional Supply) Act 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. lxii.), sect. 25—Burgh Sewerage, Drainage and Water Supply (Scotland) Act 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 24), Part I., sect. 2—Party Being Owner and Occupier of Works and Paying for Water Supplied to Works by Meter Under Special Arrangement, Held Not Liable to be Also Charged as Owner for Owner's Share of Water Assessment on Valuation of Works.

Special Case.

The parties represented in this Special Case were the Town Council of the Burgh of Motherwell, acting under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts 1892 to 1903 and as Water Commissioners under the Motherwell Water (Additional Supply) Act 1900, of the first part, and David Colville & Sons Ltd., the owners and occupiers of works within the burgh, of the second part. The question raised was whether the first parties were entitled to assess the second parties qua owners for an owners' proportion of the water rate, and also to charge them qua occupiers for water supplied to their works by meter under special arrangement.

The case contained the following statements :—

3. The Acts of Parliament which affect or may affect the question now raised are :—

1. The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, 55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55 (herein called "the Act of 1892").
2. The Public Health (Scotland) Act 1897, 60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38 (herein called "the Act of 1897").
3. The Act of 1900.
4. The Burgh Sewerage, Drainage and Water Supply (Scotland) Act 1901, 1 Edw. VII. cap. 24 (herein called "the Act of 1901").

4. The Act of 1892, inter alia, enacts as follows :—

Sect. 264. ". . . . It shall be lawful for the Commissioners to contract with any person or persons within the burgh to supply any public baths and wash-houses, works, manufactories, or other premises within the burgh with water at such rate and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed on ; or, in the event of disagreement, either as to the ability of the Commissioners to give the supply, or as to the rate, terms, or conditions on or in respect of which the supply is to be given, the same shall be fixed by the Sheriff upon summary application by either of the parties, and the decision of the Sheriff shall be final: Provided that when water is thus supplied . . . . it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners to charge the parties obtaining the same both with the [portion of the burgh general assessment applicable to water supply] and also for the supply of water obtained by them ; but the Commissioners may either charge the said assessment leviable on such premises or charge for the supply of water furnished to the same as they shall think fit."

By sect. 4 (2) of the Act of 1901 the words in brackets are repealed, and the words "water assessment" are substituted.

Sect. 359. "Whenever the Commissioners in any burgh shall resolve, in manner hereinbefore provided for, to make provision for the general improvement of the burgh, it shall be lawful for them to charge, in equal proportions, all owners and occupiers of lands or premises within such burgh, with reference to the said Valuation Roll, and to all the provisions of this Act applicable to the burgh general assessment, which shall apply to the improvement assessment as if they were here repeated, with a special assessment not exceeding threepence in the pound of the gross rent or yearly value of such lands or premises, over and above any other assessment or rate to which such persons may be liable under this Act; and such special assessment shall, for the purposes of this Act, be called 'the general improvement rate,' and shall be leviable either from the owner or occupier of such lands or premises in equal proportions, or in whole from the occupiers thereof, but in the latter case the occupier shall be entitled on payment thereof to deduct from his rent the proportion payable by the owner ; and such assessment, so far as the occupier is concerned, shall be recoverable in the same manner as the burgh general assessment is authorised to be recovered."

5. By the Act of 1897, sect. 136, it is enacted that the public health general assessment "shall be assessed, levied, and recovered in like manner and under the like powers, but without any limit, except as in the immediately succeeding section provided, as > "The general improvement rate under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, or when there is no such rate, by a rate levied in like manner as the general improvement rate under the last mentioned Act."

6. By the Act of 1900 it is, inter alia, enacted as follows :—

Sect. 25. "The Commissioners may furnish to any person within the limits of compulsory supply a supply of water for other than domestic purposes . . . . or for any trade, manufacture, business, or occupation, either in bulk or otherwise, such respective supplies being so furnished at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed on ; or in the event of disagreement either as to the ability of the Commissioners to give the supply or as to the rate or terms or conditions on or in respect of which the supply is to be given, the same shall be fixed by the Sheriff upon summary application by either of the parties, and the decision of the Sheriff shall be final: Provided always that so far as possible the rate for such supply of water shall be uniform to all persons in the same circumstances, and requiring the same extent of supply, and the charges for such supply shall be recoverable in the same manner as any other water rates or charges may be recovered under the authority of this Act: Provided further, that when water is so supplied the Commissioners shall not charge the persons obtaining the same with the domestic water rate and also charge for water supplied under this section, but the Commissioners shall have the option either to charge the persons obtaining such supply with the domestic water rate in respect of the premises for which such supply is given, or to charge for the same by meter, or to charge the special rates as may be fixed as aforesaid for water supplied for the purposes or any of them in this section mentioned."

7. In 1902 the burgh of Motherwell adopted the Act of 1901, which provides, Part I., sect. 2 :—"In any burgh, or in any special or separate drainage district formed therein under any Act, the expense incurred, either before or after the passing of this Act, for sewerage and drainage or water supply, as the case may be, within the same, or for the purposes thereof, and the sums necessary for repayment of any money borrowed therefor either before or after the passing of this Act, together with the interest thereof, shall be paid out of a sewer assessment or water assessment, as the case may be, which the town council of the burgh shall raise and levy on and within such burgh or (in the case of the sewer assessment) within such special or separate district, in the same manner, and with the same remedies and modes of recovery and incidents as are provided for the public health general assessment therein."

9. From 1893 to 1902 the first parties elected to charge the second parties for water in terms of the agreement before mentioned, and not to charge the burgh general assessment, so far as applicable to water, for water supplied for business purposes.

10. Since the adoption by the first parties of the Act of 1901 the second parties have continued to be charged under the agreement for the supply of water to their works. In addition, the first parties claim to charge the second parties as owners with the owners' half of the water assessment under sect. 2 of the Act of 1901 on one-fourth of the annual value of their works as appearing in the Valuation Roll. This claim is denied by the second parties.

11. Accordingly in November 1905 the first

parties professed to levy on the second parties, by the following notice, a water assessment in respect of their being owners of said works:—

"Water Assessment and Domestic Water.

"Rate, 1s. 1d. per £ on Rental of £3062, 10s., £165, 17s. 8½d."

12. The second parties appealed to the first parties against this assessment, on the ground that it was incompetent to charge them under the statutes the sum they paid under the said agreement and also the said water assessment. It is admitted that this is what the first parties propose to do, and they do not claim the water assessment unless they can also take the sum payable under the said agreement. The appeal was dismissed. It was thereafter agreed between the parties that the question at issue should be adjudicated on by means of this case.

The parties' contentions were thus stated:—

The First Parties contend that by the Act of 1901 the incidence of the water-rate in burghs to which that Act applies or is made to apply (including Motherwell) is altered, so as to subject all owners to liability for one-half thereof, and that the second parties as owners are and must be so liable unless they can shew some exemption in their favour, and no such exemption exists. They further contend that an owner's liability is not affected though the occupier should be charged, not by water assessment but by meter or other special arrangement, because the provisions in the Acts of 1892 and 1900 barring the charge of both a meter-rate or other rate under special arrangement, and also the proportion of the burgh general assessment applicable to water supply or the domestic water-rate, apply only to charges upon the occupier, who alone could be assessed or charged in 1892 and 1900, and are effectual only to prevent a double charge upon the occupier. It is not contended that sect. 264 of the Act of 1892 or sect. 25 of the Act of 1900 is repealed, but it is contended that the election therein prescribed is between the meter or special rate on the one hand and the occupier's assessment on the other, such assessment being then the whole, but now only one-half, of the water assessment; and that the owner's liability for one-half of the assessment arising for the first time in 1902 in terms of the Act of 1901 is absolute and unaffected by the election prescribed in the said sections.

The Second Parties maintain that the 264th section of the Act of 1892 and the 25th section of the Act of 1900 unequivocally forbid the first parties from making the second parties pay both the owner's half of the water-rate and also the sums under the special agreement; and that not only does the Act of 1901 not repeal either sect. 264 of the Act of 1892 or sect. 25 of the Act of 1900, but by Part I. of sect. 4 of the Act of 1901 the 264th section of the Act of 1892 is verbally amended, shewing conclusively that Parliament had full in view that that section was to remain in full force notwithstanding the Act of 1901.

The following Question of Law was submitted for the opinion of the Court:—

Are the First Parties entitled to assess and charge the Second Parties as owners for the owner's half of the water assessment upon one-fourth of the value of their works as appearing in the Valuation Roll, and also to charge the Second Parties as occupiers for water supplied to their works by meter or under special arrangement?

The Court answered the question in the negative.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the burgh of Motherwell has a water supply, and that water supply was originally dealt with by a Special Act of 1900. That Act in many ways really repeated the terms of what at the time was one of the general Acts, namely, the Burgh Police Act of 1892. It provided among other things for allowing the Commissioners to furnish to any person within the limits of compulsory supply, a supply of water for other than domestic purposes to shops, factories, etc. And it provided that the supply should be made at such rate for the water as the Commissioners and the person getting it should agree upon; and if they could not agree, then there was power to the parties to apply to the Sheriff summarily to fix the rate for them; and then it goes on: "Provided always that so far as possible the rate for such supply of water shall be uniform to all persons in the same circumstances and requiring the same extent of supply, and the charges for such supply shall be recoverable in the same manner as any other water-rates or charges may be recovered under the authority of this Act: Provided further, that when water is so supplied, the Commissioners shall not charge the persons obtaining the same with the domestic water-rate and also charge for water supplied under this section, but the Commissioners shall have the option either to charge the persons obtaining such supply with the domestic water-rate in respect of the premises for which such supply is given, or to charge for the same by meter, or to charge the special rates as may be fixed as aforesaid for water supplied for the purposes or any of them in this section mentioned."

Now the assessment under the Act of 1900 was on the occupier alone, but in 1901 the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage and Water Supply (Scotland) Act was passed, and by that Act the assessment was altered and was assimilated to the assessment under the improvement rate under the Act of 1892. The improvement rate is an owner and occupier rate, but it is a rate which is one rate, but which may be levied from both owner and occupier, or in the option of the burgh may be levied altogether from the occupier, in which case, however, he is entitled to deduct one-half of the rate from the rent he pays to the owner. The actual incidence, therefore, of it is one-half on the owner and one-half on the occupier. The other clauses of the water Act are in many cases left untouched, and particularly the clause as to exemption. The question has arisen where the parties, as here, are owners and occupiers, and are paying a special rate by agreement, whether they are also to pay their ordinary domestic rate as owners.

My Lords, I have come to the conclusion that they are not so liable. I think the fair reading of the section is, as counsel put it, that it is settled that when water is wanted for more than merely domestic purposes the supply is arranged in respect of the premises for which the supply is wanted, and then the burgh is entitled to get a rate per gallon for the water so supplied, and every gallon is paid for, including in the quantity the gallons that would be used for domestic supply; but the burgh here desire to levy an assessment in addition. Well, if they did that, they would be paid over again for the same water; and the ratio of exemption seems to me to be entirely untouched by the fact that instead of being leviable from the owner entirely the rate is now spread one-half on the owner and one-half on the occupier. I see no reason why the effect should be to allow the burgh to charge twice for the same water. I do not mean by that that the burgh would get anything it is not entitled to; the only result would be that certain other ratepayers would pay less, but there is no reason why certain premises should be penalised under the new Act more than they were under the old. I am therefore of opinion that the question should be answered in the negative.

Lord Kinnear.—I have come to the same conclusion. The argument to the contrary seems to be, that the proviso by which the Commissioners are prohibited from charging two rates for a supply of water, amounts to an exemption in favour of certain ratepayers, and that therefore the only persons who can take benefit from that provision are ratepayers falling within the contemplation of the Legislature when the Act in question was passed. If the clause in question were merely a personal exemption, there might be some force in that argument. But I do not think that is the meaning of the Act. I agree with your Lordship that according to the plain construction of the section, what the Commissioners are allowed to do is to furnish a special supply of water to persons requiring an unusual quantity for the benefit of certain premises, at a price to be fixed by agreement, or, failing agreement, by the Sheriff. They may give this additional supply at what is presumed to be a fair price, and then the statute goes on to provide that the Commissioners are not to "charge the price so fixed and also the ordinary water rate as if no such agreement were made." Now it seems to me that the section deals, not with particular ratepayers but with particular premises which may be supposed to require more than the ordinary supply of water, and with the method by which the proper rate for such exceptional supply should be ascertained. The logical order for considering the matter appears to me to be to ask, first, what is the rate to be charged, and then to consider who are to be liable for it. Now as I read that section the enactment is plain that one rate only is to be charged; and in the event of its being determined to give a special water supply at a price ascertained in terms of the statute, that rate is to be charged and no other. I therefore concur in the opinion your Lordship has expressed.

Petition.

This was a petition presented by creditors for the determination of certain questions arising in the voluntary liquidation of Borland and Co. Ltd. The circumstances were stated in the petition as follows:—

1. The petitioners are the surviving and acting trustees, original and assumed, of the late Sir William Collins, knight, publisher, Glasgow. Borland & Co., the respondent Company, was incorporated on 31st March 1906, for the purpose, inter alia, of acquiring certain paper mills belonging to the petitioners, known as Milton Mills, Bowling, and carrying on the business of paper manufacturers therein.

2. As trustees foresaid, the petitioners were owners of the said Milton Paper Mills, and were in right of certain leases granted to the late Sir William Collins in connection therewith. The said leases included (1) lease dated 1879, between Neil Colquhoun Campbell of Barnhill, Dumbartonshire, on the one part, and the said Sir William Collins on the other part, of certain portions of the Barnhill Reservoir, for the period of forty years from Whitsunday 1879, at a yearly rent of £42; (2) lease dated 1879, between Andrew Muter of Milton of the first part, and the said Sir William Collins of the second part, of a piece of ground to be used for a reservoir, for the period of forty years from Whitsunday 1879, at a yearly rent of £21; (3) lease dated 1879, between Andrew Buchanan of Auchentorlie of the first part, and the said Sir William Collins of the second part, of three dams, for a period of forty years from Whitsunday 1879, at a yearly rent of £135; and (4) lease dated 1883, between the said Andrew Buchanan of the first part and the said Sir William Collins of the second part, of the following pieces of ground, parts of the lands of Auchentorlie, viz.: (a) a piece of ground for the period of forty years from Martinmas 1879, at a yearly rent of £34, 7s. 6d.; (b) a strip of ground for the period from Martinmas 1881 to Whitsunday 1919, at a yearly rent of £25, 9s. 9d.; (c) a piece of ground for the period from Martinmas 1881 to Whitsunday 1919, at a yearly rent of £1; and (d) that portion of the Barnhill dam belonging to the said Andrew Buchanan, for the period from Martinmas 1879 to Whitsunday 1919, at a yearly rent of £20. Each of the said leases contained, in addition to the obligation for rent, various onerous stipulations upon the tenants with regard to maintenance, restoration and other matters.

3. Upon the respondent Company being formed, the petitioners sold to the Company the Milton Mills, and assigned to it the relative leases by disposition and assignation, dated and recorded in April 1906. The subjects included in the conveyance were disponed under burden in favour of the petitioners of the complete implement of the terms and conditions of the various leases above referred to, including the payment of rent therein stated, which implement was declared to be a real burden affecting the subjects, and was directed to be inserted in all future deeds affecting the subjects. It was further provided that the Company should be bound to make payment of the rents stipulated in the said leases, and to perform the whole other obligations incumbent upon the tenants under the same. The landlords under the various leases were not parties to the assignation granted by the petitioners, and the petitioners are still liable to the landlords for implement of all the obligations in the leases.

4. The Company duly entered into the possession of the mills, in which they proceeded to carry on the business of papermakers, and they also entered into possession of the subjects leased, and paid to the petitioners their proportion of the rents due under the leases at the term of Whitsunday 1906, and to the landlords the rents which fell due at the term of Martinmas 1906.

5. At an extraordinary general meeting of the Company held on 5th January 1907 special resolutions were passed and confirmed at a subsequent extraordinary general meeting held on 23rd January 1907:—(1) That the Company be wound up voluntarily; and (2) that Samuel Greenhalgh be appointed liquidator. The said Samuel Greenhalgh has since administered the affairs of the Company as voluntary liquidator thereof, with a view to winding up the Company. The said proceedings were an entirely voluntary act on the part of the shareholders, and were in no way necessitated by the pressure of creditors or by the financial position of the Company.

6. Shortly after his appointment the liquidator intimated to the petitioners and also to the landlords, under the various leases above mentioned, that he did not intend to adopt any of the said leases. Notwithstanding the said intimation the liquidator proceeded to expose the mill subjects, together with the right to the leases, for public sale, but did not succeed in effecting a sale thereof. He has also taken possession of the stock and materials in the mill premises, and has partially realised the same.

7. The liquidator also advertised for claims of creditors to be lodged before 1st March 1907, and the petitioners replied, intimating that they held the Company bound to continue to implement the tenants' obligations under the leases, and refused to treat their whole bargain with the Company as repudiated. Without prejudice to the position so stated, the petitioners further intimated that their claims as for a breach of future obligations under the said contract by the Company would be £5000.

8. In answer to a request for information by the petitioners, the liquidator stated that he estimated that the Company's estate would realise about £3000, against which there were claims by trade creditors for about £500, and other two claims amounting to about £1000. It accordingly appeared, and is the case, that apart from the petitioners' claims in respect of future obligations under the leases, which claims, as already explained, the petitioners do not desire to make or ask payment of at present, the Company was and is perfectly solvent.

9. A correspondence thereafter took place between the agents for the petitioners and the agents of the liquidator. Shortly stated, the claim for the liquidator was that the petitioners should lodge a formal affidavit and claim, the effect of which would be to compel the petitioners to value and deduct their security, consisting of the real burden imposed upon the mill subjects by the disposition and assignation above referred to. Failing the petitioners lodging such an affidavit and claim, the liquidator refused to give any undertaking that he would not proceed to distribute the assets. The petitioners, on the other hand, maintained that the Company was not entitled, while still solvent by going into liquidation, to repudiate all its future obligations under the disposition and assignation, and to force the petitioners to claim as in a sequestration for breach of all such obligations, but that the petitioners were entitled to hold the Company to its bargain, and to prevent the assets of the Company being distributed among the shareholders, without due provision being made for the relief of the petitioners from these obligations, as they should become prestable.

10. At Whitsunday 1907 rents again become due under the leases, which the petitioners have been compelled to pay to the extent of £109, 12s. 7d., being the half-year's rents, less income tax and owners' proportion of local rates, and they have requested the liquidator to reimburse them for this amount out of the free assets of the Company, but the liquidator refuses to do so unless in this case also a formal affidavit and claim is lodged. The petitioners maintain that as there are free assets available they are entitled to payment without reference to their security.

11. The mill property, which forms the subject of the petitioners' security, is one which it is exceedingly difficult to value, and if the petitioners were bound at once to make a valuation and lodge a claim for the balance of their full claim present and future against the Company, it might result in their failing to obtain payment of 20s. per £. Whereas, if the free assets of the Company are reserved and applied in payment of the rents due under the leases as they accrue, the petitioners are satisfied that the subjects of security would in the end sufficiently protect them against loss. In these circumstances the petitioners have a material interest to object to being compelled to make a claim as in a sequestration for the purpose of sharing in the assets, unless they are bound to do so. They do not object to the liquidator paying other creditors, but only to his returning capital to the shareholders while the obligations of the Company remain unfulfilled.

Answers were lodged for the liquidator. The only matters contained therein which require to be mentioned were as follows:—

Ans. 5. Explained that the business of the Company was being carried on at a loss, that the Directors were of opinion that to continue the business would result in further loss, and that, the position of affairs having been laid before a meeting of shareholders, they resolved upon liquidation.

Ans. 11. Denied that the petitioners' contentions are sound. The mill property is capable of valuation, like any other property of a similar class. The petitioners are in no worse position in making a claim and valuing their security than they would be in a sequestration. The retention of the free assets, as proposed by the petitioners, would involve keeping the liquidation open for twelve years or thereby. Unless the security subjects are realised soon, they will, through depreciation, become of little value. The petitioners have, for the first time, in this petition taken up the position that they have no objection to the liquidator paying the other creditors of the Company. Hitherto the liquidator has been unable to distribute the assets of the Company, or to pay the Company's debts, in the absence of an affidavit and claim by the petitioners, which would permit of the money value of their claims being ascertained, and in view of the fact that the whole assets of the Company are estimated to realise not more than £3000, without taking into account the paper mill, and machinery and plant therein, over which the petitioners hold a security by way of real burden for the payment and implement of the rents and obligations of the leases of the water rights. If the petitioners' estimate of the money value of their claim be correct, then, looking to the claims upon the Company's assets, the Company would be insolvent, unless the security held by the petitioners would yield £4000. The liquidator has been unable hitherto to pay the debts of the Company in consequence of the petitioners' intimation, and their refusal to lodge an affidavit and claim.

The liquidator respectfully submits that (1) as regards the future and contingent claims of the petitioners, they are bound to lodge a claim, and if they desire to draw a dividend, to have the said claim valued by the liquidator, and that (2) as regards the rents due at Whitsunday 1907, the petitioners are ordinary creditors holding a security, and that they have no excuse for omitting to lodge a claim, and value and deduct their security as in a sequestration.

The questions on which the opinion of the Court was asked were as follows:—

(1) Are the petitioners entitled to refuse to lodge an affidavit and claim as for breach by the Company of its future obligations under the disposition and assignation above mentioned, and at the same time to prevent the liquidator from distributing the assets of the Company among the shareholders without making due provision for the implement of these obligations as they from time to time become prestable?

(2) Are the petitioners entitled, without reference to the security constituted in their favour by the said disposition and assignation, to be reimbursed out of the assets of the Company the amount of the rents due at Whitsunday 1907 under the leases assigned to the Company and paid by the petitioners?

The Companies Act 1886, sect. 4, provides as follows:—

In the winding up of any company under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1886, whose registered office is in Scotland, and where the winding up shall commence after the passing of this Act, the general and special rules in regard to voting and ranking for payment of dividends, provided by the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856, sections forty-nine to sixty-six inclusive, or any other rules in regard thereto which may be in force for the time being in the sequestration of the estates of bankrupts in Scotland, shall, so far as consistent with the tenor of the said recited Acts, apply to creditors of such companies voting in matters relating to the winding up, and ranking for payment of dividends; and for this purpose sequestration shall be taken to mean liquidation, trustee to mean liquidator, and sheriff to mean the court.

Argued for the Petitioners: A creditor with a contingent claim did not need to claim at once. He might have assets put aside to meet the debt when it arose. He was not bound to value it. He might apply to have it valued if he wanted to rank at once; but that was in his option, there was no obligation on him. Power to wind up might of course be exercised by a solvent company; but sect. 4 of the 1886 Act brought in the procedure in a sequestration only where the creditor wanted to vote or rank, and therefore it applied only when the Company was insolvent (Gartness Iron Co., 1870, L.R. 10 Eq. 412; Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron Co., 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 98; Gooch v. London Banking Association, 1885, 32 Chan. Div. 41). The petitioners were not to be put in a worse but rather in a better position than they would be in a sequestration. The Companies Acts did not anticipate any more summary proceedings in the winding up of a company than in a sequestration. A company could not simply by going into liquidation get rid of its obligations (New Oriental Bank Ltd. [1895], 1 Chan. 753; In re Panther Lead Co. Ltd. [1896], 1 Chan. 978). There was nothing in the law of liquidation to compel a creditor, when there were ample assets, to convert his claim from one form to another. There were no liabilities competing with the petitioners. They asked not a ranking but implement of the Company's obligations.

Argued for the Respondent: The position of the petitioners was unreasonable. According to their contention, if the lease was for ninety-nine years the creditor would be entitled to keep the liquidation open all that time and so prevent the Company from being wound up. By going into liquidation the Company was in breach of its contracts, and the creditors could no longer demand implement of their debts. The debts must be valued and a ranking taken. The Gartness Iron Co. and Elphinstone cases were before the 1886 Act. Gooch was decided on the ground that there was no machinery in England to enable a contingent creditor to make up his claim properly. The only thing decided in the Oriental Bank case was that the lessor was entitled to claim as if the lease was for fourteen years without a break. In Craig's Claim [1895], 1 Ch. 267, the question was considered as still open, and it could not therefore be practically decided by the English cases. In the Panther Co. case it was held that proof may at once be made of all contingent claims on leases. A contingent creditor must claim in a liquidation, otherwise his claim cannot be proved (Hardy v. Fothergill, 1888, L.R. 13 A.C. 351). The English cases quoted for the petitioners went no further than to say that, if a claim was put in and the liquidator refused to deal with it, he might be compelled to retain funds to meet it when it became due. In reading these cases it had to be kept in view that sect. 158 of the 1862 Act applied in England only to solvent companies. Insolvent companies were dealt with by sect. 10 of the Judicature Act (Palmer's Company Precedents, II. 439).

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative.

Lord Low.—The petitioners are the testamentary trustees of the late Sir William Collins, who was proprietor of certain paper mills near Bowling known as the Milton Mills. In connection with the mills, Sir William Collins had acquired certain leases from neighbouring proprietors, the main object of which appears to have been to obtain a supply of water for the use of the mills. I understand that these leases have still about twelve years to run. The total rental payable under the leases is £278 per annum, of which £215 are due under leases which exclude assignees. All the leases contained obligations undertaken by the tenant in regard to maintenance, restoration, and so forth.

In 1906 the petitioners sold the Milton Mills to the respondents, Borland & Co. Ltd., and assigned the leases to them. It is admitted that as regards the leases in which assignees are excluded, the landlord did not accept the Company as the sole tenant, and accordingly the petitioners remain liable for rent and the other obligations of these leases. The Company, however, bound themselves to relieve the petitioners of all the obligations in the leases, and these were declared to be real burdens upon the mill property.

On 5th January 1907 the shareholders passed a resolution that the Company be wound up voluntarily. The reason for that course being adopted was that the business was being conducted at a loss, and it was thought not to be prudent to continue it longer, but there does not seem to have been anything in the way of pressure by creditors, or any suggestion that the Company was not able to pay its debts. Indeed, apart from any claim which might be open to the petitioners as for a future and contingent debt, it is admitted that, after paying all the creditors, there would be a substantial balance remaining in the liquidator's hands.

In these circumstances this liquidator maintains that the petitioners are bound to lodge an affidavit and claim (as in a sequestration under the Bankruptcy Acts), stating the amount at which they estimate their contingent debt, and valuing and deducting the security by the real burden over the mill property.

The petitioners, on the other hand, contend that, the Company not being insolvent, they cannot be compelled to lodge a claim, as if the proceedings were in bankruptcy, for a debt which is both future and contingent. They are quite willing that the trade creditors should be paid in full, but they demand that any surplus remaining should not be divided among the shareholders, but should be retained to relieve them of any claims on the part of the landlords which they may be compelled to meet.

This is a case in which the petitioners have good reasons for objecting to lodge, for adjudication in the liquidation, a claim estimating the amount which may become due to them. If it were assumed that they would be liable for all the prestations of the leases during the periods still to run, there would, of course, be no difficulty in regard to the money rents, but it is difficult to see how an equivalent in money to obligations to maintain such structures as reservoirs or dams could be arrived at with any approach to certainty, because presumably the extent of such obligations must depend in large measure upon circumstances which cannot be foreseen. On the other hand, although it may be extremely improbable, I suppose that it is not impossible that the mills might be sold, and the leases assigned to a papermaker who would be able to carry on the business to a profit, and who would pay the rents and implement the other obligations of the leases. If that were to happen, the result would be that no debt at all would in fact become due to the petitioners by the Company. Therefore, if the petitioners were compelled to lodge an affidavit and claim and to accept a present payment, they might very likely get either a great deal too little or a great deal too much.

In these circumstances, if the Companies Act 1886 had not been passed, I think the judgment of the House of Lords in Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co., 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 98, would have been a clear authority in the petitioners' favour. That, indeed, was hardly disputed, but it was argued that such considerations as were given effect to in that case are excluded by the provisions of the 4th section of the Act of 1886.

That section provides that in the winding up of any company under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1886, the general and special rules for voting and ranking for payment of dividends provided by sects. 49 to 66 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856 shall "so far as consistent with the tenor of the said recited Acts, apply to creditors of such companies voting in matters relating to the winding up and ranking for payment of dividends."

Now, I agree that if that provision applies to this case, the petitioners must lodge an affidavit and claim, and the liquidator must put a value on their debt as at the date of the valuation. It is plain, however, that the provision is not to be applicable to every winding up under the Companies Acts, because the rules in regard to voting and ranking are only to apply "so far as consistent with the tenor of the Companies Act," and to creditors "ranking for payment of dividends." That being so, it seems to be clear that one case to which the enactment would not apply would be where the shareholders of a solvent company, possessed of ample means to pay all its creditors in full, chose to discontinue business and to wind the company up. Such a winding up would be quite competent under the Companies Acts, but there would be no need to follow the complicated procedure of the incorporated sections of the Bankruptcy Act, because there would be no question of the payment of a dividend only, or of the ranking of creditors. The creditors would simply be paid in full; any surplus assets would be divided among the shareholders; and the company would then be dissolved.

Now, this is not quite a case of the kind which I have figured, because if a present value were put upon the petitioners' claim, it may be that the assets of the company would not be sufficient to pay in full such estimated amount, and also the debts due to other creditors. Any difficulty, however, which that circumstance might have raised seems to me to be removed by the consent which the petitioners give to the other creditors being paid in full. If that be done, I do not think that the shareholders will be really prejudiced by the adoption of the course proposed by the petitioners, because it seems to be very improbable that whatever course is adopted, there will be any surplus for division among the shareholders. It is true that the result of allowing the petitioners' claim to stand over may be to postpone the formal dissolution of the Company for some time, but that would not hurt the shareholders, because postponement of the formal dissolution cannot add in any way to the liabilities and losses which they have already incurred.

I am therefore of opinion that the first question stated in the petition should be answered in the affirmative.

I. Stated Case.

II. Appeal from Sheriff Court at Ayr.

Two appeals from the Sheriff Court at Ayr were before the Court. The first was an appeal by William Baird & Co. Ltd. in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, between the appellants and David Stevenson, miner.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Shairp) stated the following case:—

This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, in which the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. crave the Court to review the weekly payment of 13s. sterling which they agreed to pay to the said David Stevenson from the 11th day of June 1906 during his total incapacity, as compensation under the said Act, in respect of personal injury caused to the said David Stevenson by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a miner in the service of the said William Baird and Co. Ltd. in their Berryhill No. 2 Pit, on or about the 28th day of May 1906, and to end or diminish the said weekly payment as from the 10th day of September 1906, or from any subsequent date, all as the Court might see proper, under and in terms of the said Act, first schedule, sect. 12, and to find the said David Stevenson liable in the expenses of the arbitration.

2ND DIV.

Baird & Co. Ltd. v. Stevenson.

The said William Baird & Co. Ltd. paid the said weekly compensation to the said David Stevenson till and including the 10th day of September 1906.

A memorandum of the said agreement between the parties was on the 3rd day of January 1907 recorded by the said David Stevenson in the special register kept by the sheriff clerk at Ayr in terms of the said Act. On 1st February 1907 the respondent formally claimed compensation from the appellants at the said rate of 13s. per week from and after said 10th September 1906, but appellants declined payment. The application in this arbitration was presented on the 14th day of February 1907. At said date the appellants were making no weekly payment to the respondent.

In the seventh article of the condescendence annexed to said application the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. aver that "defender's (the said David Stevenson's) incapacity by reason of his said injuries did not last beyond 10th September 1906, and at said date he was able to resume his employment, and to earn as much on an average as he earned before the accident. Defender's (the said David Stevenson's) incapacity then terminated, and his compensation should be ended as from that date. Defender (the said David Stevenson) resumed work on 28th November 1906, and has since been earning as good wages as he did before the accident. His compensation should in any case be ended as at 28th November 1906."

In the seventh article of the said David Stevenson's defences the said averments of the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. are denied, except that he admits that on 28th November 1906 he obtained light employment from the said William Baird & Co. Ltd., in which, however, he had not been able to earn anything like the same wages which he earned before the accident, and it is explained "that the defender (the said David Stevenson) having obtained light employment, is agreeable that the compensation payable under said agreement should, until the further orders of Court, be reduced to the sum of 7s. weekly, as from the date when the pursuers (the said William Baird & Co. Ltd.) agree to accept this offer."

The said David Stevenson pleaded that as the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. have refused to pay the compensation due to the said David Stevenson since the said 10th day of September 1906, and were, when the defences were lodged, making no weekly payment to him, the application was incompetent, and should be dismissed, but on 19th March 1907, after hearing parties' procurators, I repelled the said plea, and allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments, and the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. a conjunct probation, and fixed the 27th day of March 1907 as a diet of proof.

On 22nd March 1907 a minute was lodged for the said David Stevenson, stating that "in respect he is now medically advised that he is fit to resume his former employment as a miner, the defender (the said David Stevenson) consents to the weekly payment being ended."

On the first ordinary Court day thereafter, viz., on 26th March 1907, I, in respect of said minute, discharged the said diet of proof, and thereafter heard parties' procurators. At the hearing the law agent of the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. asked for a proof of the said averments contained in the said seventh article of their condescendence. On the authority of Steel v. The Oakbank Oil Co. Ltd., 16th December 1902, 5 F. 244, and The Pumpherston Oil Co. Ltd. v. Cavaney, 23rd June 1903, 5 F. 963, I was of opinion that I was only entitled and empowered by said Act to end or diminish the said weekly payments as at the date of my award in the appellants' application. Accordingly, on 1st April 1907 I issued an interlocutor in which I held that the said averments were irrelevant, and refused the said motion. I also found, in terms of said minute, that the said David Stevenson's incapacity had terminated, and I ended the said weekly payments as from the said 1st day of April 1907. Lastly, I found the said David Stevenson liable in expenses to the said William Baird & Co. Ltd.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court is :—

Whether, in the circumstances before narrated, the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. were entitled to a proof of the averments contained in the said seventh article of their condescendence as craved by their law agent, or whether, on the authority of the above-mentioned cases, I was right in refusing to grant such a proof?

The second appeal was in a petition in the Sheriff Court, in which, founding on Schedule II. (8) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, William Baird & Company craved the Sheriff "to rectify the special register kept by the sheriff clerk of the County of Ayr, at Ayr, for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven, by expunging therefrom a memorandum setting forth an agreement between the pursuers and defender, recorded therein on third January nineteen hundred and seven, or by altering or amending in such manner as to the Court may seem just, the terms of the said memorandum as set forth in the said special register, or by such other means as the Court may deem necessary."

The facts are sufficiently apparent from the narrative of the Sheriff in the stated case supra. The pursuers averred, inter alia :—

COND. 11. Pursuers desire rectification of said register on the following grounds, viz. :—There was no agreement subsisting between the parties on 1st October 1906, the date when the said memorandum was lodged. In any event, there was no agreement subsisting between the parties at the date when the said memorandum was recorded on 3rd January 1907. The pursuers, in or about the beginning of September 1906, requested the defender to submit himself to examination by Dr Stewart, Auchinleck, a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by them. Dr Stewart reported that the defender's incapacity had ceased, and that he was able to resume work as a miner. The said report was communicated to the defender. Defender did not intimate to the pursuers any dissatisfaction with said report and did not submit himself to examination by one of the medical referees appointed under the Act. Pursuers paid compensation at the rate agreed upon down to 10th September 1906. The defender did not thereafter intimate to the pursuers that he claimed any further compensation until 1st February 1907, when he informed them that he claimed compensation at the rate of 13s. a week, as from 10th September 1906. Pursuers aver that defender's incapacity had ceased at 10th September 1906, and that he was then quite able to resume work. They further aver that on 28th November 1906 defender resumed his work in their employment, and that he has since that date earned the average wage of workmen engaged in the same class of work. The agreement originally made between the parties was that pursuers should pay defender compensation at the rate of 13s. a week during the period of his incapacity. The said period of incapacity had terminated on 10th September 1906, when defender was examined by Dr Stewart, or in any case on 28th November 1906, when defender resumed his work. Accordingly the said agreement had ceased to subsist before the Sheriff granted warrant to record it. The defender has obtained an extract of the memorandum as registered in said special register, and has charged the pursuers thereunder to make payment to him of compensation at the rate of 13s. a week from 10th September 1906 till the date of the charge. In the circumstances above set forth, it has been found necessary to apply to the Court for rectification of the register, and the rectification suggested by the pursuers is that the memorandum recorded in said special register should be expunged or deleted. Admitted that the pursuers have brought a suspension of the charge under the said recorded memorandum, and that they have also applied to the Sheriff as arbitrator, under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, to review the amount of the compensation payable to defender.

The Pursuers pleaded :—

"1. The agreement founded upon by pursuers and set forth in the memorandum libelled having ceased to subsist at the date when the said memorandum was presented for registration, the said special register should be rectified accordingly.

"2. The agreement founded upon by pursuers and set forth in the memorandum libelled having ceased to subsist as at the date when warrant was granted to record it, the said special register should be rectified accordingly."

The Defender pleaded inter alia :—

"3. The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support their pleas, the action should be dismissed."

On 1st April 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute pronounced the following interlocutor :—

" . . . . sustains the third plea in law stated for the defender, and accordingly dismisses the action . . . ."

Argued for the Appellants : I. In the stated case :—The cases of Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co. (16th December 1902, 5 F. 244, 10 S.L.T. 318) and Pumpherston Oil Co. Ltd. v. Cavaney (23rd June 1903, 5 F. 963, 11 S.L.T. 101), which decided that in an application for review under Schedule I. (12), the Sheriff's award could not go back beyond the date of his decision, were wrongly decided, and the present case should be sent to the Whole Court for the reconsideration of these decisions, in which the correct view of the law had been taken by the dissenting judges, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren, following the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in Morton & Co. Ltd. v. Woodward [1902], 2 K.B. 276. There were two questions calling for determination. Firstly, Could the Sheriff's award go back to the date of the application for review? It could; see opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren referred to supra, and the decision in Morton. Secondly, Could it date back to the period at which the workman's incapacity ceased? It could. This was the reasonable inference to be drawn from the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren, and from the opinions in Morton, in which the question was not directly raised. The scheme of the Act was to give compensation only during incapacity (see particularly schedule I. (11)), and the Court had always endeavoured to interpret the Act in accordance with that scheme (Cammick v. Glasgow Iron and Steel Co. Ltd., 26th Nov. 1901, 4 F. 198, 9 S.L.T. 218; Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168, 11 S.L.T. 455; Nimmo & Co. Ltd. v. Fisher, 15 S.L.T. 14; Colville & Sons Ltd. v. Tigue, 1905, 8 F. 179, 13 S.L.T. 571). Ultimately, it was admitted, the appellants could arrive at the result they desired (viz., the limitation of their liability to pay compensation to the period of incapacity) by means of a suspension. That, however, was calling in a Common Law remedy into statutory arbitration proceedings, and was quite unnecessary, seeing that the "review" provided by sect. 12 of Schedule I. was perfectly general and entirely unlimited as regarded time. The cases of Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co. Ltd. v. M'Kay (14th July 1903, 5 F. 1121, 11 S.L.T. 275), and Strannigan v. Baird & Co. Ltd. (7th June 1904, 6 F. 784, 12 S.L.T. 152), were also referred to. II. In the action :—Under Schedule II. (8) the Sheriff was empowered to rectify the register at any time. The expunging of an agreement for compensation which, owing to the recovery of the injured person, was no longer operative, was clearly "rectification." The section was in no way limited. See Hughes v. The Thistle Chemical Co. and others, 1907, 14 S.L.T. 916, per The Lord President.

Argued for the Respondent : I. In the stated case :—The case was ruled by Steel, cit. supra, and Pumpherston Oil Co., cit. supra, which were rightly decided and required no reconsideration. Neither of these cases, not even the opinions of the dissenting judges, afforded any support to the view that the Sheriff's review could date back to the period at which the incapacity ceased. All that the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren said was that in their opinion it could date back to the period at which the application for review was brought, and that was the utmost that was decided by the English case of Morton, cit. supra. But on this point they were clearly wrong, the recorded memorandum of agreement being equivalent to a decree of Court, and remaining in force until an alteration had been effected by the Court, which could only take place at the moment when the Sheriff pronounced his decree. II. In the action:—The petition was incompetent: that was really the opinion of the Lord President in Hughes, cit. supra—the total "expunging" of a memorandum was not "rectification" within the meaning of Schedule II. (8), rectification being confined to the bringing of the recorded agreement into conformity with the actual agreement. Sect. 8 had nothing to do with the merits of the dispute between employer and workman. The appellants were virtually asking the Sheriff to do that which even the Court of Session could not do, viz., review his own judgment. See Binning v. Easton & Sons, 1906, 8 F. 407, 13 S.L.T. 783; Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 1907, S.C. 3, 14 S.L.T. 341; Blake [1904], 1 K.B. 503; Macdonald v. Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Co. Ltd., 1905, 8 F. 8, 13 S.L.T. 428.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutors:—

In the Stated Case: "Answer the question of law therein stated by declaring that the arbitrator was right in refusing to grant the proof asked for by the appellants; therefore affirm the refusal. . . ."

In the Appeal: "Dismiss the appeal and affirm the said interlocutor appealed against. . . ."

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case raises the same question which has already been decided in both Divisions of the Court in the cases of Steel and Cavaney. The decision in both cases was by a majority only, and was contrary to an English decision, and in this Division I dissented from the judgment. Although I have been unable to see ground for altering the opinion which I formed in the case which was decided here, I should be prepared to bow to the decisions pronounced in the Divisions, and in respect of the law laid down in these decisions, to answer the question in this case in accordance with these decisions. But had the present Act of Parliament been still the code dealing with such matters, I might have been moved by the fact that, as I believe, your Lordships shared the doubts I had as to the soundness of these judgments, and might in that view have been inclined to concur in sending the case to be dealt with by the whole Court. But as there is now a new Act under which all such questions can be finally decided for both countries by the House of Lords—which was not possible under the old Act—I agree that it would be wrong to cause more litigation and expense in a case, the decision of which could have no bearing upon any question of interpretation or practice under the new Act.

I therefore concur in what is proposed by your Lordships. I concur also in the view expressed by your Lordships as to the action of the Sheriff-Substitute upon the application to rectify the register.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—We have here to deal (1) with a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and (2) with a petition to rectify the Special Register kept by the Sheriff Clerk of Ayrshire for the purposes of that Act. The material facts are, that the accident happened on 28th May 1906; that the employers at once admitted liability under the Act, and agreed to pay the workman at the rate of 13s. a week (being one-half of his weekly earnings) during the period of his incapacity; that these weekly payments were made down to 10th September 1906; that the employers then discontinued them, alleging that incapacity had ceased; that the workman had the memorandum registered on 3rd January 1907; that the employers instituted an arbitration for review of the weekly payments on 14th February 1907; that on 22nd March 1907 the workman lodged a minute stating that he was now medically advised that he was fit to resume his former employment as a miner, and consenting to the weekly payments being ended; and that the Sheriff in that arbitration, on 1st April 1907, found in terms of the said minute, that the workman's incapacity had terminated; and he ended the weekly payments as from the date of his award on 1st April 1907. He fixed that date on the authority of Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co. Ltd., 5 F. 244, and Pumpherston Oil Co. Ltd. v. Cavaney, 5 F. 963. In doing so, there is no doubt that the Sheriff was right, because he was bound by these judgments none the less that one judge in each case dissented (the Lord Justice-Clerk in Steel's case and Lord M'Laren in Cavaney's), and none the less also that a case in the English Court of Appeal, Morton & Co., Ltd. v. Woodward [1902], 2 K.B. 276, had been decided the other way, and was accordingly in both Steel and Cavaney disapproved.

But this stated case is avowedly brought in the hope of getting the two cases in Scotland reconsidered by the whole Court; and undoubtedly the circumstances might well warrant such a proceeding, both on the ground of the importance of the question involved, and also on the ground that there were dissenting opinions in each Division of this Court and a divergence of opinion between the Appeal Courts of the two countries. There are, however, two considerations of a practical kind which I think are sufficient to prevent us from taking that course. The one consideration is that the Act of 1897 is repealed, except to a limited and temporary extent, and the Act of 1906, which has taken its place, provides for an appeal to the House of Lords, which the other did not. There is now, therefore, provision made for a simpler and more authoritative judgment, on what may be made a test case affecting an imperial statute, than any which could be furnished by a larger tribunal confined to one of the three kingdoms. The other consideration is that although the Act of 1906 does not deal expressly, as it very well might have done, with a question which had been the subject of conflicting decisions in England and Scotland, it does contain a certain number of new provisions which, in the course of working out the new Act, may be found to affect materially the vexed question of when incapacity must be held to have ceased, as affecting liability to pay compensation. It is not necessary to say more about an Act which has just come into operation than that this is a reasonably possible result. I refer particularly to paragraphs 15 and 20 of the first schedule and paragraph 9 (b) of the second schedule. At all events, I think it would be a highly inconvenient proceeding to send a case to the Whole Court on the construction of an Act which is no longer law for the future. For these reasons I think we should, in the stated case, find that the Sheriff was right in refusing to allow the proof which the appellants asked.

In the petition to the Sheriff to rectify the register under the proviso at the end of paragraph 8 of the second schedule to the Act of 1897, I think the Sheriff was also right. The appellants' object in presenting that petition was to reach, by a different route, the same end as by their stated case. There are, scattered through the decisions in this country, a few suggestions that the Sheriff's power to rectify the register might be appealed to for this purpose. But it is a significant fact that no single decision in any of the three kingdoms can be cited as supporting that contention; and it seems to me that the very idea of rectifying the register points clearly to correcting some incidental mistake which has crept into the register, and not to altering the whole basis on which the existing entry proceeds. I am therefore for affirming the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute in this action also.

Lord Low.—In regard to the question raised in the stated case, it is plain that the interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute was in conformity with the cases of Steel v. The Oakbank Oil Co., and The Pumpherston Oil Co. v. Cavaney. In both of these cases it was held that in an application for review of weekly payments, the arbitrator can only end, diminish or increase the payments from the date of his decision in the application. The case of Steel was decided in this division, and that of Cavaney in the First Division, the Lord Justice-Clerk dissenting in the former case and Lord M'Laren in the latter. Further, in Steel's case Lord Adam was sitting in this division, the Court consisting of The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young and Lord Adam. The latter was also sitting in the First Division when Cavaney's case was decided, and the result was that, taking the two divisions together, four judges were in favour of the view which was upheld and two against it. In these circumstances, as the question is undoubtedly one of great difficulty, and of much importance, I confess that (although I have formed no independent opinion upon the merits) I have much sympathy with the desire of the appellants that the question should be reconsidered. Seeing, however, that judgments to the same effect have been pronounced by both divisions, it is plain that reconsideration would require to be by the whole Court, and I agree with Lord Stormonth-Darling that in the circumstances it is inexpedient that that course should be adopted.

The judgments in Steel and in Cavaney were pronounced in December 1902 and June 1903 respectively, and since these dates they have been regarded and followed as settling the law so far as the Act of 1897 was concerned, and now that that Act has been repealed and a new Act has come into operation, it seems to me that it would be most undesirable to review a rule which has been in operation for so considerable a period in regard to an Act which has now expired. That consideration might not have been so strong if it had been plain that the question of the date at which an arbitrator can deal with weekly payments was precisely the same under the new Act as it was under the old. In regard to that, it is sufficient to say that changes have been introduced in the new Act which may have an important bearing on the question. Further, even if it should turn out that the question is precisely the same under the new Act as under the old, a judgment of the whole Court would not be final, because under the new Act there is an appeal to the House of Lords.

I also agree that the Sheriff-Substitute was right in dismissing the application for rectification of the register. It is not now disputed that the memorandum which was registered correctly states the terms of a verbal agreement which was come to by the parties, whereby the employers admitted their liability under the Act, and the amount of the weekly payments was fixed. When application was made by the workman for registration of a memorandum the employers disputed its genuineness, and in terms of the Act of Sederunt, the matter came before the Sheriff-Substitute, who, after allowing certain amendments to the memorandum, granted warrant to the Sheriff Clerk to record it.

Now it has been settled by the case of Binning v. Easton & Sons, 8 F. 407, that the granting or refusing by the Sheriff of a warrant to record a memorandum of an agreement is a ministerial act which cannot be reviewed. It is further to be remembered that if the Sheriff Clerk under the Act, or the Sheriff under the Act of Sederunt, is satisfied as to the genuineness of the memorandum, it is imperative to record it. It must be taken, therefore, in this case that the memorandum was properly recorded.

Baird & Co. Ltd. v. Stevenson.
Lord Low.

The question, however, is, whether the employers are entitled to have the register rectified by deletion of the memorandum therefrom? There may be cases in which the power given to the Sheriff to rectify the register would justify him in altogether expunging therefrom a memorandum which had been registered, but I do not think that this is one of them. By the agreement the employers agreed to pay the workman a certain amount weekly during incapacity, and they aver that they did so; but that before the memorandum was recorded the incapacity had entirely ceased, and that accordingly they had stopped making the weekly payments. They therefore plead that the agreement set forth in the memorandum having "ceased to subsist at the date when the said memorandum was presented for registration, the said special register should be rectified accordingly"—that is, by expunging the memorandum.

If that plea be well founded, it seems to me that the result would be very anomalous. I have already pointed out that the Sheriff, when he was satisfied that the memorandum was genuine, was bound to grant warrant for its registration, but the employers' contention is that he could at any time thereafter order it to be taken out of the register if he was of opinion that it had been implemented and could no longer be enforced by the workman. I do not think that such a course would be competent, because in my judgment the authority given to the Sheriff to rectify the register does not, in an application to rectify, empower him to determine questions as to the rights and liabilities of parties under the agreement. I agree with the view expressed by Lord Kyllachy in the case of Binning, in regard to the statutory register. He said—"Without excluding the common law rights of parties to enforce their agreements in any competent manner, the scheme of the statute was to provide a short and inexpensive road to the statutory register, which, once reached, should confer a prima facie right to summary diligence." If that view be sound, then registration of a memorandum of an agreement settled nothing as to the rights and liabilities of the parties, except in so far as it confers a prima facie right upon the workman. But after all, that only means that the onus is laid upon the employer to show that the agreement has been implemented, and in my opinion his remedies at common law are in no way excluded.

Besides the application for review of the weekly payments and the petition for rectification of the register, we were informed that the employers had brought a suspension of a charge upon the registered agreement which was depending in the Outer House. If we had followed the course of ordinary minutes of debate in the stated case, it would probably have been advisable to do the same thing in the petition and in the suspension, in which case the Lord Ordinary might have been asked to report the latter proceedings. As, however, we are not following that course, there is nothing to be gained by interfering with the ordinary procedure in the suspension.

Lord Ardwall concurred.—17*th July* 1907.

Special Case.

This was a Special Case brought for the determination of various questions arising out of the testamentary writings of Mr James Dickie, solicitor and town clerk of Irvine, who died at Irvine on 23rd January 1906.

After his death there were found in his repositories two validly executed trust dispositions and settlements, one dated 6th July 1860, and the other dated 31st December 1897. No other writings of a testamentary character were discovered.

By the trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860, the testator conveyed to Alexander Gilmour, writer in Irvine, as his sole trustee and executor, the whole heritable and moveable means and effects, of whatever kind or description, then belonging or which might belong to him at his death. The trust purposes were that, after payment of debts, the trustee should "pay the following legacies, viz.: £30 to my brother George, £20 to my sister Mary, £10 to my sister Margaret, and £10 to my sister Jessie . . . . and I beg the said Alexander Gilmour will accept from my means ten guineas as a small token of friendship: and I direct the whole residue of my estate to be divided, in proportion to the sums herein above bequeathed to them respectively, among my brother and sisters above named."

By the said trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897, the testator conveyed to certain trustees the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at his decease. The purposes of the trust were — First, for payment of his debts and funeral expenses and the expenses of executing the trust; Second, "for payment or delivery of such legacies, bequests, annuities, or other provisions as I may leave, bequeath, make, or provide by any writing under my hand, however informal the same may be, and though found in my repositories or in the custody of any other party undelivered at the time of my decease." The third purpose of the trust was in the following terms:—"In the third place, for payment, application, and delivery of the residue of my said means and estate, or the proceeds thereof, including the interest and income thereof, in the way or manner to be directed or appointed by any writing or writings under my hand, however informal the same may be, and though found in my repositories or in the custody of anyone to whom I may have entrusted the same undelivered at the time of my death; and I hereby declare that the writings, for the execution of which provision is made in the second and third purposes of this trust, may be in the form of deeds or of letters addressed by me to my trustees, or memoranda left by me for their instruction, and shall be good, valid, and effectual though executed without a date, or although defective in any legal formality; and my trustees shall comply with, carry out, and make effectual all such directions and instructions as shall be contained in any such deeds, letters, or writings in the same way as if the purposes thereof had been herein contained and expressed; and no one shall have right or power to challenge, quarrel, or impugn any such deeds, letters, or writings on account of any informality or legal defect, or on any other ground whatever, if the same shall be clearly expressive of my wish, will, and intention; and the same shall be held to be part and parcel hereof, and shall have the like force and effect in every respect as if the directions, instructions, or provisions thereof had been herein inserted and expressed, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding; and in default of my leaving any such written directions or instructions then my trustees shall dispone convey deliver or pay over the whole of the residue of my means and estate heritable and moveable real and personal to my next of kin according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland."

The testator, who was born on 19th March 1833, was never married. His father died on 17th June 1860, aged 67, and his mother died on 2nd August 1853, aged 60. He was survived by two sisters, namely (a) Mrs Mary Dickie or Rutherford, who died on 6th November 1906, and whose testamentary trustees were the parties of the second part, and (b) Miss Agnes Orr Dickie, the party to the special case of the third part. He was predeceased by a brother, Mr George Dickie, who died on or about 24th March 1887. Mr George Dickie left four children, all alive at the date of the special case, who were group (a) of the parties of the fifth part. The testator was also predeceased by a sister, Mrs Margaret Dickie or Jamieson, who died on 9th June 1891. Group (b) of the parties of the fifth part were (1) such of the children of Mrs Jamieson as survived the testator, and (2) the children of a daughter of Mrs Jamieson, viz. Mrs Agnes Jamieson or Campbell, who predeceased the testator, having died on 12th January 1895. The testator was also predeceased by a sister, Mrs Jessie Dickie or Murray, who died on 31st May 1879. Group (c) of the parties of the fifth part were such of the children of Mrs Murray as survived the testator. The testator was survived by no brother, and by no sisters other than Mrs Mary Dickie or Rutherford and Miss Agnes Orr Dickie. He was survived by no children of predeceasing brothers or sisters who were not among the parties of the fifth part. The only child of a predeceasing brother or sister who predeceased the testator, leaving issue who survived him, was Mrs Agnes Jamieson or Campbell. George Dickie, the eldest son of the deceased George Dickie, who was the only brother of the testator, was the party of the fourth part as the testator's heir in heritage. The parties of the first part were the testator's testamentary trustees.

The following statement of the questions of difficulty in connection with the testator's writings, and the contentions of parties upon them, is taken from the special case.

"Questions have arisen as to whether said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 was revoked wholly or in part by the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897; assuming it to have been revoked, what is the true construction of the latter trust disposition and settlement; whether, assuming the former trust disposition and settlement not to have been revoked, or to have been only partly revoked, the latter trust disposition and settlement came into effect; and what is the true construction of both settlements?

"The parties of the second part, as representing Mrs Rutherford, a sister of the testator, who survived him, maintain that said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 has not been revoked, and that under it they, as representing Mrs Rutherford, are entitled to a legacy of £20 and to two seventh parts of the residue. They further maintain that on a true construction of the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897, the remaining five-sevenths of residue fall to be equally divided between them, as representing Mrs Rutherford, and the third party, as claiming to be the testator's sole next of kin at the date of his death; or, alternatively, in the event of its being held that said residue, or any part thereof, has fallen into intestacy, that they are entitled to share therein along with the testator's heirs in mobilibus ab intestato.

"The party of the third part maintains that said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 has been revoked wholly by the latter deed, or, in any case, can now receive effect only to the extent of said legacy of £20. She further maintains that the whole residue of the trust estate, or, in any event, five seventh shares thereof, fall to be divided equally between her and the second parties; or, alternatively, in the event of its being held that said residue, or any part thereof, has fallen into intestacy, that they are entitled to share therein along with the testator's heirs in mobilibus ab intestato.

"The party of the fourth part maintains that said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 has not been revoked, and is still effectual as to said legacy of £20 and two seventh shares of residue; that, in consequence, the residue clause of the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897 cannot receive effect, that five-sevenths of the residue have fallen into intestacy, and that he, as heir, is entitled to five-sevenths of the heritage.

"The parties of the fifth part maintain that said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 has been revoked, or, in any event, is effectual only as to said legacy of £20 and two seventh shares of residue, and that on a sound construction of the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897, the whole estate, or such part thereof as may be held not to be effectually disposed of by said trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860, falls to be divided according to the law of intestate moveable succession, and that they are entitled per stirpes to three fifth parts thereof as representing the testator's predeceasing brother and sisters. Alternatively, they maintain, on the ground stated by the fourth party, that five-sevenths of the residue of the estate has fallen into intestacy, and that three-sevenths of said residue, so far as moveable, fall to be divided among them—exclusive of the fourth party—per stirpes according to the law of intestate moveable succession."

The following Questions of Law were, inter alia, submitted to the Court:—

1. Has the trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 been impliedly revoked by the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897?

OR,

Is it still effectual as to the legacy of £20 and two seventh shares of residue destined to Mrs Mary Dickie or Rutherford, now represented by the second parties, or either and which of the said bequests?

2. In the event of the first alternative of the first question being answered in the affirmative, or of its being determined that the trust disposition and settlement of 6th July 1860 is effectual only as to said legacy of £20, are the parties of the second and third part entitled, on a sound construction of the trust disposition and settlement of 31st December 1897, equally between them to the whole, or to the residue of the estate?

OR,

Does the said whole estate or residue fall to be divided into five equal shares, and is each of the three stirpes forming the parties hereto of the fifth part entitled, as representing the testator's predeceasing brother and sisters, to one of these five shares?

The second parties quoted the following authorities: Upon revocation, Stoddart v. Grant, 1852, 1 Macq. 163; Allan v. Glasgow, 1846, 5 Bell's App. 379; upon "next of kin": Honeyman's Tr. v. Donaldson, 30th January 1900, 2 F. 539, 7 S.L.T. 363; Fulton's Tr. v. Fulton, 1901, 8 S.L.T. 465; Connell v. Grierson, 14th February 1867, 5 M. 379; Tait's Trs. v. Neill, 25th November 1903, 6 F. 138, 11 S.L.T. 438; Young's Trs. v. Janes, 10th December 1880, 8 R. 242; Gregory's Trs. v. Alison, 8th April 1889, 16 R. The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Answer the first alternative of the first question of law therein stated in the affirmative, and the second alternative of said question in the negative; answer the first alternative of the second question in the negative, and the second alternative of the said question in the affirmative; find that the foregoing answers supersede the necessity to answer the remaining questions of law."

Lord Low.—The first question to be answered in this case is whether the trust disposition and settlement executed by the deceased Mr James Dickie in 1860 was revoked by a second trust disposition and settlement which he executed in 1897.

The latter settlement contains no express revocation of the former, but I think it is very plain that revocation is implied. Both settlements commence with a statement that the truster's object is to settle his affairs and provide for the disposal of his means and estate after his death; in both he conveys in trust the whole means and estate belonging to him or which may belong to him at the time of his death, and the trustees under the two settlements are different persons; and in both settlements the trust purposes exhaust the estate. The two settlements, therefore, cannot stand together, and accordingly the earlier is superseded and revoked by the later.

It was argued, however, that the settlement of 1860, although it might be revoked as a universal settlement of the truster's means and estate, was to a certain extent effectual as being a writing under his hand of the kind referred to in the settlement of 1897. The question arises in this way. By the second purpose of the settlement of 1897, the truster directed his trustees to pay any legacies which he might leave by any writing under his hand, and, by the third purpose, to dispose of the residue of his estate in the way to be directed by any writing under his hand; and in default of such writing, to pay over the whole residue to his next of kin according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland. Now, by the settlement of 1860 the truster directed his trustee to pay a legacy of £30 to his brother George, of £20 to his sister Mary, and of £10 to each of two other sisters, and to divide the residue among these legatees in proportion to the sums bequeathed to them. All the legatees except Mary (Mrs Rutherford) predeceased the truster, and therefore, even if the settlement had not been revoked, the other legacies and bequests of residue would have lapsed. It was contended for the representatives of Mrs Rutherford (the second parties) that as the settlement of 1860 was a writing under the truster's hand by which a legacy and a share of the residue were left to her, the trustees under the settlement of 1897 were bound, in terms of the second and third purposes of that settlement, to give effect to those bequests.

I am of opinion that that contention is not well founded. I think that the language used by the truster in the settlement of 1897 to describe the writings under his hand to which the trustees shall give effect, makes it sufficiently plain that he referred to writings to be thereafter made by him, and not to writings which he had already made. Further, it seems to me to be impossible to accept the view that when, in the settlement of 1897, the truster directed his trustees to divide the residue "in the way or manner to be directed" by any writing under his hand, he included in that category the former settlement which when he wrote the words he was in the act of revoking. It is to be remembered that it was a mere accident that only one of the legatees under the settlement of 1860 survived the truster. The argument would have been the same if they had all survived, but in that event the result of giving effect to the argument would have been that the only testamentary writing of the testator which had any operative effect would have been a settlement which he had by clear implication revoked.

Except the settlement of 1860, the truster left no testamentary writing, nor any writing giving directions to his trustees; and accordingly the question is, Who are the parties entitled to the residue under the destination in the settlement of 1897 to "my next of kin according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland?"

The circumstances under which that question arises are these:—The truster, who died in 1906, was never married. His mother died in 1853, and his father in 1860. He was survived by two sisters, Mrs Rutherford and Miss Agnes Orr Dickie (the third party to this case), and he was predeceased by a brother, George, and by two sisters, Mrs Jamieson and Mrs Murray, all of whom left children who survived the truster. The question, therefore, is whether, under the destination which I have quoted, the residue fell to be divided between Mrs Rutherford and Miss Dickie, as the only next of kin who survived the truster, or between them and the children of the predeceasing brother and sisters per stirpes.

Now it must be regarded as settled that if the destination had simply been to the truster's "next of kin," without any words qualifying that expression, the two sisters who survived the truster would have been entitled to the whole residue, to the exclusion of the children of the brother and sisters who predeceased him. Accordingly, it is necessary to consider what is the meaning and the effect of the words "according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland."

It was contended for the second and third parties that these words were merely explanatory of the term "next of kin," and that all that was meant was that the persons answering to that description should be ascertained according to the law of Scotland. If so, then the words served no practical purpose, but were mere surplusage, because when a domiciled Scotsman makes a testamentary settlement in Scotland, and according to the Scotch form, a bequest to his next of kin necessarily falls to be construed according to the law of Scotland. It is no doubt possible that the truster used words which were entirely unnecessary, and which are altogether inofficious, but the presumption is that such words were intended to serve a definite and operative purpose.

It was further argued that the explanation of the words might be found in the fact that the estate consisted partly of heritable and partly of moveable property, the suggestion being that the truster desired to make it clear that the whole estate was to be dealt with as if it had been moveable, and that any claim by the heir in heritage was excluded. I am not impressed with that argument. The direction to the trustees is to "dispone, convey, deliver, or pay over the whole of the residue of my means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, to my next of kin." Even if the direction had stopped there, I do not see how any question of the kind suggested could have arisen, because it is expressly directed that the whole residue, whether heritable or moveable, shall be made over to the next of kin, that is, to all the persons composing the class, without distinction between them. Further, the heir in heritage is necessarily excluded, because the heritage is to be made over to the next of kin; the next of kin are not heirs in heritage. The heir may be one of the next of kin so far as blood relationship is concerned, but he takes the heritage, not as one of the next of kin, but as heir at law, and even if he is one of the next of kin, he takes no share in the moveable estate unless he collates. It is also worthy of observation that neither at the date of the settlement nor at his death was the truster's heir at law one of his next of kin, but was the son of his deceased brother George. I therefore do not think that any weight can be given to the argument founded upon the mixed nature of the estate.

In my opinion the words under construction are both explanatory of the sense in which the truster uses the expression "next of kin," and a direction to his trustees as to the manner in which they are to dispose of the residue—they are "to pay over" the residue "according to the law of moveable succession in Scotland." Of course the words "the law of moveable succession" mean the law of succession in the case of intestacy, because the law only provides for the succession of a person deceased, if he has not done so for himself.

Now, prior to the passing of the Intestate Succession Act, the expression "next of kin" was used to designate the class of blood relations entitled to the moveable succession of the intestate—in fact, the expressions "next of kin" and "heirs in mobilibus" were used as synonymous. Now the Intestate Succession Act gave for the first time certain rights to the father and the mother of an intestate dying without issue, but as regarded the next of kin the only change which was made was to admit representation among descendants, and in the collateral line among brothers and sisters and their descendants. Here the question is not complicated by the survival of the father or mother of the truster. He was only survived by two of his next of kin, and by three stirpes, each representing a deceased next of kin, and that also was the position of matters when he made the settlement.

In such circumstances, I see no difficulty in understanding what is meant by, or in carrying out, a direction to divide the residue among the next of kin according to the law of moveable succession. I think that it is plainly a direction to divide among the next of kin who were alive at the truster's death and the children (per stirpes) who, according to the law of moveable succession, represented and came in place of next of kin who had predeceased him. I may add that the case of Tronson, 12 R. 155, appears to me to be an authority for the view which I have expressed, because I do not think that there is any substantial difference between the destination in that case, and the destination under construction.

I am therefore of opinion that the first branch of the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the second branch in the negative; and that the first branch of the second question should be answered in the negative, and the second branch in the affirmative. If that be done, the remaining questions seem to be superseded.

121. The Clyde Shipping Company v. Miller.

Ship—Collision—Compulsory Pilotage—Onus of Proof—Onus on Ship Pleading Compulsory Pilotage to Prove Fault on Part of Pilot.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

In this action the owners of the tug "Flying Wizard" sued the owner of the "s.s. Sunbeam" for £600, the amount of damage alleged to have been sustained by the "Flying Wizard" in a collision between the two vessels.

The averments upon record were as follows :—

Cond. 2. On or about 13th September last, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, while the "Flying Wizard" was lying moored at Partick Wharf with her port side to the quay, the "Sunbeam," which was proceeding to sea in charge of a compulsory pilot, but in an unmanageable and unseaworthy condition, took a sheer to northward and struck the forward starboard sponson of the "Flying Wizard" with her starboard bow, at the same time throwing the tug's port after sponson against the piles of the wharf, whereby the "Flying Wizard" sustained considerable damage. The defender's statements in answer are denied, so far as inconsistent with the pursuers' statements. . . .

Ans. 2. Admitted that at the time mentioned the "Flying Wizard" was lying moored at Partick Wharf, with her port side to the quay, and that the "Sunbeam" was proceeding down the river in charge of a compulsory pilot and a tug, and that she collided with the "Flying Wizard," whereby the latter sustained some slight damage. Quoad ultra, denied. The collision occurred owing to the fault of the compulsory pilot in respect that he failed to navigate his vessel in a proper seaman-like manner. The "Sunbeam" was, it is believed and averred, kept too long on her port helm when she was being straightened up in the river, after coming out of the dock. Further, the pursuers were in fault in mooring the tug in the position they did, as it is a dangerous position in which to moor a vessel. . . .

Cond. 3. The collision was due entirely to the fault or negligence of the defender or his servants in failing to put the "Sunbeam" in proper trim before leaving her berth. She had a heavy list to port to which the pilot called attention before leaving, but which the master refused to remedy. In consequence of the list the vessel became quite unmanageable in the river, and collided with the "Flying Wizard" as before described.

Ans. 3. Denied. If the "Sunbeam" was in the unseaworthy condition alleged, the pilot should have refused to proceed.

The Defender pleaded :—

"1. The pursuers not having suffered any loss through the fault of the defender, or anyone for whom he is responsible, absolvitor should be granted, with costs.

"2. Contributory negligence.

"3. The collision having been occasioned, so far as the s.s. 'Sunbeam' is concerned, through the fault of a compulsory pilot, the defender should be assoilzied, with costs."

The Sheriff-Substitute (Balfour) allowed a proof, and thereafter, on 7th July 1907, pronounced an interlocutor finding the defender liable for the damage caused by the collision. The Sheriff-Substitute's note contained the following passage :—

"The main defence put forward by the defender is that the pilot of the 'Sunbeam' kept her too long on her port helm, but there is no evidence whatever of this. The orders which the pilot gave were 'hard a-port,' 'steady,' and 'hard a-starboard,' but there is nothing to satisfy me that she was kept too long on the port helm. There is practically no evidence on that subject at all, and the pilot himself distinctly says that if he had steadied the helm sooner than he did, and given her the starboard helm sooner, they would not have missed the 'Flying Wizard.' The fact appears to be that the 'Sunbeam' did not answer the starboard helm, but continued going to the north until she struck the 'Flying Wizard.' The only way to account for this movement on the part of the 'Sunbeam' is that she had the heavy list to port, and could not be properly steered, and the various sheers which she took both before and after the collision show that this is the case. With regard to the alleged fault on the part of the pilot, it is strange that the master of the 'Sunbeam' states that the pilot could have done nothing to prevent the collision, but when it is suggested to him that he might have given the starboard helm sooner, he says, in a half-hearted way, that if he had starboarded half a minute earlier, they could have cleared the tug. But surely if the master thought that this was a fault on the part of the pilot he would have said so to him, but he never told the pilot that he should have starboarded sooner.

"There was an attempt made on the part of the defender at the eleventh hour to prove by two nautical experts that a list of even eleven degrees in narrow waters was a common enough thing, and did not affect the steering of a ship. This is contrary, not only to all my experience in these cases, but also to the rest of the evidence in the case. These experts say that a list does not affect the steering, but they contradict the pilot and Mr William Niven and many other witnesses; and they further say that the pilot was to blame because he ought to have put his engines ahead, but, in point of fact, the pilot did put his engines full speed ahead to give the 'Sunbeam' steerage way. The defender's own witness William Niven, who was master of the 'Sunbeam' for eighteen years prior to the collision in question, admits that the list would affect the steering a little; and he admits that eleven degrees is a big list, and is within an ace of being dangerous. He says that twelve degrees is undesirable, and is a heavy list, and that nobody wants to go down the river in narrow waters with a heavy list. This evidence appears to me to be practically in conformity with the evidence of reliable witnesses for the pursuers, and to negative the evidence of the experts Burns and Craig.

"It is to be specially noted in this case that, with the exception of the two experts (whose evidence, to my mind, is almost all theory), there is no independent evidence for the defender. On the other hand, we have, on the part of the pursuers, the evidence of many neutral reliable witnesses, such as the two deputy harbour-masters, a deck hand on the Govan ferry boat, a boatman at Govan ferry, and James Ritchie, a ship carpenter. Besides these, we have the master of the 'Chieftain,' the pilot of the 'Sunbeam,' and Mr William Orr Warden, the experienced pilot-master, who all, more or less, condemn the 'Sunbeam' with regard to her heavy list and other matters.

1st Div.

The Clyde Shipping Company v. Miller.

"There certainly can be no doubt that, after reading the evidence of Mr Warden, the pilot-master, one cannot but be satisfied that (contrary to the contention of the defender) the pilot was justified in taking the 'Sunbeam' down the river under the special circumstances. But, on the authority of the case of Mann, Macneal & Co. v. Ellerman Lines, 7 F. 213, even if the pilot was in fault in starting with an unmanageable steamer, that would not absolve the owners from liability. See also Marsden, p. 227.

"On the whole case, I am of opinion that the defender has failed to prove any fault on the part of the pursuers or of the pilot, and that the whole grounds of defence mentioned in the defences have failed."

The defender appealed.

Argued for the Appellant: It was admitted that in the case of a moving ship colliding with one which was stationary the onus lay with the moving ship to shew that she was not responsible. The appellant here had sufficiently discharged that onus by proving that the vessel was in charge of a compulsory pilot under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 633, that the accident was due to faulty navigation, and that the orders of the pilot had been obeyed. It was not necessary for the appellant to prove any definite fault of the pilot to have caused the accident ("Assyria," 1903, 5 F. 1089). The onus was then transferred to the respondents of proving the fault in whole or in part to be that of the ship (Clyde Navigation Trs. v. Barclay, Curle & Co., 1876, 3 R. (H.L.) 44; "Indus," 1886, L.R. 12 P.D. 46, per Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 49; Marsden on Collisions at Sea, 4th ed. 260, 261). The respondents had not discharged this onus. As regards the list there was no evidence that the "Sunbeam" was otherwise than in ordinary safe trim ("Argo," 1859, Swabey 462). In any case the pilot was responsible for the trim of the vessel, having taken her out in knowledge of her condition ("Strathspey," 1891, 18 R. 1048; "Assyria," cit. sup.). The case of Mann, Macneal & Co. v. Ellerman Lines (1904, 7 F. 213), was distinguished. In that case the defect was one in the vessel's equipment for which the owners were responsible.

Argued for the Respondents: The onus lay upon the appellant to rebut the presumption of liability by proving that the accident was due either to no fault of his own ship or to inevitable accident, or was due solely to the fault of the pilot ("Indus," 1886, 12 P.D. 46; Mann, Macneal & Co. v. Ellerman Lines, 1904, 7 F. 213). This onus had not been discharged. On the contrary, the evidence shewed that the accident resulted, not from any wrong order given by the pilot, but from the unusual behaviour of the vessel under proper orders, owing to her failure to answer her helm. The pilot was entitled to accept the captain's word that the list would not interfere with the vessel's navigation, and could not be made responsible for its effects.

The Court adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute, and dismissed the appeal.

The Lord President.—My Lords, this is an appeal from one of the Sheriff-Substitutes of Lanarkshire in the matter of a collision which took place in the Clyde. The circumstances of the case are these. The "Sunbeam" was in the Queen's Dock on the Clyde, and was proceeding to go down the river, and in order to do so she had to go out of the Queen's Dock, and, as the Queen's Dock lies at an angle to the river, she had to straighten herself in the river to proceed down. The angle coming from the Queen's Dock is such that, as a boat comes out, she naturally gets upon the south side to begin with, and that, of course, is not the proper side for proceeding down the river, and she has to go forwards to the north side. The "Sunbeam" came out under the charge of a pilot. She got over to the south side, and was put on the port helm to get her head round, being also assisted by a tug which was moored to her bow. By that means she was headed across the river to the north, but she gave a rather violent sort of sheer to the north, and, although her helm was starboarded, she did not properly answer her helm, and plunged into the tug called the "Flying Wizard," which was lying moored on the north side of the river, doing damage to it. The present action is brought by the owner of the "Flying Wizard" against the owners of the "Sunbeam" for the damage so occasioned.

I do not hesitate to say that this case has given me considerable difficulty, for I think the facts are narrow; and I think it is a matter of anxiety to decide whether the case falls on the one side or the other, in the light of the law which has been laid down in decided cases.

The only other fact that I ought to mention as regards the condition of affairs at the time is, that the "Sunbeam" had a considerable list when she left the dock, owing, seemingly, to most of the coal having been put into the port bunkers, and the list extended to eleven degrees. There is a conflict of evidence as between the pilot on the one hand, and the master of the "Sunbeam," who is corroborated by the mate, on the other, as to what exactly passed between the pilot and the officers of the "Sunbeam" as regards this list. The pilot's version is that as soon as he saw the list he complained of it, and indicated that in his opinion it was not safe, and would affect the steering of the ship; that he got an assurance from the captain that he was well aware of the behaviour of the ship under such a list as the present, and that he assured him that it would not affect the steering, and that he might safely go on; that, going upon that assurance, he took out the vessel, but that, as he feared, the result was that the vessel did not act properly in steering, and that that was the cause of the accident. The captain's and the mate's version does not agree with that of the pilot. They deny that they gave any assurance to the pilot, but they themselves say that there was some conversation upon the subject of the list. They also say that, as a matter of fact, the list had no effect upon the steering, and that they had often gone with such a list before, and that such lists are common.

Now, the learned Sheriff-Substitute has decided the case on this ground,—he has held that the fault lay entirely upon the "Sunbeam," and he has held that the owners of the "Sunbeam" have failed to prove that there was any fault on the part of the pilot, because he holds it proved that the whole accident occurred through the default in the steering capacity of the ship, and that that fault in the steering capacity of the ship was due to the list. The learned Sheriff-Substitute holds that it is an undoubted fact that a ship with a list of eleven degrees will be affected in steering, and that that was an improper condition for a ship to be sent out in. My Lords, I have a little difficulty in going the length the Sheriff-Substitute does on that last ground. I am bound to remark that I think the learned Sheriff has here rather gone on his experience in other cases, and indeed he tells us so. But there is undoubtedly evidence here which cannot be disregarded of quite competent men, who say that a list of eleven degrees is not very uncommon, and that, as a rule, they do not think it will affect the steering. I confess that the result on my own mind of the evidence about that matter is this, that it is not a universal rule that a list of eleven degrees would affect the steering of a ship, but that, on the other hand, it might affect the steering of a particular ship. In other words, I think the matter is one of what I might call special circumstances, as to which probably nobody can be dogmatic, and lay down a general rule which is to apply to all ships. Ships in the matter of steering, we all know, do behave very differently, and behave very differently from reasons which are not always explainable. One ship is quick in answering the helm, another is slow, and I do not think one is able to give a scientific reason for the difference between the one and the other; and the result, to my mind, of the evidence is that, though it cannot be laid down as a general rule that the steering would be affected by a list of eleven degrees, which is not uncommon, yet, on the other hand, it cannot be said that the steering might not be affected.

Now, my Lords, in this state of the facts what is the decision to be come to? I think that the only way to try a case like this is to go very carefully along the lines which have been indicated to us in decided cases, and apply the rules there clearly laid down to the facts of this particular case. I had occasion in a case yesterday to say that the rules for this class of case are very clearly and authoritatively laid down in the judgment of Lord Esher in the case of the "Indus" (1886, L.R. 12 P.D. 46). Now, we start here with the fact of the collision, and with the fact that the collision took place between a moving ship and a ship that was lying moored in a place which everybody admits was a perfectly proper place for her to be moored; she was not moored at a place which interfered with or curtailed the fairway of the river, and there is no question as to any contributory negligence on the "Flying Wizard's" part. There was no time or possibility for her to get out of the way. That, I think, according to the decisions in many cases, and among others the "Indus," discharges the first onus that always is on the pursuers, and puts the blame upon the "Sunbeam"; and then, if the blame is to be taken off the "Sunbeam," that must be done by one of two things, either by shewing that the accident was inevitable, that is to say, by some cause outside the power of those in charge of her, or by shewing that the fault was that of the pilot, he being a compulsory pilot.

Now, my Lords, the "Indus" lays down, and I think rightly, that if persons who are prima facie in fault want to get off upon statutory exemption, they must bring themselves very clearly within that statutory exemption; in other words, they must shew that the fault was that of the pilot, and nobody else. That does not mean that you must go through the impossible course of disproving every other cause. It may be quite enough if you begin by shewing that it was the fault of the pilot, and then leave the matter there, and leave the other side to extricate themselves by shewing that there were other contributory causes of fault. But none the less you must begin by shewing that it was the fault of the pilot, and shew it in such a way as not to complicate it with any other proximate cause.

The facts of the "Indus" were a very good illustration of that. There was no doubt that it was the fault of the pilot in one sense, because the one ship ran into the other. The moving ship was being navigated by the pilot, and accordingly it was his fault, but nevertheless there were certain other contributory causes found in the non-obeyal of a certain order,

1st Div.

The Clyde Shipping Company v. Miller.

The Lord President.

Well, my Lords, when I come here to apply that test, I come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-Substitute, though in rather a different way,—that the pursuers here have failed to discharge the onus upon them, of shewing that the fault was the fault of the pilot. I do not think it is enough merely to say that the accident happened, and that the ship was in the pilot's hands at the time, unless you can shew also that nothing else was happening of an extraordinary character. Now, undoubtedly the ship here did behave in an extraordinary manner, that is to say, it steered very wildly; and I have come to the conclusion that, the onus being upon the parties seeking to free themselves, they have not discharged that onus, because they have not really shewn here that the accident, such as it was, rested upon the pilot's fault alone.

I do not myself think it necessary to decide the question whether the bad steering was due to the list or not. It may or it may not have been, I cannot tell; but there are one or two things that are undoubted. It is undoubted, I think, as a matter of fact, that the ship did not answer her helm. That is made clear among other things by the log of the chief officer on the "Sunbeam," and I prefer to take these documents to what the witnesses say, because they were made up at a time when people did not know they were to be in Court. He says, describing the accident,—"3.30 p.m. While trying to get squared up in mid-river, tide being two hours ebb, helm hard to starboard, and tug towing to port; wind on port bow, and tide under starboard quarter, owing to which we did not answer our helm"; and in the same way it is very noticeable that the captain himself does not attribute the accident to the fault of the pilot, but puts it down to something that I suppose would come to inevitable accident, because in his deposition he says that, "In deponent's opinion, the cause of the casualty was the sweep of the ebb tide on the starboard quarter and the wind on the port bow"; and in the same way in his evidence in the case, he says, "I do not think the pilot could have done anything that might have prevented the collision in any way." Now that is testimony given by the persons in the boat in fault. It is quite true that their evidence, such as it is, would go to something like inevitable accident; but inevitable accident won't do in this case, because to say that the existence of a very slight breeze—for there was nothing more here—and the existence of a tide in the opposite direction should therefore make it impossible to navigate the Clyde is a conclusion which, of course, is absurd on the statement of it. In other words, their testimony as regards inevitable accident is, I am afraid, not worth much. But it is worth something in this way, that at the time they never thought of saying that the pilot was wrong. Now the learned counsel, of course, tried hard to assimilate this case, not to the "Indus," but to the case of the "Assyria," 1903, 5 F. 1089, and undoubtedly at first sight there is a great deal of similarity between the two cases. But a distinction between the two cases is this, that in the "Assyria" the learned judges came to a decision on the question of fact—and, of course, whether they were right or whether they were wrong, does not matter; it still remains the ground of decision—that the pilot had given a wrong order, because I find that, first of all, in the findings of the Sheriff-Substitute, which were there under appeal, there is this finding: "Finds . . . . that the pilot ordered the engines to be put slow ahead, and afterwards full speed ahead, and when he saw a collision to be inevitable, hard astern; finds that a collision would have been avoided if the order to go astern had been given at first, and that it was unduly hazardous to give the order full ahead in the hope of passing the 'Monmouth.'" Now that was a mistake on the part of the pilot; and in the same way the Lord Justice-Clerk, after describing the accident, says this: "Instead of that, the evidence satisfies me that the pilot caused the collision by giving an order to go ahead when there was risk of collision, and that he, by this error of judgment, caused the collision." Well, then, that of course is a finding directly contrary to what would be warranted here by the evidence of the captain of the "Sunbeam" when he says, "I do not think the pilot could have done anything that could have avoided the collision." In other words, you have there just that initial fault proved on the part of the pilot which I think the evidence fails to prove here, and that, I think, is what creates the distinction between the two cases. There is, of course, a very great similarity about the question of the trim of the vessel. Now, my Lords, upon that matter I do not think it is necessary to discuss whether the dictum of Lord Trayner, which certainly goes very far, is in all circumstances justifiable or not, because I think here—although I am not going to say in this conflict of evidence between the pilot on the one side, and the captain and the mate on the other, that I actually believe the one side or the other—it is perfectly clear that there was some talk between them about the trim. That, I think, is abundantly clear from a letter, which is in the papers, from the captain himself. There is a letter from the captain to his own owners, in which he says: "In reply to Pilot M'Millan's written statement, I beg to reply as follows:—On September 13th, about 1 p.m., pilot came on board to take 'Sunbeam' to Greenock. When on bridge with me he passed the remark to me the ship had a heavy list, and asked me if she was safe to go to sea, as he did not think so. I replied to him that I had been in the ship nearly sixteen years, and thought her quite safe." Now that, of course, is no confirmation of what the pilot says, because what the pilot says is not that he talked about going to sea, but whether the list would make her steer properly or not. But it is near enough to make it, in my mind, perfectly clear that there was some talk between these two people as to the effect of the list, and that, in some way or other, the pilot had, so to speak, complained of the list, and had been assured by the captain that he had better go on. Well, now, I think that takes the case at least out of the sort of case which is figured by Lord Trayner, where the trim, being no doubt prima facie a matter for the crew, and not for the pilot, yet the pilot seeing that her trim was wrong, might say, "Either you put this right, or I don't start." Evidently there was some sort of conflict between the two, with the result that some sort of assurance was given to the pilot, and he went on. I mention that to shew that I have not overlooked it, but I do not put my judgment on that; I put my judgment on this, that in the rules laid down in the "Indus" it is necessary in some way so far to shew fault on the part of the pilot. The mere fact that there is a collision does not necessarily shew a fault, although, of course, if you show that the collision is the result of orders given by the pilot, and that these orders were obeyed, you probably would not need any more. But here you have a ship that, as a matter of fact, did not answer her helm, and you have persons on board the ship saying that they do not see what the pilot could have done to avoid a collision, and I think the onus of proof has not been discharged. I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute and refusing the appeal.

Lord Kinnear.—My Lords, I am entirely of the same opinion; and without reviewing the facts, I think all that is necessary for me to say is that I think the case is directly governed by the rule laid down in the case of the "Indus." The vessel that was run down was stationary and moored to a pier. The "Sunbeam" coming down the river ran into her, and there is therefore a prima facie case of fault on the part of the "Sunbeam." The owners of the "Sunbeam" in the Court below maintained that they had displaced this prima facie case by proof that the real fault lay on the "Flying Wizard," because she was moored in a place where she ought not to have been, and was not being properly looked after. But the defence on that ground was abandoned when the case came into this Court, and we were told that the defenders accepted the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute against them on that point. The only remaining grounds of excuse that they now present are the two that your Lordship has adverted to—either that the collision was caused by inevitable accident, which no precaution on the part of anybody in charge could have avoided, or was caused by the fault of the pilot in charge. The two defences are quite inconsistent with one another; and I agree, without examining the evidence in detail, that the first of these two grounds is untenable, and therefore the question comes to be whether the defenders have shewn that the accident was due to the fault of the pilot, and not to the fault of those in charge of the ship. Now, the case of the "Indus," which is entirely in conformity in this respect with other authorities, laid down that in order to take advantage of the statutory exemption which enables a shipowner to set up the fault of a pilot as an excuse for the damage caused by his vessel, he must prove that the damage was caused solely by the fault of the pilot, and not by the joint fault of the pilot and anybody for whom he himself is responsible, and I agree with your Lordship, for the reasons that you have stated, that the defenders have entirely failed to shew that the fault was due solely to the pilot, even if the pilot had not successfully cleared himself from the charge of fault altogether. I may add that the result of the evidence to my mind is, that the direct cause of the collision was that the ship did not answer her helm, and that the only explanation to be found in the evidence of her failure to answer her helm is that she had a list to port to the extent of eleven degrees. I think the evidence is conflicting as to whether the list to port to that extent would necessarily make it unsafe to take her down the narrow waters of the Clyde, but the preponderance of the evidence to my mind shews that that depends upon the ship, and not upon an absolute rule. If it did depend upon the ship, then I am disposed to think, although the evidence is certainly conflicting, that the pilot has shewn that he consulted the master of the ship, who had been sailing in her for a number of years, as to what the effect of this would be, and relied on the master's statement that it would not affect the sailing capacity of the vessel. Whether that can be taken to be proved or not, I think it is certain that the pilot alone cannot be held responsible for taking the ship out of the dock with such a list, because, in the first place, the owners and their master and crew are responsible for the trim of the vessel, and the pilot is not. It may be that if a pilot thinks that the vessel is not in such trim as to be navigable with safety, it lies upon him to say so, but I do not think it is proved that a reasonably prudent and competent pilot must in the actual circumstances have refused to take the "Sunbeam" down the river; and, if that is not proved, there is no evidence of violation or neglect of duty on the part of the pilot in question. But if this were doubtful, it is a sufficient ground of judgment that, even supposing that the pilot was in fault, it has not been proved that the master and crew were not in fault also, that is to say, that if the real cause of the ship's failure to answer her helm was the list created by the way in which the port bunkers were loaded, then that is a fault for which the owners were responsible, and therefore, if there was any fault on the part of the pilot at all, which I say again I am not persuaded there was, it is not shewn that the accident was due to his fault solely. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

Lord Dundas.—My Lords, I think this case is a narrow one, and at the first impression a somewhat puzzling one, but after the fullest consideration that I have been able to give it, I have arrived entirely at the conclusion which your Lordships have so fully expressed, and I do not desire to add anything on my own behalf.—10*th July* 1907.

BURGH—DEAN OF GUILD—RESTRICTIONS ON HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS—GLASGOW BUILDING REGULATIONS ACT 1900 (63 AND 64 VICT. CAP. CL.), SECTS. 60 AND 62—PRIVATE INDIVIDUAL ENTITLED TO PLEAD PROHIBITIONS OF ACT AS TO HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS—PROPOSED BUILDING ABUTTING ON TWO PARALLEL STREETS HELD TO BE SUBJECT TO PROVISIONS OF SECT. 62 OF ACT.

Appeals from the Dean of Guild Court at Glasgow.

These were two appeals against decisions of the Dean of Guild Court at Glasgow, with reference to a building proposed to be erected in West George Street there.

One appeal was taken in a petition for a lining, and the other in an appeal to the Dean of Guild against a consent of the Corporation with reference to the height of the proposed building. The questions raised were whether an owner of property adjacent to the site of the proposed erection had a title to plead the provisions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act 1900, which prohibit the erection of a building exceeding a specified height, and whether sect. 62 of that Act applied to the case of a building abutting on two streets parallel to one another.

The circumstances are set forth in the opinion of the Lord President.

The Glasgow Building Regulations Act provides as follows:—

"Sect. 60. (1) . . . . No building other than a church shall, except with the consent of the Corporation, be erected in or adjoining any street of a greater height than the distance between the building lines of such street and one-half more of such distance, and in no case, except with such consent of the Corporation, shall such height exceed one hundred feet. . . .

"(3) Whenever the Corporation consent to the erection of any building of a greater height than that prescribed by this Act, notice of such consent shall within one week after such consent has been given be published in such manner as the Corporation may direct, and such consent shall not be acted on till twenty-one days after such publication, and the owner or lessee of any lands and heritages within one hundred yards of the site of any intended building who may deem himself aggrieved by the grant of such consent may within twenty-one days after such publication appeal to the Dean of Guild, who shall have power to deal with the case as shall seem to him just.

"Sect. 62. Where any building is erected or intended to be erected so as to front or abut upon more than one street, the height of the building shall be regulated by the widest of such streets, not only so far as such building abuts or will abut upon such widest street, but also so far as it abuts or will abut upon the narrowest of such streets to a distance of fifty feet from the side of such widest street. . . ."

The Court recalled the interlocutors appealed against hoc statu, and remitted to the Dean of Guild to consider whether as a matter of fact the consent of the Corporation had been knowingly given to a building which, under sect. 62 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, must be held as abutting on two streets, and if he was satisfied that such consent had been so given and did not propose to recal that consent in virtue of the powers given to him by sect. 60 (3) of the said Act, to dismiss the appeal taken to him and grant the lining in the petition therefor.

The Lord President.—My Lords, these are two appeals from the Dean of Guild of Glasgow. The one is an appeal from a pronouncement of his upon a decree of lining; the other is an appeal against a pronouncement of his in respect of the special jurisdiction that is given him as the reviewing authority of the Corporation under the provisions of sub-sect. 3 of sect. 60 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act. That is the technical position of the two appeals. The subject-matter with which they deal is inextricably mixed up, and in order to make the matter clear I think it is necessary to state exactly what the proceedings were.

The parties applicant were the Summerlee Iron Co. Ltd., and they possessed a stance of ground the front of which faced to West George Street, Glasgow, and the rear of which faced to West Regent Street Lane — West Regent Street Lane being a lane parallel to West George Street. Now, the applicants proposed to put up a high building extending over the whole of their property, that is to say, with its front making an elevation in West George Street, and its back making an elevation in West Regent Street Lane. In order to do that, they had to make the ordinary application for a decree of lining. But they obviously were affected by the regulations as to height which are contained in the Glasgow Building Regulations Act. Now, the Glasgow Building Regulations Act deals with the matter of height particularly in two sections, in sect. 60 and sect. 62. Sect. 60 provides, by the first sub-section, that no building other than a church shall, except with the consent of the Corporation, be erected in, on, or adjoining any street of a greater height than the distance between the building lines of such street and one-half more of such distance; and then there is a further rider—"and in no case, except with such consent of the Corporation, shall such height exceed one hundred feet." Now, as a matter of fact, this building exceeded one hundred feet. It did not exceed in height one and a half times the breadth of West George Street, but it did exceed in height one and a half times the breadth of West Regent Street Lane. Accordingly, the applicants addressed a letter to the town clerk, in which they enclosed a plan of the proposed building, and they asked for a consent of the Glasgow Corporation. That consent they got; and the first consent which they got was phrased thus:—"The Corporation of the City of Glasgow intimate their consent, in terms of sect. 60 (1) of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act 1900, to the proposal of the petitioners to erect a building at 172/176 West George Street to the height shewn in the plans in Court relative to said petition, said consent being required in respect that the proposed height is greater than the distance between the building lines of West George Street ex adverso of said building, and one-half more of such distance." Now, that recital was not true in point of fact, because, as a matter of fact, it was not greater than one and a half times the breadth of West George Street, as I have said. That seems to have been noticed, and, accordingly, that first consent was superseded or supplemented—I do not care which word I use—by another in these terms:—"The Corporation of the City of Glasgow intimate their consent, in terms of sect. 60 (1) of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act 1900, to the proposal of the petitioners to erect a building at 172/176 West George Street to the height shewn in the plans in Court relative to said petition, said consent being required in respect that the proposed height exceeds one hundred feet."

Armed with this consent, they proposed to ask—and did ask—the Dean of Guild for his decree of lining in the ordinary way. And that decree of lining the Dean of Guild was prepared to grant, and did grant. At the same time they had, in terms of sect. 60 in a provision which I have not read, and which it is not necessary to read at length—they had advertised that they had got this consent in order that persons who considered themselves aggrieved might object. The firm of Lindsay, Meldrum & Oates, who have property in the immediate neighbourhood, but not exactly touching the applicants' property, conceived that they were aggrieved, and, accordingly, they presented an appeal to the Dean of Guild against the consent of the Glasgow Corporation. And they presented that appeal in respect of the provisions of sub-section 3 of sect. 60, which is in these terms:—"Whenever the Corporation consent to the erection of any building of a greater height than that prescribed by this Act, notice of such consent shall, within one week after such consent has been given, be published in such manner as the Corporation may direct, and such consent shall not be acted on till twenty-one days after such publication; and the owner or lessee of any lands and heritages within one hundred yards of the site of any intended building who may deem himself aggrieved by the grant of such consent may, within twenty-one days of such publication, appeal to the Dean of Guild, who shall have power to deal with the case as shall seem to him just."

At the same time the same objectors appeared before the Dean of Guild in the ordinary lining process and objected, the ground of their objection in the ordinary lining process being that there had been no proper consent given, and that the building was struck at by the provisions of sect. 60 and sect. 62 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act. Now, sect. 62, which I have not read as yet, is this:—"Where any building is erected or intended to be erected so as to front or abut upon more than one street, the height of the building shall be regulated by the widest of such streets, not only so far as such building abuts or will abut upon such widest street, but also so far as it abuts or will abut upon the narrowest of such streets to a distance of fifty feet from the side of such widest street." Then there is a proviso that where the whole of the ground upon which any building of the warehouse class is erected or intended to be erected belongs at the passing of this Act to one owner, it shall be allowed.

Now, that being the state of the two litigations, what the Dean of Guild has done is this: In the lining process he has held that the objectors have no title to plead the provisions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act 1900 at all. He holds that the privilege of pleading these provisions is limited to the Corporation, and, accordingly, he disregarded the objections of the objectors and granted the decree of lining. In the appeal case, under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 60, he went into what may be called the merits, and he said he saw no reason for disagreeing with the consent which the Corporation had given. Both those judgments are brought up to your Lordships, and are objected to by the objectors.

1st Div.

Lindsay and Others v. Summerlee Iron Co.

The Lord President.

Now, taking first the ordinary lining decree, I am bound to say that I cannot agree with the ground upon which the learned Dean of Guild disposed of the objections. I cannot think that the universal proposition that no private individual has ever any title to plead the prohibitions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act is a just one. It may be that there are many of the provisions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act which it will not be in the mouth of a private individual to plead, and the reason will be found in want of title or want of interest. The truth is, that title and interest, as your Lordships very well know, although they are different, often very much run into each other. I will make what I mean, I think, completely clear by an illustration which I draw from the observations of Lord Shand in the well-known case of Pitman, which was a case where private objectors sought to impose restrictions put by a general statute, and not by the terms of title, upon a person who wished to build. Inter alia, the objectors in that case pleaded that there was not sufficient ventilating space in the plans of the Conservative Club according to the provisions of an Edinburgh Police Act. Lord Shand said—and I think said perfectly justly—that those provisions were put in for the sanitary good of the house itself, and that a neighbour somewhere else had either no title or no interest—I do not care which—to plead them. He could not be heard as a sort of general protector of the public health, and he could not shew that it was anything to his house if his neighbour's house was badly ventilated internally. But when you come to other questions, questions of excessive height and so on, where, the truth is, you affect your neighbour far more than you affect yourself, at once I hesitate to say that that neighbour shall have no title to bring forward and found upon the prohibitions of the statute. And therefore, my Lords, so far as that ground of judgment is concerned, I am unable to agree with the learned Dean of Guild.

But the only result of that is, that one must look at the merits. Now, the objectors here pleaded their case as high as this: they said there was no possibility here for a dispensation, because sect. 60 only deals with buildings which are in a street, and this is not a building which is in a street, but it is a building which is in streets—the plural instead of the singular—and that is regulated by sect. 62. My Lords, I think that is a completely erroneous view of the statute; and I think the learned Dean of Faculty, with all his ingenuity, for which he is famous, was really quite unable to give any answer to the view which was put against him. It is perfectly clear that sect. 62 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act is not a code in itself dealing with streets in the plural, without sect. 60. Sect. 62 does not contain in gremio a prohibition at all. But the reason of sect. 62, I think, is clear beyond doubt. Sect. 60 having said that you shall not build a building which abuts on the street of a height exceeding one and a half times the width of that street except with the consent of the Corporation—with which consent you may build as high as a building will go—sect. 62 then deals with the question when a building is to be in two streets instead of one, or, as a matter of fact, in more than two streets, for I do not find that it is limited. You might have a very large building with an elevation in four streets, and it is possible that with a building of the polygonal class of construction you might have it in more than four streets. If it had not been for sect. 62 you might, in any given case, have had a dispute between the proposing builder and the Corporation as to whether the consent of the Corporation was needed or not. The Corporation might have said—"Oh, you need our consent because your building abuts on street B, and exceeds in height one and a half times the width of that street"; to which the other party might have replied—"I do not consider my building abuts on street B; it has got its back to it; I think my building is on street A." You might have had just the sort of question raised and decided in the Conservative Club case, where the question was whether the Conservative Club was in Princes Street or in Rose Street Lane.

In order to solve those questions we have sect. 62, and that section says that, when you are in more streets than one, you may settle that, for the purpose of measurement, you consider that your building is in the widest street, subject to this, that that does not mean that you are allowed to say that the whole piece of your ground is in the widest street, but that you may only go 50 feet back from the widest street in ascribing your ground to that street, and that, when you get beyond the 50 feet, you must ascribe the rest of the continuous building to the narrow street. But that leaves the whole question of prohibition standing as it did upon sect. 60. Now, it is a considerable feat to do what the counsel for the objectors here sought to do; they said, "We will read in the prohibition of sect. 60 in so far as it deals with the height exceeding one and a half times the breadth, but we will leave out the consent of the Corporation." The two things are indissolubly connected in sect. 60; and if you read them into sect. 62, you must read them in indissolubly connected. And therefore I think it is clear that although sect. 62 is the section which shews the streets the buildings are in, sect. 60 is the only section that makes a restriction on the height; and sect. 60 says that although there is the restriction on the height—which is to be reached by taking the proportion between the breadth and height of the street and building—yet that is always liable to be overridden by a consent of the Corporation.

Now, my Lords, having settled that, all that is left, of course, is a very narrow point, and that is—has the consent of the Corporation been here given? A little doubt—I do not, personally, think there is much—but a little doubt is thrown upon the matter, because, undoubtedly, the applications in terms bore to be for a building in West George Street, and not a building in West Regent Street Lane. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the plans sent to the Corporation disclosed quite clearly that the building did abut on West Regent Street Lane as well as on West George Street. And it is not too much to assume that the parties who dealt with the matter for the Corporation know enough about West Regent Street Lane to know that it is a private street in the technical sense—a street to which all the public are admitted—and is not merely a private enclosure of the parties who own the buildings about it—I mean a private enclosure such as an avenue would be. But, my Lords, I do not care, I think, to decide that question here. What I propose is that, with this explanation of the law—which I hope is clear—the question should go back to the Dean of Guild, in order that the Dean of Guild may consider, in the light of what we have told him about sect. 60 and sect. 62, whether, as a matter of fact, the consent of the Corporation has been knowingly given to a building which, under sect. 62, must be held as abutting upon two streets; where, in other words, if no consent was given, 50 feet of that building would be regulated by the breadth of West George Street, and the height of the remanent part of the building would be regulated by the breadth of West Regent Street Lane. If that consent has been given, and the Dean of Guild sees no reason to interfere with it, then all is right. If that consent has not been knowingly given, then, of course, the Dean of Guild, in his turn, would send it back to the Corporation, in order that they should consider that matter for the first time.

Accordingly, I propose that the interlocutors as they stand should be recalled in hoc statu, and that both cases should be sent back to the Dean of Guild in order that, having expiscated the matter in that way, he should proceed as seems just.

Lord Dundas.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. The case, after all, lies within comparatively narrow limits. In the first place, I am, like your Lordship, not prepared to accept the Dean of Guild's views upon the question of the title of individuals in the matter; but your Lordship has, I think, put that topic upon a proper footing, and I agree with all that you have said. In the second place, I think that the view expressed by your Lordship as to the meaning of sect. 60 and sect. 62 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1900, and the relations of these two sections to one another, is unanswerably right; at all events, we have had no feasible answer to it stated from the bar. Lastly, my Lords, I concur in thinking that it would be safer, in order to avoid any possibility of error, that the case should go back, in the manner your Lordship has explained, to the Dean of Guild. My Lord, I am content to express my entire concurrence in your Lordship's opinion, without attempting further to add to or develop it.

Lord Johnston.—While I agree in the course which your Lordship proposes to take in this case, I am afraid I differ to some extent as to the grounds upon which we should proceed, because I cannot take the same view of sect. 62 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act 1900 which I think your Lordships take.

I quite agree that the respondents here have a good title to object, and that the Dean of Guild should have heard them on their objections, on the footing that he was hearing parties who had such a title. There can be no question that, under Acts of this description, coterminous proprietors who have an interest have a title to be heard. And I cannot conceive a greater interest than that of the respondents, the light and air of whose property will be so much affected by this proposed building, more particularly when they must look to it, that if this measure is meted out to the petitioners by the Corporation and the Dean of Guild, they may expect a similar measure to be meted out to other proprietors in the neighbourhood, with the result of gradually solidifying the ground between West Regent Street and West George Street, on to which the back of their property looks into a block of buildings. Accordingly, I think they have a most undoubted interest, and therefore title, to be here. And the reason for which I should send the case back to the Dean of Guild is, that I cannot conceive that either he or the Corporation could have fairly considered the interests of the objectors if they approached the matter on the footing that they had no title to be before them.

But then, when I come to sects. 60 and 62 of the statute, I feel a great deal more difficulty than I think your Lordships have indicated as to their proper application, for this reason: I do not think that they contain a complete code of building regulations in regard to the matter in question, viz. the height of buildings, but that the present case is a casus improvisus. I am satisfied that sect. 62 applies only to a case where buildings abut upon two streets which are at an angle to each other—the one a main and the other a side street. The provision therein contained, that "where any building is erected or intended to be erected so as to front or abut upon more than one street, the height of the building shall be regulated by the widest of such streets, not only so far as such building abuts or will abut upon such widest street, but also so far as it abuts or will abut upon the narrowest of such streets," would be perfectly intelligible, and might apply equally where the two streets are parallel, as where they are at an angle to one another, if the clause had stopped there. But it continues, "to a distance of 50 feet from the side of such widest street." This makes it quite clear to me that what the statute contemplated was a corner subject, and that the meaning of the enactment is that where a building is to be erected so as to abut upon a main street, and also upon a side street, the height regulated by the width of the main street is to be carried back along the side street to a distance of 50 feet, however narrow the side street may be. It is impossible, in my opinion, to read the provision taken as a whole as applicable to the case of a main street parallel to a back street—in the present case just 100 feet apart.

I do not understand how a building abutting on a wide front street can be raised to the height of one and a half times the said front street, not only so far as it abuts on said front street, but so far as it abuts on a parallel narrower back street 100 feet, and it might be much more, off, to a distance of fifty feet from the side of said front street. It humbly appears to me to make nonsense of the section, which is perfectly intelligible if applied to the case of streets at an angle to one another. Consequently, I conclude that sect. 62 does not apply to the question we have to consider, and only applies to a corner block facing a main street and also facing a side street.

If one goes, then, back to sect. 60, I do not think that that section really contemplates the state of matters which arises here where you have a property with two frontages, one to a main street and one to a back street. If you build on that property, the width of the front street regulates the height of your building so far as abutting on it, and the height of the back street regulates such height so far as the building abuts on the back street, and there is nothing to say where, in the intermediate space, the one width ceases to regulate and the other begins. For I can find no help from sect. 62. It may be that it was intended that the width of the front street should regulate the height for 50 feet back from its building line, but neither it nor sect. 62, if it was the intention, so provides. You are therefore, as it seems to me, left with a piece of property facing a main street on the one side and facing a parallel back street on the other side; and if you can give any interpretation to sect. 60 as applicable to that situation, you have the width of the main street to regulate the height of the building as it abuts upon that street, and you have the width of the back street to regulate the building as it faces the back street, but you have nothing to indicate to you to how great a depth from either streets these heights are to extend.

It seems to me, therefore, that this building code, if it may be so called, is not complete; and I feel, therefore, very great difficulty in applying its provisions to the present case. The only way that I can so apply it, although it is not satisfactory, is to hold that the Corporation, and, through them, the Dean of Guild, have, under sect. 60, the power to dispense with any regulation as to height on the whole area, if they so choose, both on the frontage to the main street and on the frontage to the back street, and therefore that it is immaterial how far back the width of either the front or the back street regulates. It is an unsatisfactory conclusion, but the unsatisfactoriness of it is, to my mind, occasioned by the failure of the statute to provide for all circumstances which must arise in connection with such buildings.

The Lord President.—I should like to say with regard to what Lord Johnston has said, that I think his construction of sect. 62 is most unfortunate, because the effect of it would be, then, that where there are parallel streets, the building regulations for these are not dealt with; and also that I, personally, find no difficulty whatever in holding the word "abut" as applying to parallel streets because, I should like to point out, sect. 62 is only introduced where the building is erected or intended to be erected so as to front or abut on two streets—that is to say, it only comes into being in the case of parallel streets if you have one continuous building from the one street to the other. In order to make this quite clear, I do what I very seldom do, and take the opportunity of saying something after my brethren, because I see this is a matter of great practical convenience for the Glasgow authorities, and it is a pity there should be any doubt about it. I think I can make my meaning clear by an illustration. Supposing one was building for the first time between Princes Street and George Street, I can quite understand that if you build a house in Princes Street and add the ground up to George Street, it would be certainly an abuse of ordinary language to talk of the ground that was behind, after you built your house in Princes Street, as abutting on George Street; but if you build one continuous building that goes from Princes Street to George Street, then I do not think it is an abuse of language to talk of any building which is left after you have done that to your Princes Street building as abutting on George Street. It may be that when 50 feet is taken it is rather a small breadth, but that the section applies quite clearly to parallel streets as well as to streets meeting at an angle I have no doubt. It says: "Remember that your building must only come 50 feet back, and the rest is to be considered as abutting on the smaller street for regulation of height."

Then the judgment of the Court will be: Recal the interlocutors in hoc statu, and remit both cases to the Dean of Guild to proceed as shall be just.—12*th July* 1907.

Local Government—Public Health—Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 75), sects. 3 and 4, and 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 31), sect. 1—Action at Instance of County Council—Action Against Burgh Sanitary Authority for Contravention of sect. 3 of 1876 Act by Permitting Pollution of Stream—Defence That There Was No Pollution Where Stream Entered Territory of Pursuers—Proof Allowed.

Special Case.

On 25th and 28th August 1905 the County Council of the county of Lanark presented petitions in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Airdrie against the burghs of Coatbridge and of Airdrie respectively, praying the Court to ordain the defenders to abstain from causing to fall or flow into certain burns or streams, all of which streams flow through certain parishes in the county of Lanark, within the district of the pursuers, and the waters of which ultimately reach the river Clyde, any solid or liquid sewage matter.

[1st Div.

Magistrates, etc. of Coatbridge v. County Council of Lanark. Magistrates, etc. of Airdrie v. County Council of Lanark.

The grounds of action and the parties' averments were, as far as concerns the present decision, practically the same in either case. That against the burgh of Coatbridge is here reported.

The pursuers' averments were to the following effect:—

The pursuers are empowered under sect. 55 (1) of the Local Government Scotland Act 1889 to enforce the provisions of the Rivers Pollution (Scotland) Acts 1876–1893 within the county of Lanark. The defenders have for some time past caused, and are still causing, solid or liquid sewage matter to fall or flow, or have knowingly permitted, and are still permitting, solid or liquid sewage matter to fall or flow or be carried into the said streams, and that by means of certain sewers, the property of the defenders, thereby committing an offence under sect. 3 of the Rivers Pollution Act 1876. The said burns are each a stream within the meaning of sect. 20 of the Rivers Pollution Act 1876.

The defenders lodged a statement of facts which contained the following averments:—

Stat. 1. By sect. 8 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876, sanitary authorities are, subject to the restrictions in the Act, empowered to enforce the provisions of the Act in relation to any stream being within or passing through or by any part of their district, and for that purpose to institute proceedings in respect of any offence against the Act, which causes interference with the due flow within their district of any such stream, or the pollution within their district of any such stream, against any other sanitary authority or person, whether such offence is committed within or without the district of the first-named sanitary authority.

Stat. 2. The present arrangement of the drainage system of the burgh of Coatbridge has been in existence for more than thirty years, and was in operation prior to the passing of the Rivers Pollution Act 1876, and was taken over by the defenders on their constitution as a burgh in 1885. The burns and streams mentioned in pursuers' condescendence have been covered over, channelled, and bottomed for a long period, and within the burgh boundaries have been regularly used as public sewers. They are not burns and streams within the meaning of the Rivers Pollution Act, but from time immemorial have always been channels mainly used for sewage, and the waters therein have been unfit for the primary purposes. The owners of lands and heritages within defenders' burgh have prescriptive rights of permitting liquid or solid sewage matter to fall or flow into said sewers and all streams with which they combine, and are beyond the control of the defenders. In so far as the defenders have acquired the sewers and drains of the burgh under the Burgh Police Act 1892, they also acquired, on behalf of the burgh, prescriptive rights of use of said channels and watercourses for the purpose of permitting liquid and solid sewage matter to fall or flow into them and all streams with which they join. From time immemorial the upper waters of said burns and streams have received sewage and industrial refuse and effluent water, and where they pass through the burgh of Airdrie have been used as public sewers for the prescriptive period, and have been unfit for the primary purposes, and the defenders have no control over the burgh of Airdrie and the upper heritors to prevent such use. The Middle Ward District Committee of the pursuers also pass sewage into said upper waters. The lower waters of the said burns and streams are not polluted by the defenders. Any sewage therein is harmless and innocuous. From time immemorial they have received sewage from the upper waters under the prescriptive rights foresaid, and have been unfit for the primary purposes.

Magistrates, etc. of Coatbridge v. County Council of Lanark. Magistrates, etc. of Airdrie v. County Council of Lanark.

Stat. 3. The burns and streams mentioned in the pursuers' condescendence receive between their source and their outfall in the river Clyde chemical and other discharges from public works of a great variety of kinds on their banks or in their immediate vicinity, which discharges act as re-agents, and purify and render innocuous any solid or liquid sewage matter which falls or flows or is carried into them. The introduction into such burns or streams of such chemical or other re-agents renders all sewage matter discharged into them innocuous, and, moreover, is the best practicable and available means of rendering harmless any sewage matter falling or flowing or carried into such streams.

Stat. 4. By the entry into said burns and streams of such solid or liquid discharges, no interference with the due flow of such burns and streams within the pursuers' district takes place, nor is there any pollution within the pursuers' district of any such burns or streams for which the defenders are responsible, and no nuisance or injury to the public health or inconvenience to the public is caused by all or any of such burns or streams. The discharges into said streams at present complained of are no greater or worse now than they have been over a long period of years, and the petitioners or their predecessors have not heretofore made any complaint with regard to them.

They pleaded :—

1. The action being irrelevant and incompetent, and the Sheriff having no jurisdiction, ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

2. The pursuers having no title to sue, the action ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

3. No statutory offence being caused or permitted by the defenders, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

4. The burns and streams libelled not being streams within the meaning of the Rivers Pollution Act, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

5. Any sewage entering the said burns and streams, for which the defenders are responsible, being harmless and innocuous, and in any event the defenders having adopted the best practicable and available means of rendering their sewage harmless, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

6. The defenders having a prescriptive right to use, and having statutory authority for using, the said burns and streams as public sewers, and having also a prescriptive right to permit liquid and solid sewage matter to fall or flow into all streams with which they join, are entitled to absolvitor.

7. The whole allegations of the pursuers being unfounded in fact and incapable of proof, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

8. The owners of lands and heritages within the defenders' burgh having prescriptive rights to allow liquid and solid sewage matter to fall or flow into such streams and all streams with which they combine, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

9. There being other proceedings pending for the offence of polluting said streams, the present petition is incompetent, or at least ought to be sisted.

After sundry procedure the Sheriff (Guthrie) on 10th April 1906 pronounced the following interlocutor :—

"Having heard parties' procurators and considered the cause, Finds that the defenders admit that they are permitting sewage matter to fall or flow or be carried into the streams condescended on in the petition; finds that they are thus committing an offence against sect. 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876; repels the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth pleas for the defenders; reserves meantime their fifth plea in law, in so far as it coincides with the eighth plea for the defenders in the action by the County Council against the burgh of Airdrie; quoad ultra, repels said fifth plea; before making a remit as directed by sect. 10 of the said Act, appoints parties to be heard as to the terms of the remit. . . ."

[The eighth plea for the defenders in the action against the burgh of Airdrie was in these terms: "There being no means practicable and available by which the defenders can render the sewage less harmful, the defenders should be assoilzied."]

The Sheriff added the following note to his interlocutor :—

The defenders do not deny that they discharge sewage into the burns and rivers mentioned in the petition and condescendence. But they have stated a number of pleas as to competency and relevancy, and supported them with much apparent earnestness. On examination it is difficult to discover in them any real answer to the pursuers' case. But out of respect to the important communities represented by the defenders and the able procurators who addressed me, I shall try to enumerate the principal points discussed, and state my opinion in regard to each.

1. Title to sue. I can only look upon the 55th section of the Local Government Act as adding the County Council as an authority entitled to take proceedings against all offenders against the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Act passed thirteen years previously. Probably it was thought that that Act was not duly enforced, and that the newly instituted County Council should be invested with powers in addition to other sanitary authorities, whether created by the Act or previously existing. And it is to be observed that the section not only invests the County Council with "powers," but imposes on it "duties." This disposes, I think, of the point, which was more than once put forward, that the County Council has no "interest" to prosecute. I apprehend that an interest is not required when Parliament imposes a duty. But even if it were not so, has not the county an interest in the purity of its rivers?

2. It is said that the burns and rivers are not streams in the sense of the statute, but are watercourses which, at the passing of the Act, "were mainly used as sewers and emptying directly into a tidal river" (sect. 20). I do not think this can be seriously maintained. None of the streams empty into the sea, and there can be no pretence for saying that any but the North Calder water empties into a tidal river. That river flows into the Clyde, but at a point where, as common knowledge, which the Court is bound to use, informs us, the Clyde is not a tidal river. The tide cannot come beyond Carmyle Weir, which is lower down than the entry of North Calder water. In the Portobello case, where the definition clause of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act was discussed, the Figgate Burn emptied into the sea, and the tide probably ascended as far as the junction of the Pow and Braid Burns—the other streams whose pollution was complained of (10 R. 130).

3. It is said nuisance is not averred. The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act says nothing about nuisance. It assumes that sewage should not be discharged into rivers, and seeks to prevent that from being done.

4. The defenders plead that as private persons in the burgh have a right by use and prescription to lead their drains into these streams within the burgh, they have no power to prevent sewage from reaching them. It is rather unusual in these days for municipal persons to depreciate or minimise their powers. But a perusal of the 219th, 222nd, and adjoining sections of the Burgh Police Act 1892, shews the real position of the defenders with regard to the drainage and sewers within the burgh, and negatives their pleas on this point.

I regret not to be able to deal at greater length with arguments which occupied a considerable time. But there are really, as it seems to me, no relevant defences to the petition, and no course is open but to find, as the defenders admit, that they are permitting sewage to flow into the streams condescended on, and to remit to an engineer to report as to the best practicable and available means of preventing sewage matter from flowing or falling into the said streams, or of rendering it harmless, and as to the nature and cost of the work and apparatus required. The defenders do not allege that they have used any means to render the sewage passing into the streams harmless. Thus there is no case falling within the second paragraph of sect. 3, and the remit required is simply one under sect. 10 for the information of the Court.

Perhaps I should notice two decisions referred to on both sides. The Portobello case, already cited, differs from this in respect that a proof was taken before the Sheriff as to the history of the streams and the extent of pollution. The judges did not comment on this, or hold it to be unnecessary; and as pollution was not admitted, perhaps it could not have been avoided. The proof seems, however, to have dealt with a good deal of matter which, in the light of subsequent cases, and on a true construction of the Act, was irrelevant.

The other case is in the West Riding of Yorkshire Council v. Holmfirth Urban Sanitary Authority [1894], 2 Q.B. 842, which shews that even where a sanitary authority does not increase the quantity of sewage matter entering a stream by ancient sewers within its district, it is within the third section of the Act.

The principle of this judgment is illustrated and confirmed by the Midlothian County Council v. Oakbank Oil Co., 6 F. 387, a case under the fourth section of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act.

Although the defenders' pleas as answers to the charge of committing an offence against the Act and to their being ordered to do their duty are repelled, it does not follow that the referee and the Court may not give effect to some of their contentions when the manner in which they are to do their duty comes to be determined. Thus, as one example, it may be shewn that the continued use of the channels or the streams within the burgh for drainage purposes may be expedient under conditions.

1st Div.

Magistrates, etc. of Coatbridge v. County Council of Lanark. Magistrates, etc. of Airdrie v. County Council of Lanark.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session by way of special case in which they contended:

". . . . that the Sheriff's interlocutor of 10th April 1906 is ill founded, and ought to be recalled. They maintain in their pleadings that they are not polluting the streams referred to, and that the petitioners have therefore no title to raise the present question with them. They aver in their statement of facts, and offer to prove, that the streams in respect of which complaint is made have for a space of at least fifty years been used as sewers by the inhabitants of Coatbridge and surrounding district; that they are dedicated to this purpose; and that the defenders have acquired a prescriptive right so to use said streams. They further maintain that any sewage which enters said streams is so largely mixed with chemicals as to be innocuous, and that no further means are required to render it harmless. The appellants therefore maintain that they are entitled to a proof of their averments as set forth in their statement of facts, and that the Sheriff was not justified in disposing of the case without inquiry."

The following Questions of Law were submitted to the judgment of the Court:—

1. Was the Sheriff right in finding that the defenders admit they are permitting sewage matter to flow into the said streams?
2. If so, were the defenders thereby committing an offence against the said sect. 3?
3. Ought the Sheriff to have repelled the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth pleas for the defenders, or any of them?
4. Was the Sheriff bound to allow the defenders a proof of their averments?

The provisions of the Rivers Pollution Acts in question in the case are quoted by the Lord President in his opinion.

Argued for the Appellants: The Sheriff was wrong in not allowing a proof. The offence charged was that of having "knowingly permitted sewage to fall or flow," under sect. 3 of the Act of 1876. The offence was denied, and it was averred that private parties had prescriptive rights in the matter over which the appellants had no control. The case of the Midlothian County Council v. Oakbank Oil Co. Ltd. (1904, 6 F. 387), relied upon by the respondents, had no bearing. That case dealt with parties "causing" pollution under sect. 4, and did not touch the question of "knowingly permitting" here raised. The Court would insist upon full enquiry, especially where it was sought to interfere with the actings of a public body, nor would it grant interdict to compel parties to do what they were unable to do (Att.-Gen. v. Dorking Guardians, 1881, 20 Chan. Div. 595; Kirkheaton Local Board v. Ainley, Sons & Co. [1892], 2 Q.B. 274; Yorkshire W. Riding Council v. Holmfirth

Magistrates, etc. of Airdrie v. County Council of Lanark.

San. Auth. [1894], 2 Q.B. 842, p. Lindley, L.J., at p. 849).

Argued for the Respondents: The Sheriff had decided rightly. The obligation of the burgh to purify all sewage entering streams within its jurisdiction was absolute (Midlothian County Council v. Oakbank Oil Co., sup. cit.). This was the effect of sect. 1 of the Act of 1893 (Midlothian County Council v. Oakbank Oil Co., sup. cit.). There was no relevant averment that the appellants were using any means of preventing pollution which would entitle them to the exemption given in par. 2 of sect. 3 of the Act of 1876. Nor was there any relevant averment that the streams were de facto free from pollution when they entered the district of the respondents. The burgh had compulsory powers under the Burgh Police Act 1892 of dealing with drainage and pollution, but had taken no action thereunder.

Leave was given to the appellants, after the hearing of the case, to amend their record by the addition of the following statement:—

"At the point where the said streams leave the jurisdiction of the appellants and enter the territorial jurisdiction of the respondents they are not polluted by any solid or liquid sewage matter."

The Court, in respect of the Minute of Amendment, found it unnecessary to answer the questions submitted in the case, recalled in hoc statu the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 10th April 1906, and allowed the parties a proof of the averments contained in the said Minute.

The Lord President.—My Lords, these are two special cases which are brought under the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act of 1876, submitting for review a finding of the Sheriff to whom the complaint was presented. The complaint in each case is at the instance of the County Council of the county of Lanark, and is directed against the Magistrates of Coatbridge and the Magistrates of Airdrie in their capacity as Public Health Authority; and what the complaint seeks is to have a declaration that these two public authorities are committing an offence under the third section of the Rivers Pollution Act, and should be restrained from so doing. The offence which they are alleged to have committed is that they have allowed sewage matter from their system of drains to go into a certain set of small streams which are mentioned in the petition. Now, my Lords, the defence that is made by the two local authorities is twofold. The defence of which we heard most at the time of the discussion was that these two local authorities—who admit that they are the drainage authorities and that they have a system of drains—took over their system of drains, to a great extent at least, at a time prior to the passing of the 1876 Act; that as a matter of fact the streams in question had long ago been turned into what are practically sewers; and that the inhabitants of the two respective burghs had long ago gained a prescriptive right to put their sewage into these streams. On that state of facts the appellants have argued that no offence could be committed, and that they are entitled to be free. There is a second line of defence, which I shall presently notice; but, my Lords, as regards the first I think it is necessary first of all to look carefully at what the statute has laid down upon the matter. The offence is determined by the third section of the Act of 1876, which is in these terms:—"Every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow, or to be carried into any stream, any solid or liquid sewage matter, shall (subject as in this Act mentioned) be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act." Now, the burghs deny that the streams mentioned in the petition are streams in the sense of the Act. The Sheriff has decided that against them, and I think that there can be little doubt that the Sheriff here was right. A stream does not cease to be a stream because as a matter of fact after a portion of its passage through land you cover it up and practically make a drain of it. It still retains its character as a stream which is not purely historic, and it emerges as a stream after you get outside the territory. I think this is made still more clear by the terms of the definition which is given in sect. 20, where "stream" is said to include—I am omitting other parts of the section—"rivers, streams, canals, lakes, and watercourses other than watercourses at the passing of this Act mainly used as sewers, and emptying directly into the sea or tidal waters. . . ." Now, the streams in question here are not streams which empty directly into the sea, and therefore I think that ends it.

Now, the next branch of their defence is that inasmuch as the sewage is being contributed by other persons who have, as they allege, a prescriptive right to put in the sewage, the appellants cannot be "causing to fall or flow, or knowingly permitting to fall or flow," that sewage. My Lords, I think that would have been a question of considerable difficulty if the matter had rested upon the Act that I have quoted alone, but then it does not, because there is the explaining Act of 1893, and that Act, which is headed "An Act to Explain the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876," provides by the first section, "Where any sewage matter falls or flows or is carried into any stream after passing through or along a channel which is vested in a sanitary authority, the sanitary authority shall, for the purposes of sect. 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876, be deemed to knowingly permit the sewage matter so to fall, flow, or be carried." My Lords, I entirely agree with the remark of the learned Dean of Faculty that that section was passed for the very purpose of avoiding these difficult questions, and in my judgment that section concludes the matter. We are here, on these facts, directly under the words of the section, and therefore I think it is out of the question to say that these local authorities here do not permit to fall, or flow, or be carried into any stream, any solid or liquid sewage matter, provided that solid or liquid sewage matter goes in.

Now, another point was incidentally raised. The third section which I have quoted goes on thus: "Where any sewage matter falls or flows or is carried into any stream along a channel used, constructed, or in process of construction at the date of the passing of this Act for the purpose of conveying such sewage matter, the person causing or knowingly permitting the sewage matter so to fall or flow or to be carried, shall not be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act, if he shews to the satisfaction of the Court having cognisance of the case that he is using the best practicable and available means to render harmless the sewage matter so falling or flowing or carried into the stream." Now, the local authorities here have put in an averment to this effect. They say that besides the sewage which is in these streams or sewers there are also a great many chemical discharges and other discharges from works, and that these chemical discharges act as re-agents, with the result that the whole liquid is purified; and, accordingly, counsel argued to us that there could not be an offence here, because they had really come under the terms of this second bit of the third section. My Lords, I think here again the Sheriff has taken the right view, that we are not within the scope of that provision at all, because I think the second part of the third section clearly points to a person who allows the sewage to go in, doing something to prevent the contaminating nature of that sewage when it gets there, whereas the point of the averment here is that they do nothing. I think, therefore, that there is no averment which brings them under that second part of the third section. That, however, does not conclude the whole matter against them, as I shall presently shew when I come to the other sections. My Lords, the result, as far as I have gone at present, therefore, seems to me this, that the learned Sheriff is perfectly right in holding that upon the face of the proceedings there had here been an offence committed, and that the local authorities of these two burghs could not take any help either first, from the fact that the sewage was put in by persons who, they allege, to a great extent had a prescriptive right to put it in, or, second, from the fact that they further said that other things went in which rendered the sewage innocuous.

But then, my Lords, there is another matter which I think perhaps a little escaped notice, through the form of the pleadings, and chiefly through the fact that the brunt of the contest in the Court below was upon the topics which I have just handled, and that is this: the complaining authority here have only got a title, they not being in the district themselves, under the eighth section of the Act. Now, the eighth section of the Act says this: "Every sanitary authority shall, subject to the restrictions in this Act contained, have power to enforce the provisions of this Act in relation to any stream being within or passing through or by any part of their district, and for that purpose to institute proceedings in respect of any offence against this Act which causes interference with the due flow within their district of any such stream, or the pollution within their district of any such stream, against any other sanitary authority or person, whether such offence is committed within or without the district of the first-named sanitary authority." Now, here it is quite clear that the offence is committed outside the district of the complaining sanitary authority, and therefore the complaining sanitary authority can only have a title if there is caused pollution within their district of any such stream. Now, I have already mentioned these averments to the effect of there being chemical matters put in which acted as re-agents and purified the sewage. The averments are put in with reference to the point which I have already dealt with, but of course if they were true in fact it would lead to the conclusion that when the general liquid went out of the district of the first sanitary authority into the second, it emerged as a pure liquid. Something very near an averment to that effect is put in the pleadings, because speaking of what they call the lower waters, they do say in Statement 2 of the Statement of Facts for the defenders, "The lower waters of the said burns and streams are not polluted by the defenders." My Lords, your Lordships thought that that was not a very satisfactory state of averment, and the averment has now been cleared up by the defenders having put in a Minute in these terms:—"They crave leave to amend the record by inserting 'At the point where said burns or streams leave the territorial jurisdiction of the defenders and enter that of the pursuers, they are not polluted by solid or liquid sewage matter.'" Now, my Lords, that seems to me a perfectly straight and satisfactory averment, and if that averment is true, then I think it is quite clear that the title of the complaining authority disappears, because they do not bring this within the words of section 8 which alone gives them a title; and therefore I think with regard to that averment, which I think they are of course entitled to make, that the finding of the Sheriff, who, without proof, has decided that an offence has been at this moment committed, cannot stand. I do not think that it is at all the Sheriff's fault, because I think, as

I say, that the brunt of the discussion turned upon the other topics before him, and this particular topic was rather lost sight of and not sufficiently accentuated in the pleadings of the defenders; but I think the defenders are clearly entitled to have an opportunity of proving that, and if they prove it satisfactorily, then I think the pursuers would have no title to ask for a finding that an offence has been committed. Accordingly, I think what your Lordships ought to do is to send back the case to the Sheriff with the intimation that is contained in our opinions that he should allow this amendment of the record and allow a proof upon that specific point, and upon that specific point alone. But I think we can do nothing else, because if I may assume for the moment that the defenders—I am merely assuming by way of hypothesis—if I assume for the moment that the defenders fail upon that, then I think the Sheriff's finding that an offence has been committed was quite right, that is to say, that I do not think there was any good case upon the second portion of section 3—anything which hung up the question of an offence having been committed. What I think did then ensue was an enquiry under section 10, and that the Sheriff was prepared to make, because he had made a remit under section 10. Section 10 does not compel the Court to pronounce interdict at once, for it provides that the Court may insert such conditions as to time or mode of action as it may think just, and really puts the Court in complete possession of the matter. Moreover, it also provides: "Previous to granting such order the Court may, if it thinks fit, remit to skilled parties to report on the best practicable and available means." The matter is somewhat complicated, but I hope I have made it sufficiently clear that I think the Sheriff's judgment was completely right, with the exception that there was this question of fact which is disputed, and which underlies the whole matter of title. If that is cleared out of the way I think the Sheriff's judgment is right. Under these circumstances I do not think it is necessary to answer the specific questions, but simply to remit the case simpliciter to the Sheriff, with this indication, that we think he ought to allow the amendment of the record and proof upon that single point.

124. Howard's Trustees v. Howard and Others.

Fee and Liferent—Company—Bonus Paid out of Reserve Fund—Simultaneous Creation of New Capital—Capital or Dividend—Held That Bonus Dividend Did Not Go to Liferentrix.

Special Case.

This was a special case presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to whether a liferenter or fiars under a trust disposition and settlement were entitled to payment of a bonus on certain shares held by the trustees under the settlement. By trust disposition and settlement dated 18th May 1891 James Brown Howard gave to his widow, the second party to this case, the liferent of his whole estate. The third parties were the residuary legatees under the trust disposition and settlement. James Brown Howard died on 16th May 1895. Shortly before his death the business of theatrical proprietors, of which the truster was a partner, was acquired by a company known as Howard & Wyndham Ltd., and by article 9 of the articles of association the company was empowered from time to time to increase its share capital. The truster, and afterwards the first parties to this case as trustees under the trust disposition and settlement, held, among others, certain ordinary shares in the company, and by agreement entered into with the company the truster was bound not to sell any of the ordinary shares for a period of seven years from the term of Whitsunday 1895. The trustees held the truster's ordinary shares until after the seven years had expired; and having thereafter disposed of part of their holding, they held, as at 19th April 1904, 620 ordinary shares of the company.

On 29th February 1904 the directors of the company issued a circular letter intimating to the shareholders that, as the result of the year's working, the reserve fund of the company would be increased to £35,000 and that as a sum larger than the amount of the reserve had been expended in connection with a new theatre in Glasgow, the directors recommended that the capital of the company should be increased, and the reserve fund of £35,000 should be applied by the shareholders in payment of 7000 additional ordinary shares of £5 each to be allotted to existing ordinary shareholders, and on this being done, that a special dividend or bonus of £5 on each ordinary share should be declared.

On 19th April 1904 the directors issued another circular letter to the shareholders intimating that the above proposals had been carried into effect, and enclosing a letter of allotment with warrant for the amount of the bonus attached to the allotment letter, and requesting the ordinary shareholders, if they desired to take up the allotment, to sign and return the allotment letter, and stating that the annexed warrant could be made available for paying up the amount due on the shares allotted. The first parties, as trustees, signed and returned the allotment letter for 620 new ordinary shares allotted in respect of their holding, and also signed the bonus warrant and returned it to the company, the bonus being applied in payment of the shares allotted. The 620 new ordinary shares allotted to the trustees were afterwards sold at £6 per share.

The question arose between the parties to this case as to whether the said special dividend or bonus declared by the company and paid by them to the trustees in respect of the shares held by them, or the price obtained for the shares purchased by the trustees with the said bonus, fell to be paid over to the second party absolutely, or whether the amount of the bonus, or the proceeds of the new shares of the company purchased by the first parties with the special dividend or bonus, should continue to be held by the first parties for the liferent use only of the second party, and for the third parties in fee.

The following questions of law were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—

1. Was the second party entitled to the said special dividend or bonus declared and paid by the said Company on the ordinary shares held by the first parties for her in liferent?

2. If the first question be answered in the affirmative, is the second party now entitled to payment of (1) the proceeds of the said shares which were purchased with the said special dividend or bonus? or (2) the original amount of the said special dividend or bonus?

The first and third parties maintained and argued that the amount of the special dividend or bonus formed part of the capital of the trust estate, and that the same, or the proceeds of the shares allotted to the first parties in consideration thereof, must be held by the first parties for the liferent use only of the second party, and for behoof of the third parties in fee.

The second party maintained and argued that the special dividend formed part of the income or revenue of the trust estate, and that the proceeds of the shares allotted to the first parties in consideration thereof, or, in any event, the amount of the special dividend or bonus, must be paid over to her absolutely.

Reference was made to the following cases:—Bouch v. Sproule, L.R. 12 A.C. 385; Gunnis' Trs. v. Gunnis, 1903, 6 F. 104; Cunliff's Trs. v. Cunliff, 1901, 3 F. 202; Blyth's Trs. v. Milne, 1905, 7 F. 799; In re Malam [1894], 3 Ch. 578.

The Court answered the first question in the negative, holding that the bonus dividend did not go to the liferentrix.

1st Div.

Howard's Trustees v. Howard and Others.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the question here is whether the liferenter or the fiars should get a certain payment of a bonus of £5 on each of 620 ordinary shares of the company of Howard & Wyndham, which were held by the trustees in the settlement of Mr James Brown Howard. Your Lordships had occasion very recently in the case of Blyth, 7 F. 799, to examine the law on this matter, and I think it would be useless to repeat what was there said, because I understand all your Lordships agree that the law as laid down there was correct. But the difficulty always comes in the application of that law to the precise facts of each case; and I think I had occasion in Blyth's case to point out that no one case could be held to rule another, though of course cases might be cited as types of the different class of facts to which the law became applicable, taking them as types and nothing more. The whole question here is whether this case falls within the type of Blyth's case, where we held the dividend was properly dividend and was therefore given to the liferenter, or whether it falls within the type of Gunnis's case, 6 F. 104, where the Second Division held that it was not dividend but fell to the fiars

The Lord President.

I think Lord Herschell made the remark in the case of Bouch, L.R. 12 A.C. 385, that it was necessary to look both to the form and substance. I try, therefore, to look at both, and I find that the matter begins thus. The directors of the Company sent out a letter to the shareholders in which they say that the sum at the credit of reserve is now increased to £35,000. And then they go on to say: "As the Company has expended in connection with the new King's Theatre in Glasgow (which is practically completed) a sum larger than the amount of the reserve, the directors are of opinion, and recommend, that the reserve should now take the more permanent form of additional capital." Now that is as plain as words can put it, that here what the directors meant by the phrase "dividend" is a distribution of capital and not of revenue, and for this very good reason, that really they had not the money to distribute as dividend. They had got £35,000 at the credit of reserve, but at the same time had spent more than £35,000 in erecting a new theatre, and they said, "We want to keep this as capital, and propose that our reserve fund should assume the form of capital." More than that, I do not think myself that at that moment the directors could have divided the £35,000 as dividend, because in the condition that the Articles of Association stood in at that moment the reserve fund was controlled by Article 115, which was this:—"Subject to the provisions of these presents, the directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside,

1ST DIV.

Howard's Trustees v. Howard and Others.

The Lord President.

out of the profits of the Company, such sum as they may think proper as a reserve fund to meet contingencies or for equalising dividends." I think that, standing that article without any alteration on it, they could not have divided the whole of the reserve fund as bonus, because you could not call it an equalising dividend, and it is not to meet contingencies, and the directors must have felt that in doing what they next proceeded to do. They altered that article by special resolution by adding the following words, "or for paying special dividends or bonuses." What they did after that first letter was, that they then proceeded to create new capital and to offer that new capital to the shareholders, and also to declare a special dividend bonus in terms of that addition to Article 115, and to declare it at such an amount that each shareholder by getting the dividend bonus would have exactly enough money to pay for the new share. It is perfectly true that that was done in such a way that, if a shareholder had taken up his dividend warrant, he might have got money for it without applying it to the purchase of the new shares, and he might have transferred his letter of allotment to somebody else. But the substance of the transaction was, I think, clear, and that was that the distribution was not as dividend but as division of capital, though the precise way in which it was done was by dividend warrant. I therefore think that the design was on the same lines as in Gunnis's case, that the distribution was of part of the capital, and so the question of law falls to be answered by saying that the second party is not entitled to the special dividend or bonus. That supersedes the second question.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. Of the cases cited, that of Gunnis comes nearest to the present, although the rule we are to follow is laid down with the highest authority in the case of Blyth. I agree that the so-called bonus dividend in question must be treated as capital, for the reasons your Lordship has stated. It was not any part of the intention of the directors, or of the shareholders who assented to the scheme proposed by the directors, to distribute the reserve fund as money available for the payment of dividend or bonus, and it was quite impossible that anything of the kind could have been done, both because the Articles of the Company as they stood would not have allowed it, and also because the money no longer existed so as to be divisible in that form. The money had been spent in acquiring a new theatre in Glasgow, and the whole purpose of the operations proposed by the directors and assented to by the Company appears to me to have been simply this—to state the accounts so as to record in the most convenient form operations that had been already carried out, and to define the interests of the shareholders in the result. The good faith of the transaction between the Company and the shareholders appears to me to have been that the shareholders on obtaining these dividend warrants were to apply for allotment of the new shares. It is quite true that any individual shareholder might, if he thought fit, have done otherwise and turned his dividend warrant into money. But, in the first place, that was not the true intent of the transaction as between the shareholders and the Company; and, in the second place, it is apparent on the face of the circular letter issued by the directors that they had throughout a well-justified confidence in the action of the directors, because it was for their "interest to take up the allotment." The trustees accordingly did take up the allotment, and I think nobody disputes that in doing so they were acting prudently in the administration of their trust. I quite agree that they were dealing with the capital of the trust estate, and that the new shares form part of the capital and no part of the income.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897, SECTS. 1, 2 (C)—"SERIOUS AND WILFUL MISCONDUCT"—DRIVING CART WITHOUT HOLDING REINS—BREACH OF ROAD REGULATION—ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACT 1878 (41 AND 42 VICT. C. 51), SCHEDULE C, SECT. XCVII.—DRIVING WITHOUT HOLDING REINS NOT "SERIOUS AND WILFUL MISCONDUCT."

Stated Case under Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

This was an appeal by way of Stated Case from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Campbell Smith) in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee, between Mrs Mary Lyall or Mitchell and others, widow and children of the late William Mitchell, farm servant, Waterybutts, Barry, and James Whitton, farmer there.

The facts as stated by the Sheriff-Substitute are summarised as follows:—The deceased William Mitchell was employed as a farm-servant on the farm of Waterybutts, of which James Whitton was the tenant. On 14th January the deceased was in charge of a horse and cart belonging to Whitton, and was killed by the cart being overturned and falling upon him. At the time when the accident occurred the deceased was driving the cart along a public road, and was not holding the reins in his hand, but had tied them within reach to the left upper ring of the breeching. The accident was caused by the horse suddenly bolting off the road through an open gate into a field. The left wheel of the cart passed over a heap of road scrapings and ran into the left hand pillar of the gate, with the result that the cart was overturned and the deceased killed.

In these circumstances the Sheriff-Substitute found in fact that the death of the workman was not attributable to any serious and wilful misconduct on his part.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—

Was the accident to the deceased attributable to his own serious and wilful misconduct within the meaning of sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (c), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897?

Schedule C, sect. xcvii., of the Roads and Bridges Act 1878 provides that—

"if the driver of any cart, ... on any turnpike road shall ride on the shafts, or in or on any other part of such carriage, without having and holding reins attached to each side of the bridle of each beast of draught drawing such cart . . . . or shall at any time leave the same travelling on any such road without having some person to guide the beast . . . . such driver shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five pounds, over and above the damages occasioned thereby."

James Whitton appealed and argued: (1) The accident was due to the deceased's serious and wilful misconduct in not holding the reins in his hand, and thus keeping control of the horse. (2) The case was analogous to that of Dobson v. United Collieries Ltd., 1905, 8 F. 241. In that case it was held that disobedience to a duly published special rule in force in a mine was serious and wilful misconduct. In this case the deceased was in breach of a statutory regulation in driving the cart without having the reins in his hand (Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act 1897, Schedule C, sect. xcvii.).

Counsel for respondents were not called on.

The Court answered the question of law in the negative.

The Lord President.—I think this is a pure question of fact, and that the Sheriff-Substitute's statement of the circumstances discloses nothing that can give rise to a question of law. I therefore think it is not a case for review. In such cases there may be a question raised which is one of mixed fact and law and so capable of review, but I do not think the question here is of that nature. But even if I could have reviewed the decision I should have come to the same conclusion, for I think there is nothing disclosed here which amounts to serious and wilful misconduct, as that has been interpreted in various well-known decisions in the House of Lords. I think, therefore, the question must be answered in the negative.

Appeal from Dean of Guild Court of Glasgow.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Dean of Guild of the City of Glasgow (Mason) in a petition for lining at the instance of J. A. Mactaggart & Company, builders, Glasgow. The petition was objected to, inter alios, by Mrs E. E. Roemmele and William Baird.

The petitioners pleaded, inter alia:—"2. The respondents' objections should be repelled, and decree of lining granted as craved, in respect . . . (d) the respondents are barred by their acting and acquiescence from insisting on them."

The Dean of Guild granted the decree of lining, and the respondents appealed.

The facts of the case appear from the Lord President's opinion.

The accompanying map is a copy of the plan referred to in the titles, with these exceptions:—the red line in the plan is a black line on the map; the sites of the tenements in existence at the date of this petition are hatched at the edges, and the site of the proposed tenements is hatched all over.

The following authorities were referred to:—For the Appellants: Liddell v. Duncan, 1898, 25 R. 1119. For the Respondents: Johnston v. The Walker Trs., 1897, 24 R. 1061; Stewart v. Bunten, 1878, 5 R. 1108; Gould v. M'Corquodale, 1869, 8 M. 165.

1ST DIV.

J. A. Mactaggart & Co. v. Roemmele and Another.

The Lord President.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, and refused the decree of lining.

The Lord President.—This is an appeal from a decree of lining granted by the Dean of Guild of Glasgow. The petitioners propose to erect tenements upon a piece of land situated between Cambridge Drive and Kelvinside Gardens. This was objected to by several of the petitioners' neighbours as being in contravention of the restriction contained in the petitioners' title. The Dean of Guild repelled the title of all but two neighbours, namely, Mrs Roemmele and Mr Baird, and the other objectors acquiesced in his judgment. As regards Mrs Roemmele and Mr Baird, the Dean of Guild sustained their title, and further, held that the erection of the tenements in question was in violation of the restriction contained in the petitioners' titles; but, in respect that the petitioners pled—plea 2 (d),—that the respondents were barred by their acting and acquiescence from insisting in the objections, he allowed the petitioners a proof of their averments supporting that plea. The averments, so far as relating to the two objectors, are stated in answer 15 of the petitioners to the objectors' statement of facts as follows:—"Denied. Explained that tenements of four storeys in height have already been erected in Kelvinside Gardens, partly opposite the ground on which the petitioners propose to erect tenements, and also almost wholly opposite the ground owned by the objector Mrs Emilia Elizabeth Bost or Roemmele. . . . Explained further, that in the immediate neighbourhood, on part of said lands on the east of Kelvinside, four-storey tenements have also been erected."

Upon the result of that proof the Dean of Guild sustained the plea and granted the decree of lining. Against that interlocutor the present appeal is brought. The objectors, in the original pleadings, stated some objections to the petitioners' title, but before your Lordships they have not argued these questions, and have restricted their argument to the question of whether the Dean of Guild was right in sustaining the plea of "bar." In the same way, the respondents before your Lordships have abandoned all other pleas than that sustained, and in particular they conceded that the objectors, the respondents to the appeal, had, apart from "bar," a good title as co-feuars to insist on the restriction in the petitioners' titles, and that the operations proposed were in violation of these restrictions.

The question thus raised is an important one, and not directly, I think, covered by decision. It is important, therefore, first to see exactly how the facts stand as to the actings or acquiescence of the objectors, which have, according to the judgment, barred them from insisting on what otherwise would be their right. The community of feuars who are, by the Dean's judgment, agreed to in so far by both parties, in titulo to mutually enforce restrictions against each other, are the feuars whose feus are situated within a red line delineated on a plan referred to in the titles. It may be described thus:—The red line begins at the place called Queen Margaret's Drive. It then goes along Cambridge Drive, and then cuts to the southward at a point which I cannot indicate otherwise than by saying that it goes down past the letter "D" on the plan in process in the word "Drive" of Cambridge Drive, and through the letter "A" of "Kelvinside Gardens." It then comes south to Doune Terrace, and then goes along Kelvinside Terrace North, and finally meets at Queen Margaret's Drive, where it started. It thus includes an area which consists of stances or lines of building ground facing Queen Margaret's Drive, part of Cambridge Drive, part of Kelvinside Gardens, and Kelvinside Terrace North. Now, what has happened in the past is this: at the north-west of the ground tenemental erections have been made, that is to say, some have been constructed upon that portion of the ground facing Queen Margaret's Drive and the western portion of Cambridge Drive. Nothing of a tenemental character has been put upon the north side of Kelvinside Gardens or upon that portion of Kelvinside Terrace North which is found between the end of Kelvinside Gardens and the beginning of Queen Margaret's Drive. A short piece of tenemental building has been erected on the south side of Kelvinside Gardens opposite Mrs Roemmele's villa and a portion of the ground for which a lining is here sought. There are also pieces of tenemental building facing southwards, and situated in the south-east corner of the area enclosed within the red line.

The whole matter may be summarised thus. As far as Mrs Roemmele is concerned, she has got tenemental buildings on the opposite side of the street opposite her, but she has got none as her next-door neighbour. As far as Mr Baird is concerned, he has not got any opposite or behind him, and he has got none as next-door neighbour, but, of course, there are on various portions, as I have already described, of this area within the red line, undoubtedly tenemental buildings. The proposal of the petitioners is to erect tenemental buildings which will be next door both to Mrs Roemmele and Mr Baird, and which will for the first time invade that peninsula of land formed by Cambridge Drive and Kelvinside Gardens coming together, and which at present is entirely dedicated to the original villa buildings which were erected.

I now propose to examine the authority as to this branch of the law. I do not think it necessary to go through the long series of cases which gradually established the proposition that there might be created by the original act of the superior a right in each of a set of vassals to enforce restrictions in the titles of another vassal

[J. A. Mactaggart & Co. v. Roemmele and Another.

1st Div.

J. A. Mactaggart & Co. v. Roemmele and Another.

The Lord President.

with whom they had no direct privity of contract and no direct relation of tenure, because the whole law on the subject may be said to be summed up in two leading cases in the House of Lords, namely, Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trs., 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 95, and the Earl of Zetland, 1882, 9 R. (H.L.) 40. These two cases seem to me to lay down with great precision the position of the superior and of the feuar. Thus Lord Watson says of the superior (Lord Zetland's case, at p. 47)—"I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the case of the Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts does determine that wherever a feu-right contains a restriction on property, the superior, or the party in whose favour it is conceived, cannot enforce it unless he has some legitimate interest. But that case does not lay down the doctrine that an action at the superior's instance, which merely sets forth the condition of his feu-right and its violation by his vassal, must be dismissed as irrelevant because the pursuer has failed to allege interest. Prima facie, the vassal, in consenting to be bound by the restriction, concedes the interest of the superior; and, therefore, it appears to me that the onus is upon the vassal who is pleading a release from his contract to allege and prove that, owing to some change of circumstances, any legitimate interest which the superior may originally have had in maintaining the restriction has ceased to exist. The law was so stated, and, in my opinion, correctly stated, by Lord Neaves in the case of Campbell v. Clydesdale Banking Company."

On the other hand, in regard to the feuar, the same noble and learned lord says (8 Rettie, H.L., p. 102):—"It is necessary to keep in view that when the feuar has a jus quæsitum, his title and that of the superior to enforce common feuing conditions are independent and substantially different rights. The title of the superior rests upon contract, a contract running with the estate of superiority, and burdening the subaltern estate of the vassal. The right of the feuar, though arising ex contractu, is of the nature of a proper servitude, his feu being the dominant tenement; consequently he cannot enforce it against other feuars, except in so far as he can qualify an interest to do so. Again, the superior's consent to discharge the condition cannot affect the right of the feuar, and as little can the feuar's renunciation of his servitude impair the superior's right to enforce the condition."

This difference in the right which exists in the superior and in the co-feuar seems to me necessarily to affect the character of the acts or omissions which will constitute a bar against them seeking to enforce their rights. It is clear that the actings of the superior cannot bind the co-feuar, and vice versa. But the matter goes deeper than that. Observe, for instance, the position which arises in the case of what I may call the first offender, that is, the case of the first feuar contravening the restrictions. The superior may object here at once, for, as Lord Watson says, his interest is prima facie conceded, and I am supposing there has been nothing extraneous to destroy the interest which the superior originally had. The superior, therefore, is clearly entitled to stop him. But with the co-feuar it is otherwise. He cannot stop him unless he can show a proper interest to do so. Accordingly, if the superior allows the act of the first offender to pass, he must either have willingly allowed it, or he must have conceded that all the legitimate interest to stop such acts was gone, whereas the only inference to be drawn from the non renitentia of the co-feuar is, that he did not consider that in that instance his interest was sufficient to warrant his interfering.

I am, therefore, not surprised to find that, so far as the decided cases were concerned, there was not produced to us any instance of a decision in which the co-feuar has been held barred from objecting to the contravention by A because he did not formerly object to the contravention by B, the quality of his interest to object to the operations of A and of B not being the same. On the contrary, the decisions of Stewart v. Bunten, and especially of Gould v. M'Corquodale, go quite the other way. In the case of the superior, there were the well-known decisions of Browns v. Burns, 1823, 2 S. 298, and Campbell v. Clydesdale Bank, 1868, 6 M. 943. But, as I have already pointed out, the superior is in a very different position. In other words, it is much more difficult to affirm that the quality of the superior's interest differs as regards each instance than it is to do so in the case of the co-feuar.

I do not think it necessary to go so far as to say there cannot be an instance where the failure of the co-feuar to assert his right in the case of other co-feuars may not be such as to allow the inference to be drawn that he has totally abandoned the right to enforce. Such an inference could strictly be drawn from the fact of his having himself contravened, and the undoubted acquiescence of his author in the dominant tenement may in this matter be reckoned as his own (Muirhead v. Glasgow Highland Society, 2 M. 420). But once it is settled that the right is a proper servitude on each of the separate feus, it is, to say the least of it, not easy to infer that because A does not stop B, he intends to free also C and D.

Applying these views to the facts of the present case, I come to the conclusion that the objectors are not barred from insisting in their admitted right to stop the proposed contravention of the petitioners. The Dean of Guild seems to me to have erred in limiting interest to one consideration only, namely, the uniformity of building in the whole neighbourhood. I do not doubt that that may represent an interest, but it is not the whole interest. A man may, it seems to me, well say: "I do not object to tenements in the neighbourhood; I do object to them next door." I think also that, within reasonable limits, a man may be allowed to be the best judge of his own interest. Whether the objector Baird could have stopped the erection of the more distant tenements may be doubtful. But, even assuming that he could, I do not think that, if he did not, he thereby forfeited his right to stop them next door. Tua res agitur paries cum proximus ardet is, I think, good law as well as common sense.

The position of Mrs Roemmele is more difficult. But I come to the same result. An opposite neighbour is not the same as a next-door one; and after all there is, I think, a legitimate interest in conserving the oasis of ground between Cambridge Drive and Kelvinside Gardens, which is as yet unspoiled by tenemental buildings. In the words of Lord Kinloch in M'Gibbon v. Rankin, 9 M., at p. 432, "The locality must doubtless in its own time follow the fate of most city localities, and do so with that unanimous consent which will get the better of special restrictions. Carlton Place of Glasgow, once well known as the residence of her foremost citizens, must descend to a lower rank and to baser uses, but the time is not to be heedlessly and injuriously precipitated."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Dean of Guild is wrong, and ought to be reversed.

Lord M'Laren.—The present case is, by the party maintaining the Dean of Guild's judgment, sought to be assimilated to the case of Campbell v. The Clydesdale Banking Co., 6 M. 943, which was decided on the principle that there had been a general abandonment of the original conditions of feu on the part of the community of feuars. I need hardly say that the case referred to is a very important authority, and for a period extending to nearly forty years it has been understood to regulate the rights of a member of a community of feuars who by tacit consent have relaxed the conditions imposed on them by the superior, and have used their property in a way which they conceived to be advantageous to themselves.

But in that case the action was at the instance of the superior, who was not successful in persuading the Court that he had any interest in the matter other than his interest to maintain his security for his feu-duties. I observe that Lord Cowan, who delivered the leading opinion in the case, states that the whole body of feuars were at one in holding it to be for their interest to depart from the building restriction, in repudiating it, as neither conducing to their utility nor to the ornament of their several possessions. His Lordship proceeded to observe that the superior's objections on this head had been disproved, and the judgment proceeded on the want of interest on the part of the superior to enforce the building restriction.

J. A. Mactaggart & Co. v. Roemmele and Another.
Lord M'Laren.

Now I am far from saying that in a question of this nature the consent, express or implied, of every individual feuar is a necessary step to the assertion of the right of one of them to vary to some extent the conditions by which he and his predecessors in title were originally bound. In the case of Johnstone v. The Walker Trs., 24 R. 1061, which came before this Division of the Court, it was assumed that a general departure from a building condition would amount to acquiescence on the part of the community of feuars. But this principle, founded as it is on equitable considerations, is subject to a very important qualification, viz. that the inference of general consent or acquiescence is not to be extended to alterations of a different character from those which have been permitted. On this point Lord Adam observes that the consent to the abandonment of certain building restrictions, implied from acquiescence, does not imply consent to the abandonment of all building restrictions which may be imposed upon the feuars. And in my own opinion the principle is stated to be, that where alterations or variations of the conditions of the feu-right have been permitted, the presumption is not for abandonment, but only for relaxation of the conditions of feu, according to the nature of the variations to which the feuars have presumably consented.

When we consider the facts of the present case, I think it may be taken that the appellants were tolerant of deviations from the conditions of feu which did not interfere with their personal comfort or convenience. They were not made parties to the Guild Court proceedings under which power was given to put up tenement or flatted houses within the area of the superiority, and apparently they did not consider that they had such an interest as would justify their intervention. Now I think it would be a very inconvenient, not to say inequitable, rule that a feuar who becomes aware of some infraction of building conditions by a feuar from the same superior, but at such a distance from himself that the infraction causes no inconvenience to him, must either apply for an interdict or be taken to have waived his right to enforce the condition in a question with conterminous feuars or disponees. I am putting an extreme case, in order to test the argument; because if in the case supposed the feuar does not lose his right to object by reason of tolerance or acquiescence where his comfort is not affected, then it is a question of degree, or rather a question of fact, in each case, whether his tacit assent or non-repugnantia in one or more cases of deviation from the conditions amounts to an abandonment to all intents of his rights in a question with the community.

In the present case I am not of opinion the abstention from legal proceedings on the part of the appellants, in cases where they did not conceive that their interests were affected, amounts to an abandonment of their rights to enforce the building conditions. I gather from the proof that Mr Baird's interest to enforce the conditions against the respondents is stronger than Mrs Roemmele's interest. But as I am not satisfied that in the case of either of the appellants there has been an abandonment of their contract rights, I think they are in pari casu in resisting the present application, and that their appeal should be allowed.

I may add, that I have heard the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, and desire to concur.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with the opinion given by your Lordship, and have nothing to add.

127. Christie v. Stevenson.

Justiciary Cases—Statutory Offences—Motor Car Act 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sect. 9—Charge of Driving at Excessive Speed Between Two Specified Points—Proof by Prosecutor Limited to a Portion Only of Distance Specified in the Complaint.

Bill of Suspension.

William Garnet Christie, timber importer, West Point, Saltcoats, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-Fiscal, setting forth:—

That the accused "has contravened The Motor Car Act 1903, sect. 9, as continued under Expiring Laws Continuation Act 1906, in so far as on 7th April 1907 he did drive a motor car at a speed of eighteen miles an hour, or otherwise at a speed exceeding ten miles an hour, on the public highway in the village of Seamill, parish of West Kilbride, and County of Ayr, being a place on the main road passing through said village, and at a part thereof between a point fifty yards before the first house, and a point fifty yards beyond the last house in said village, and being within the limits or being a place referred to or specified in the Motor Cars Regulation (County of Ayr) (No. 2) Order 1905, dated 5th April 1905, which Order was made by the Secretary for Scotland in pursuance of the powers vested in him by sects. 9 and 18 of said Act, and such offence is a second offence whereby," etc.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie) convicted him "of the contravention charged" and imposed a penalty of £7, with the alternative of twenty-one days' imprisonment.

Christie presented a bill of suspension in which he stated:—

"Stat. 3. In the said complaint the place where the said William Garnet Christie had driven at an excessive rate of speed was libelled as a part of the main road passing through the village of Seamill 'between a point fifty yards before the first house and a point fifty yards beyond the last house in said village.' The said distance so libelled is three-quarters of a mile in length. No proof, however, was led with regard to the rate at which the complainer had driven between the said two points, but proof was led only with regard to a distance extending to a quarter of a mile within said limits, where the police had laid a trap. Upon the said proof the Sheriff-Substitute, as already stated, wrongously and unjustly found the complainer guilty of the contravention charged in the complaint. . . .

"Stat. 4. The complainer's agent took exception to evidence directed to establish only the rate at which the present complainer had covered said quarter of a mile, on the ground (1) that the offence charged was not that he had driven at an excessive speed for said quarter of a mile, and (2) that he had no notice of such a limitation in the proof, although the prosecutor must have been well aware when the complaint was brought of the limitation to which he now proposed to confine it. His objection, however, was disregarded."

The Complainer pleaded: "The said conviction should be quashed, in respect that—

"1. It was incompetent.

"2. No proof was led of the contravention which was charged; and,

"3. The complainer had no proper notice in the complaint of the particular contravention with regard to which proof was led against him."

The Court refused the bill.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think we may hold here that the accused suffered no injustice by what has been done. But the question arises whether he is entitled to have this conviction quashed on account of want of specification of the locus in the complaint. I do not think he is.

I must say, however, that it would be fairer, in cases of this kind, if the prosecutor stated in the complaint the precise points between which he proposed to prove that the accused had exceeded the limit of speed laid down in the Order. But I cannot hold here that the complaint is irrelevant for want of specification, or that the accused had not in the complaint due notice of the charge he had to meet. On the whole matter, therefore, this suspension cannot be sustained.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur. It was quite necessary that the limits specified in the complaint, viz., fifty yards before the first house and fifty yards beyond the last house in the village, should be so specified, because otherwise the complaint would not have been in conformity with the order of which it charges a contravention. The question, however, whether the prosecutor should in such cases also insert in the complaint a further limit within which he was prepared to prove that the offence was actually committed depends on the extent of the limits specified in the Order and the complaint. It would, of course, be unfair and absurd to charge a person with having driven at an excessive speed between, say, Edinburgh and Glasgow, when the proof offered in support of the charge referred to a short distance, say, of a quarter of a mile as in the present case. On the other hand, where the limits given in the complaint are those of a small village, three-quarters of a mile long, the fact that the prosecutor does not further limit or specify the locus of the offence, although it was in his power to do so, does not seem to me to inflict any hardship on the accused. It certainly does not affect in the remotest degree the relevancy of complaint. The only question which can arise in this or similar cases is whether the prosecutor has given to the accused a reasonable amount of specification in describing the place where the offence was committed, and I have no doubt in holding that he has done so in the complaint at present under consideration.

128. MacLean v. MacLean.

Succession—Legacy—Special Legacy—Ademption—Held that a Bequest of a Sum in the Hands of the Legatee at the Date of Executing the Settlement, and Which Was Subsequently Repaid to the Testator, Was Not a Special Legacy, and Could Not Therefore be Adeemed.

Alexander MacLean, the pursuer in this case, was the son, and Flora MacLean, the defender, was the daughter, of Mrs Flora M'Leod or MacLean, who died on 31st July 1901, leaving a general disposition and settlement dated 13th June 1898, by which she appointed the defender to be her sole executrix, and disposed to her her "whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son Alick [the pursuer] has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself."

In this action the pursuer concluded (1) for an account of the defender's intromissions as executrix foresaid and as an individual . . . . with the whole means and estate of the said Mrs Flora M'Leod or M'Lean, and for payment of the sum of £1000, and for payment of the sum of £300. He averred that the defender had ingathered the said estate and that she was bound to make up proper accounts that he might ascertain the amount of his legal rights, but that she had refused to do so. He also averred that he was entitled to the said legacy of £300. The defender denied that she had refused to make up accounts. She averred that at the date of the said settlement in 1898 there was in the hands of the pursuer a sum of £300 belonging to the said Mrs M'Lean; that in the spring of 1901 the pursuer, being aware of the terms of the said settlement, wrote the defender a letter containing the following statement: "If mother is strong enough Flo tell her that I don't want to have this £300 as I am not in need of it and don't want people to think that I am in debt to you or mother and to oblige me tell Mr MacCallum to alter the will and allow me to return this £300, and since you are to be the trustee Flo, I wish to be straight—I won't take one cent;" that thereafter on 7th March 1901 the pursuer returned the said sum of £300 to his mother, and that it had been immixed with her other estate.

The defender pleaded, inter alia:—

"5. Said legacy of £300 having been adeemed, the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the conclusion for payment thereof."

In the Procedure Roll the defender's counsel cited Pagan v. Pagan, 1838, 16 S. 383; Chalmers v. Chalmers, 1851, 14 D. 57; Anderson v. Thomson, 1877, 4 R. 1101; Jack v. Lauder, 1742, M. 11357; Davidson's Trs. v. Davidson, 1901, 4 F. 107; Douglas' Exrs., 1869, 7 M. 504; Re Budle, 1879, 4 C.P.D. 336; Williams on Executors, 10th ed., 1061. The pursuer's counsel cited Mitchell's Trs. v. Fergus, 1889, 16 R. 902.

The Lord Ordinary repelled, inter alia, plea 5 for the defender; ordained the defender to lodge an account; and found that the legacy of £300 had not been adeemed.

Lord Mackenzie.—The pursuer of this action is the brother of the defender, and, so far as regards the conclusions for accounting, his demand is now limited to the second account asked for, and that only so far as regards the defender's intromissions as executrix of their deceased mother.

This obviates the necessity for determining certain of the questions which were argued.

The pursuer is, in my opinion, entitled to get such an account, because, as he maintains, he ought to be put in possession of the necessary information to enable him to make up his mind whether he is to claim legitim or not.

By his mother's will, dated 13th June 1898,

the pursuer was left a legacy of £300. The defender maintains that this is a special legacy, and that it has been adeemed. By her will the deceased Mrs MacLean appointed the defender to be her sole executrix, and gave and disponed to her "my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son Alick" (the pursuer) "has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." At the date of the will there was in the pursuer's hands a sum of £300 belonging to Mrs MacLean. In the spring of 1901 the pursuer wrote the letter quoted in Statement 4, and on 7th March 1901 returned the £300 to his mother. Parties have renounced probation as regards all matters bearing on the defender's fifth plea in law—the plea that the legacy has been adeemed.

The first question is whether the legacy of £300 was a special legacy. Unless it is held to be a special legacy the question of ademption does not arise. In my opinion the expression of the bequest points rather to the amount of the fund than to the designation of it as a specific corpus. In such a case the legacy is general, to be made good out of the general fund, though the money should have been uplifted (Bell's Prin., sect. 1886). None of the cases cited by the counsel for the defender were like the present. In all of them there was either a specific subject, or, in the case of money, a particular bond, bill, deposit receipt, or insurance policy. Here the bequest is of money which at the time happened to be in the pursuer's hands, but which he subsequently handed back. That, I think, is different from the case of a specific investment. I am accordingly of opinion that the defender's fifth plea in law should be repelled, and that there should be a finding that the legacy has not been adeemed.—6th July 1907.

BANKRUPTCY—SEQUESTRATION—RANKING OF CLAIMS—WIFE'S CLAIM FOR ALIMENT AGAINST HUSBAND JUDICIALLY SEPARATED—SEQUESTRATION OF HUSBAND'S ESTATES—HELD THAT CLAIMANT WAS NOT ENTITLED TO HAVE HER ALIMENTARY DEBT VALUED AS DEPENDING ON A CONTINGENCY — BANKRUPTCY (SCOTLAND) ACT 1856 (19 AND 20 VICT. CAP. 79), SECTS. 53 AND 54.

In November 1896 Mrs Frances Ranken Hogg or Matthew obtained in an action of separation and aliment at her instance against her husband Duncan Matthew decree for payment of aliment to her at the rate of £50 per annum during the joint lives of her husband and herself. On 30th June 1897 the husband's estates were sequestrated, and Charles John Munro, C.A., was appointed trustee thereon. Mrs Matthew claimed in the sequestration for arrears of aliment and expenses of process in the action of separation, with interest, and she was ranked in full for £163, 7s. 6d., the amount of said claim. She subsequently lodged an amended affidavit and claim, claiming, in addition to the £163, 7s. 6d. for which she had obtained a ranking, a sum of £838, 12s. 9d. as the estimated value of the alimentary debt due under the said decree, and calling upon the trustee to put a value on said alimentary debt under sects. 53 and 54 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856, which are in these terms:—

LIII. Valuation of Claim depending on a Contingency.—When the claim of a creditor depends upon a contingency which is unascertained at the date of lodging his claim, he shall not be entitled to vote nor to draw a dividend in respect of such contingent debt, but he may apply to the Sheriff, if the trustee has not been elected, or, if elected, to the trustee, to put a value on such debt, and the Sheriff or trustee (as the case may be) shall put a value thereon as at the date of such valuation; and on such value being fixed such creditor shall be entitled to vote and draw dividends in respect of such value, and no more: Provided that if such contingency have taken place before the debt has been valued, such creditor may vote and draw dividends in respect of the amount of the debt, but the same shall not disturb any former dividends allotted to other creditors; and when such application is made to the Sheriff or trustee, notice thereof shall be given to the bankrupt and petitioning or concurring creditor; and the judgment of the Sheriff or trustee shall be subject to review, and any creditor who has claimed on the estate may appeal, or appear and be heard on any appeal.

LIV. Valuation of Claim on Annuity.—No creditor in respect of an annuity granted by the bankrupt shall be entitled to vote and draw a dividend until such annuity shall be valued, but he may, if the trustee has not been elected, apply to the Sheriff, or, if elected, to the trustee, to put a value on such annuity; and the Sheriff or trustee, as the case may be, shall put a value on the annuity, regard being had to the original price given for the annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value of the annuity as shall have been caused by the lapse of time since the grant thereof to the date of the sequestration; and such creditor shall be entitled to vote and draw dividends in respect of such value, and no more: Provided always, that when such application is made to the Sheriff, notice thereof shall be given to the bankrupt and the petitioning or concurring creditor; and the judgment of the Sheriff or trustee shall be subject to review, and any creditor who has claimed on the estate may appeal, or appear and be heard on any appeal.

On 17th June 1907 the trustee rejected this supplementary claim.

Against this deliverance Mrs Matthew appealed, and argued that she was entitled to have her alimentary debt valued either in terms of sect. 53 or sect. 54 of the Act.

The Lord Ordinary sustained the trustee's deliverance, and dismissed the appeal.

Lord Guthrie.—In 1897, in an action of separation the appellant obtained decree against her husband for aliment at the rate of £50 a year. In this sequestration of her husband's estates she has been ranked for certain arrears of aliment, and she appeals against the trustee's refusal to rank her for a capital sum which she says represents the actuarial capital value of the decree for aliment in her favour.

The appellant admits (1) that she cannot claim on the footing of an ordinary annuitant, as the decree itself bears that the payment to her is to be during the joint lives of herself and her husband; and (2) that a deduction must be made (a) for the chance of the aliment being withdrawn or diminished, and (b) for the chance of the parties coming together. The first admission introduces no difficulty, but the second admission, which the appellant could not avoid making, is, in my opinion, fatal to her claim. The question has not been made matter of express decision in Scotland, and it is stated in Bell's Commentaries (I. 688) as open. But in England it arose in 1885 in the case of Linton, 15 Q.B.D. 239, and the wife's claim was negatived. One ground of decision, as explained by the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Baggallay and Bowen, was the obvious one that the claim could not be ranked because it could not be valued, involving as it did elements, particularly the chance of the wife returning at any time to cohabitation (possibly the day after the ranking), which could not be ignored, and which were incapable of valuation. I think this view is sound, and accordingly refuse the appeal. —20*th July* 1907.

The Lord President.

The Lord President.—The case for the reclaimer here has been exceedingly well stated by Mr Macdonald, and that only confirms me in the view that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right. The Lord Ordinary has admirably summarised the ground of his decision where he says:—"The mere fact that a medical man makes a wrong diagnosis on an insufficient examination, and adheres to it when it is brought to his knowledge that other medical men take a different view, does not necessarily imply" malice. Now the thing we are in search of here is malice, for this was a report made by an official which in the course of his duty he had to make. It is therefore privileged, and no action of slander can lie without proof of malice either from something extrinsic to the report or from the exaggerated terms in which his opinion was given. I can find no averments on record here from which malice could be inferred on either of these grounds, and am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

131. Duke of Sutherland v. Douglas.

Justiciary Cases—Summary Procedure—Private Prosecutor—Law Agent of Prosecutor—Where One Law Agent Had Signed Complaint on Behalf of Prosecutor, Held that Another Law Agent Was Entitled to Conduct the Prosecution at the Trial—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sect. 9 (1)—Finlayson v. Bunbury (1898, 5 S.L.T. 301, 2 Adam 478) Followed.

Stated Case.

This was a case for appeal stated by the Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie) at Dornoch. The case set forth:—

"This case, as now ordered by the Lords of Justiciary to be stated, relates to the competency of proceeding with a complaint brought in name of the Duke of Sutherland, but signed by his recognised local law agent (A. N. Macaulay) under authority of sub-sect. 1 of sect. 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, and is directed against the respondent Douglas for an alleged contravention of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV., sect. 1.

High Court of Justiciary

Duke of Sutherland v. Douglas.

"At the diet of compearance on 8th January last, the respondent was present, but the complainer and his said law agent who had signed the complaint failed to appear, and in consequence, the case was not then proceeded with, but was adjourned for a week.

"At the adjourned diet on the 15th January, the respondent was present with his agent, but both the complainer and his agent (Macaulay) were again absent. The latter's clerk, however, who is a law agent and represents his employer in his business before the Sheriff Court, claimed to appear in this case against the respondent, but the Sheriff-Substitute, being of opinion that the right of conducting the prosecution referred to in the statute could not devolve upon him and be exercised while neither the complainer nor his law agent (Macaulay) was personally present, declined to recognise such appearance, and sustained the objection by the respondent's procurator that no competent prosecutor was present, and therefore dismissed the complaint.

"The question of law submitted for the opinion of the Court is, Whether in the absence of the complainer and the law agent who under statutory authority had signed the complaint, the further right conferred on 'such law agent' of conducting the prosecution 'on behalf of' the complainer and acting as a competent prosecutor, could in his absence be exercised by another person not specially authorised under the statute."

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sect. 9, sub-sect. (1), is quoted in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Argued for the Appellant: The question here was as to the meaning of the words "such law agent" in sect. 9, sub-sect. (1), of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881. Although the word "such" might sometimes be used as equivalent to "the said," that was an inaccurate use of the word. Its proper meaning was "of the kind already described." "Such law agent" therefore meant "law agent of the kind already described," that was to say, "a duly qualified law agent." The case was ruled by Finlayson v. Bunbury (3rd February 1898, 5 S.L.T. 301, 2 Adam 478). It was there contended, as it was here contended by the respondent, that "such law agent" meant the individual law agent who had signed the complaint, the result of the argument there being that the prosecutor was not entitled to be represented at the trial by any law agent, since, according to the argument, there was no "such law agent," the prosecutor having signed the complaint himself. The Court rejected the argument, holding that the words "such law agent" meant any duly qualified law agent.

Argued for the Respondent: The words here were "such law agent," not "such a law agent," thus plainly pointing to an individual, namely, the individual law agent who had signed the complaint. The statute contemplated two persons and two persons only, one or other of whom was entitled to conduct the prosecution—the prosecutor himself and the law agent who had signed the complaint. All that Finlayson v. Bunbury decided was that a private prosecutor who had signed the complaint himself did not thereby lose the privilege of being represented at the trial by his law agent.

The Court found that the complainer was entitled to be represented at the trial by any law agent duly qualified, to whom he might give a mandate to appear, and that in a case where the complaint had been signed by a certain law agent the prosecutor was not excluded from having the prosecution conducted by another law agent whom he might appoint; and remitted the case to the Sheriff to proceed.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The decision of this case depends on the interpretation to be put upon sub-sect. (1) of sect. 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1881. That sub-section says: "Every complaint at the instance of a private prosecutor or complainer under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts may be signed by such private prosecutor or complainer, or by a duly qualified law agent on his behalf, and such law agent may, in the absence of the private prosecutor or complainer, appear in Court and conduct the prosecution on his behalf."

In this particular case what happened was this. The complaint was signed by a law agent on behalf of the prosecutor, under the first branch of sub-sect. (1), but at the trial that individual law agent did not appear, and another law agent, who is not said to have had no mandate to appear, did appear to conduct the prosecution. The Sheriff-Substitute held that this was not permissible, because he read the words "such law agent" as meaning this, that where a law agent had signed a complaint on behalf of a private prosecutor, that law agent was the only law agent entitled to conduct the prosecution following upon the complaint. That is not the interpretation that I should have put upon the words "such law agent," even if the question had now come up for the first time. I think that the reasonable reading of these words—which certainly are not very satisfactory words—is that when a law agent, duly qualified as such, appears to conduct the prosecution, he is "such law agent" as being a duly qualified law agent. I do not think that the man who signed the complaint must necessarily be the man to conduct the prosecution. I think on general grounds that he need not be the same, because a law agent is not as a general rule the permanent official of a particular person. A man's law agent is the person whom at the time he employs to conduct his law business, and if he is entitled to be represented by a law agent in any particular business, he is entitled to be represented by the law agent whom he employs at the time for the particular business; and if he has dismissed a law agent whom he formerly employed, or that agent is unable or unwilling to act, he is entitled to be represented by another law agent.

That is the conclusion to which I should have come even apart from authority, but I think that any doubt as to the meaning of the sub-section is removed by the case of Bunbury. That was a case in which the private prosecutor himself signed the complaint, and it was contended that, having signed the complaint, he was thereby debarred from being represented by a law agent in the conduct of the prosecution at the trial. The Court unanimously held that that was not a sound contention. I gave the leading opinion in that case, and my two brethren agreed with me as regards this part of the case. It was held that the words "such law agent" in sub-section (1) of section 9 of the Act meant an agent with such qualifications as had been previously described—that is to say, a duly qualified law agent. Now if that was a sound interpretation of the words "such law agent" with reference to the question which there arose, it must be a sound interpretation for all questions that may arise on the words, because the words can have only one meaning and must be read in the same way in every case which occurs regarding them, although the actual question may be a different one on the facts.

Upon the whole matter I come without difficulty to the conclusion that the Sheriff-Substitute erred here in dismissing the complaint because the agent who had signed it did not appear to conduct the prosecution.

I do not think that it would be satisfactory to answer the question put in the case. I think that we ought to pronounce such a finding as will make the matter clear, and remit the case to the Sheriff to proceed.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree. The statute of 1881 confers a privilege upon private prosecutors. The privilege is a double one. In the first place, a private prosecutor may have a complaint signed either by himself or by a duly qualified law agent acting on his behalf; and secondly, he may have the prosecution conducted on his behalf by "such law agent."

Now the words "duly qualified" do not refer at all to the authority given by the private prosecutor to the law agent to act on his behalf. These words refer solely to the legal qualification of the law agent to act as a law agent. The statute does not contain anything as to the law agent's authority to represent the prosecutor beyond using the words "on his behalf." Of course there must be authority, otherwise the law agent would not be entitled to represent the prosecutor; but it is not the words "duly qualified" that bring in the idea of authority; it is the words "on his behalf." The words "duly qualified" import no more than this—that the person who signs the complaint or who appears to conduct the prosecution must have acquired a legal qualification which entitles him to sign writs and to appear in court as a law agent.

In the present case the Sheriff-Substitute has held that the law agent who signed the complaint must necessarily be the law agent to conduct the prosecution in court. I do not think that that is a reasonable reading of the statute. Mr Armit contended that the statute referred to two persons and to two only—the private prosecutor and his law agent; and that to bring in a third person—another law agent—was to go beyond the statute. That, to my mind, is not a reasonable reading of the words "such law agent may in the absence of the private prosecutor or complainer appear in court and conduct the prosecution on his behalf." I think that the words "such law agent" plainly mean "a duly qualified law agent." Of course, as in the case of signing the complaint, the law agent who appears in court must have the prosecutor's authority, but here again it is the words "on his behalf" which are repeated, and not the words "such law agent," that connote the idea of authority—either general authority or authority for the particular occasion. Therefore, apart altogether from decision, I should be of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute took too strict a view of this statute, and that he ought to have allowed this gentleman, whose authority is not denied, to appear and conduct the prosecution, he being a duly qualified law agent.

With regard to decision, I think that the case of Bunbury arose in somewhat different circumstances from those that we have here, and I should not like to say that it expressly rules the present case. But I entirely agree with the decision there, and therefore I think that both on the words of the statute and on decision the law is clear.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that my impression is that this case is directly ruled by that of Bunbury, because, as I understand it, in order to reach a decision in that case it was necessary to construe the very words of this section which are here in dispute. But even if that were not the case, I confess that I should have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the words in the section "such law agent" mean "a duly qualified law agent," and are not confined to the particular law agent who happened to sign the complaint. I therefore agree with the course proposed by your Lordships.—19*th July* 1907.

EXPENSES—ACTION OF DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — ARBITRATION — DEFENCE THAT ACTION EXCLUDED BY ARBITRATION CLAUSE—ACTION SISTED AND QUESTION SENT TO ARBITRATION — DEFENDERS NOT SUCCESSFUL IN ARBITRATION—NO EXPENSES GIVEN IN ACTION TO EITHER PARTY.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. pp. 32 and 90.)

On 9th July 1907 the pursuers presented a Note to the Court in which they set forth that as the result of the arbitration proceedings an award had been made against the defenders for £110, 10s. and an award of seventy-nine guineas of expenses, to be borne in the proportion of twenty-five guineas by the pursuers and fifty-four guineas by the defenders, and that the defenders had paid these sums. They accordingly craved the Court to recal the sist of 23rd May 1906, to assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and to find the defenders liable to the pursuers in the expenses of the action down to the date of the closing of the record.

The defenders opposed the crave of the note as regards expenses, and maintained that they were entitled to their expenses up to the date of the Procedure Roll discussion. They had been entirely successful in the action. Their defence, to the effect that the action should never have been brought into Court at all, had been sustained.

In any case, the defenders were not liable to the pursuers in any of the expenses of the action (Levy & Co. v. Thomsons, 1883, 10 R. 1134).

The Court recalled the sist of 23rd May 1906, assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and found no expenses due to or by either party.

The Lord President.—The point to be decided here is a question of expenses. The pursuer is a merchant in this country who had bought a certain quantity of slag from the defenders, who are a foreign firm, and the action is an action for damages for faulty delivery of the slag. The action having been raised, the defenders pleaded an arbitration clause. There was a decision by the Lord Ordinary on that point, which was affirmed by your Lordships, with the result that the dispute had to go to arbitration. The arbitration then proceeded, and in it the pursuer got an award of a sum of money as damages, and also an award of expenses. The defenders have paid these sums; so there is now no question that the action must be taken out of Court, and that, in consequence of the payments I have referred to, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.

There only remains the question of expenses. Now the expenses of the cause have to a great extent been already dealt with. An amendment of the record was allowed, and the expenses of the amendment have been disposed of. So also have the expenses of the reclaiming note to this Court, and the only expenses now remaining to be dealt with are the expenses of the raising of the action, and of the discussion in the Procedure Roll. Now I am not aware that this is a point which has yet been settled by decision, at any rate no trace of it is to be found in the case of Levy & Co. v. Thomsons, 10th July 1883, 10 R. 1134. In that case there is nothing in the books to shew what happened in the preliminary stages. Here, however, we have some correspondence, from which it is quite clear that the defenders were all along willing to arbitrate. There may be cases where a pursuer is entitled to bring the defender into Court—where, for instance, the defender refuses either to pay or to arbitrate,—and in such cases, if the defender subsequently pleads arbitration, the pursuer would naturally be entitled to recover the expenses of raising the action. But I think that, following on what was said in Levy, where, as here, the defender is all along willing to arbitrate, the pursuer cannot recover the expenses of raising the action.

On the other hand, I do not think the defenders here are entitled to an award of their expenses, for they have been to a certain extent in the wrong, since they disputed their liability for any payment at all. We shall therefore pronounce a decree of absolvitor, and find no expenses due to or by either party.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The defenders reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor granting decree of reduction as craved.

The provisions of the statutes referred to in argument, so far as affecting the questions involved, are as follows.

The Evidence Act 1852 by sect. 3 provides—

"It shall be competent to examine any witness who may be adduced in any action or proceeding as to whether he has on any specified occasion made a statement on any matter pertinent to the issue different from the evidence given by him in such action or proceeding; and it shall be competent in the course of such action or proceeding to adduce evidence to prove that such witness has made such different statement on the occasion specified."

The Act 1681, cap. 5, provides—

No witness shall subscribe as witness to any party's subscription unless he then knew that party and saw him subscribe . . . . or that the party did at the time of the witness's subscribing acknowledge his subscription. . . .

The Conveyancing Act 1874 by sect. 39 provides—

"No deed, instrument or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution; but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same."

In the course of procedure in the Outer House the Lord Ordinary granted a commission to take the evidence of certain aged witnesses, the report of the Commission to lie in retentis. The said witnesses were subsequently examined in Court. The report of the Commission was not put in evidence, but was opened by the parties of consent. During the discussion in the Inner House counsel for the appellants moved for leave to read the report of the Commission with a view to shewing that witnesses had made statements when examined on commission different from the evidence given by them in Court, and referred to the Evidence Act 1857, sect. 3; Emslie v. Alexander, 1862, 1 M. 209.

1st Div.

Low and Another v. Low's Trustees.

The respondents argued that it was incompetent to use depositions taken on commission if the witnesses were subsequently examined in Court (Act of Sederunt, 16th February 1841, sect. 17).

The motion was refused.

Lord M'Laren.—I am not of opinion that this motion can be granted. Under the Evidence Act of 1852, of the working of which we have now had a long experience, it is made competent by sect. 3 to examine a witness "as to whether he has on any specified occasion made a statement on any matter pertinent to the issue different from the evidence given by him in such action or proceeding." Now I do not doubt that the questions put to this witness as to the evidence which she gave when she was examined on commission were within the latitude allowed by the Evidence Act. But the point we have now to consider arises under the second part of that section, which provides that "it shall be competent in the course of such action or proceeding to adduce evidence to prove that such witness has made such different statement on the occasion specified." Now, the report of the Commissioner may, in certain events and for certain purposes, become evidence, but it is not now evidence, and it is impossible that it ever can be made evidence in causâ, for the witness herself has been examined in Court with regard to the same matter. I am unable to see how the report of the Commissioner can be admitted as evidence that the witness has made a different statement on a previous occasion. How far it might be possible to cite the Commissioner, or to prove by the parole evidence of bystanders that the witness made a different statement when she was under examination before the Commissioner, it is not necessary to consider. The proof has been closed, and no case has been made for opening up the proof and allowing further evidence. We are not even told that, if we did so, there are witnesses who could be brought to prove that the witness had varied in her statements. What we are asked to do is to allow the report of the Commission to be read, and then to see whether it supports the contention that the witness had made a different statement on the former occasion. Now, there is no authority for such a proceeding; the nearest case being that of Emslie v. Alexander, Dec. 20, 1862, 1 Macph. 209, where the Court allowed a deposition to be recovered that it might be collated with the evidence that the witness might give in Court. But that is no authority for the proposition that the mere production of a deposition would be sufficient for the purpose for which it is proposed to use it. Great inconvenience might result from allowing depositions which the law says are to be superseded if the witness eventually gives his testimony in Court, to be kept alive for the purpose of contradicting what that witness may say in Court. Also, in the long period that has elapsed since the passing of the Evidence Act, there is no record of any such proceeding having been permitted. I do not, therefore, consider that what we are asked to allow falls within the purpose or the terms of the Act to which we were referred.

1ST DIV.

Lord M'Laren.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. The motion made to us really amounts to this: that a deposition which was provisionally taken to lie in retentis should now be put in evidence with the view of contradicting the testimony which the witness subsequently gave in Court. The deposition itself cannot be used as evidence; and, if it cannot, the report of the Commission is not evidence at all. The case of Emslie v. Alexander, 1 M. 209, which was cited to us, appears to me to have no bearing on the point, for the question in that case did not relate to a provisional deposition taken to lie in retentis, but to a deposition by a bankrupt in the course of his statutory examination. That such a deposition may be used is perfectly clear, for it is the authentic statutory record of an examination to which the Act of Parliament requires that the bankrupt shall submit. I cannot see any analogy between that case and this, which is a claim to read a deposition taken provisionally to lie in retentis, and not to be used at all if the witness subsequently appears and gives evidence in Court.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion. I think your Lordship's decision is entirely in accordance with practice.

The argument upon the main question appears from the opinion of Lord Kinnear infra. The following authorities were referred to in addition to those quoted therein:—

For the Appellants: On the question of execution, Bell, Pr., sect. 2229; Frank v. Frank, 1809, 5 Pat. App. 278; Sibbald v. Sibbald, 1776, M. 16,906; Morrison v. Maclean's Trs., 1862, 24 D. 625, per L.J.C. Inglis at p. 629; Cleland v. Cleland, 1838, 1 D. 254, per Lord Corehouse at p. 262; Cumming v. Skeoch's Trs., 1879, 6 R. 963.

For the Respondents: On the question of execution: Tener's Trs. v. Tener's Trs., 1879, 6 R. 1111; Duff v. Fife, 1826, 2 W.S. 166 and 209 and 211. On the question of undue influence; Fulton v. Andrew, 1875, L.R. 7 H.L. 448; Logan's Trs. v. Reid, 1885, 12 R. 1094.

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, assoilzied the defenders from the reductive conclusions of the summons, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to dispose of the conclusions for legitim.

Lord Kinnear.—This is an action at the instance of two of the sons of a person called William Low, who died at Brechin in 1893, for reduction of his will.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the pursuers are two of the lawful children of the testator, the late William Low, and accordingly has repelled a plea to title, which is founded, as I understand, upon a denial of that fact. We must take it now, therefore, that the pursuers have a perfectly good title to sue, and the only question for us is whether they have made good their alleged grounds of reduction. The will under reduction is a perfectly simple one. It appears that the testator had a sum of money on deposit receipt, and that he had a house in Brechin of the value, I think, of about £250 or £280. The will leaves his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to James Guthrie and David Spence, whom he appoints executors and residuary legatees, subject to the payment of certain legacies, which do not amount altogether to a very large sum. The whole estate was a small one, and the legacies do not exhaust it. But it appears that in addition to these legacies the testator had set apart certain sums of money to be given to persons whom he desired to favour, but without naming them as legatees in his will, and that the defender Guthrie was entrusted with the duty of carrying out this intention. These are the facts to be kept in view in considering the grounds of reduction.

The action of reduction is based on two grounds. In the first place, it is said that the will was not duly executed, because the testator's signature was not witnessed nor acknowledged in the presence of one of the testamentary witnesses; and, in the second place, the will is said to be reducible because it was obtained by the fraud of the executor and residuary legatee, Mr Guthrie.

As to the first point—the due execution of the will—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this question depends entirely on the Act of 1681, cap. 5, and the law and practice following on that Act prior to the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and that it is not affected in any way by the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act. It was decided in the case of Smyth v. Smyth, 1876, 3 R. 573, that that enactment does not dispense with the presence of witnesses as a solemnity of the execution of deeds, and that it does not repeal the Act 1681, cap. 5, which requires the signature of the granter of a deed to be adhibited or acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses. The judgment rested on the perfectly plain and obvious ground, which I think was suggested by one of your Lordships in the course of the argument, though the decision itself was not brought before us, that when the Conveyancing Act speaks of "witnesses" it means persons who had in fact witnessed the things which they are supposed to attest. I think that decision is conclusive of the question that was raised on this first point, and I am therefore relieved of the difficulty which the Lord Ordinary appears to have experienced from an opinion ascribed to Lord Young in the case of Geddes v. Reid, 1891, 18 R. 1186. I am not satisfied that the rubric in that case, in so far as it ascribes to Lord Young the opinion to which the Lord Ordinary refers, is really borne out by the terms of his Lordship's judgment; but if that is the true import of what Lord Young says, it is at the utmost obiter dictum, and cannot stand against the formal and direct decision of the Court in Smyth v. Smyth.

But then the question is, whether the allegation that one of the witnesses did not see the testator's subscription or receive from him any acknowledgment of his subscription, has been made out; and on that point I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary thinks the pursuers' contention proved because Mrs Lyall, the witness, says when examined in the box that she did not hear the testator say that the signature witnessed was his; and while she is perfectly certain as to this, she proves nothing else that is material to the question of due execution, except the fact that she signed her own name. Now I think upon the former law, as it stands upon a long series of decisions, it is quite certain that this evidence, even if it had been competent, would have been held to be perfectly insufficient to set aside a deed ex facie probative. I do not think we can accept all the former decisions as still binding, because the views that now prevail, both as to the competency and the effect of parole testimony, are widely different from those which governed the decisions in question; but I think the law still remains that when a deed is ex facie perfectly regular and duly tested, it cannot be set aside on the sole and unsupported statement of one of the witnesses that she did not really attest what her signature bears that she did attest. It can only be set aside on the clearest possible evidence; and I think the evidence of Mrs Lyall in this case is by no means sufficient. It is true that she is positive in assertion, but I cannot assent to the view that the case must be determined on her statement alone. It must be determined on a comparison of her statement and the contrary testimony of other witnesses, especially of Mr Guthrie, the defender; and these conflicting statements must be weighed with reference to the circumstances and the probabilities of the case. The witness herself is an old woman. She is examined as to this incident thirteen years after the date when it took place. It appears plainly enough on her own evidence that her memory is not perfect, and her statement that the deed was not acknowledged in her presence is contradicted by the direct and perfectly clear evidence of Mr Guthrie. And in so far as the question depends on probabilities, it appears to me in the highest degree improbable that Mrs Lyall's account of the matter should be accurate, because the undoubted facts are, that Mr Guthrie, having obtained the signature of the testator to the will, in presence of one witness, sent for this other witness, who lived in a house on the same flat, that she might be brought into the room and witness the testator's signature. The evidence is that she was brought for that purpose, and Mr Guthrie says he certainly did call on the testator to acknowledge in her presence that the signature which he was asked to attest was his signature, and that he did so. Now it does appear to me in the highest degree improbable that if Mr Guthrie had intended to be content with the subscription of one witness only, he should have sent for another and have her brought into the testator's presence for the very purpose of attesting the deed, and then that he should have been satisfied to take her signature without enabling her to attest it.

On the whole matter I think we must take the evidence of Mr Guthrie, supported as it is to a certain extent by the evidence of the other instrumentary witness and by the undoubted facts of the case, and hold that the pursuers have failed to prove their allegations that the will was not duly executed. It must be remembered that on this point the burden is entirely on the pursuers, and if the matter were left in doubt by reason of a conflict of testimony, it must be held that the pursuers have not proved their case.

Now if the will be duly executed, the next and most important question is, whether it has been proved that it was not the true deed of the testator, but was obtained by undue influence or fraud. Now upon that question the Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea that the will should be reduced in respect that "at the time of the making of said will the said William Low was weak and facile, and the defender obtained the said will by fraud and circumvention, and by taking advantage of the said weakness and facility of the said William Low to his prejudice"; and in his note his Lordship expresses the clear opinion—first, that although Mr Low was suffering from painful and mortal disease, it is proved that he retained his faculties till the end; and second, that while Mr Guthrie acted indiscreetly in preparing the will which was partly in his own favour, there is no doubt that he acted with perfect honesty; and his Lordship adds: "I should be the last to throw any imputation on Mr Guthrie's honesty, and sympathise heartily with him in the unfortunate position into which his interference with matters much better left to the lawyers has brought him." The determining facts being thus found in the defenders' favour, I should have thought it followed that they must be assoilzied, because if the testator was of disposing mind, and his instructions were honestly carried out by the person who made his will, there seems to be no reason why the will should not stand. The Lord Ordinary, however, has taken a different view. He does not repel the fourth plea in law for the pursuers, which is "that the will having been executed by the deceased while under error induced by the defender Guthrie as to its import and effect, is void and null, and ought to be reduced"; but he does not sustain it. I must say I should have thought that plea failed as a necessary consequence of the judgment to the effect that the second plea must be repelled, read along with the opinion which I have just cited from his Lordship's note. While he has given no formal judgment in support of any other ground of reduction than that based on the Act of 1681, he has, however, expressed an opinion that the residuary bequest to Mr Guthrie himself cannot stand, and that "the will quoad that part, had it been otherwise valid, must be reduced quoad the residue clause." If this opinion had been on distrust of Mr Guthrie's honesty, I should have had great hesitation in setting my own opinion on such a point against that of the judge who had seen the witness in the box; but, as I have already pointed out, Mr Guthrie has the benefit of the Lord Ordinary's opinion in his favour; and if he was, as his Lordship thinks, perfectly honest, and if the testator understood what he was doing, there seems to be no reason why he should not retain any benefit that the testator meant him to take. It was maintained that the question must be governed by the rule said to be laid down in the case of Huguenin v. Baseley, 1807, 14 Ves. 273 at 289, that voluntary donations obtained by persons in a fiduciary relation to the donor, such as that of guardian to a ward, or law agent to a client, cannot be retained, and it was urged that though Mr Guthrie was not a law agent, he had placed himself in exactly the same position by undertaking the duty of preparing the testator's will, and was therefore under the same disabilities as a law agent would have been when he—even in obedience to the testator's instructions—consented to his own name being inserted in the will as a residuary legatee. But assuming Mr Guthrie's position to be the same as an ordinary legal adviser of the testator, it has been decided both in England and in Scotland that there is a very material difference in this respect between a gift to an agent inter vivos and a benefit under a will. The law is so stated by L.J. Knight Bruce in Hindson v. Weatherill, 1854, 5 De G. M. & G. 301, and by Lord Barcaple in Grieve v. Cunningham, 1869, 8 M. 317, and it rests on a very obvious distinction, because the rule in question is that a person is not allowed to obtain an advantage over another whose interests, by reason of the fiduciary position he holds towards him, he is bound to protect. But in the case of a will there is no such conflict of interest and duty as there is in the case of a bargain, because there is no kind of bargain between the testator and the legatee; and accordingly Lord Cranworth, in the case of Boyse v. Rossborough, 1856, 6 Clark H.L. Cas. 2, decided that a person who stood in such a fiduciary position towards the testator that he could not bargain with him during his life, might yet be instituted in his will as a legatee.

The Lord Ordinary goes, I think, on a safer ground, which he finds laid down by Lord Barcaple, and also by the Lord President in the case of Grieve v. Cunningham. It is laid down by these learned judges, and I do not imagine that any of your Lordships doubt it, that when a law agent makes a will in his own favour the onus of supporting it lies on him, and he is not in the same position as any beneficiary who has not been concerned in the execution of the will, and who is therefore entitled to say that the deed was duly executed by a person of sufficient understanding, and that it is for those who are disputing it to prove that there is ground for setting it aside. I am not satisfied that Mr Guthrie, even in this respect, stands exactly in the same position as an ordinary legal adviser, because there is the high authority of Lord Brougham in the case of Hunter v. Atkins, 1834, 3 Myl. & K. 113, to the contrary. In that case, Lord Brougham states the rule thus: "There are certain relations known to the law as attorney, guardian, trustee: if a person standing in these relations to the client, ward, or cestui que trust takes a gift or makes a bargain, the proof lies upon him that he has dealt with the other party, the client, ward, etc., exactly as a stranger would have done, taking no advantage of his influence or knowledge, putting the other party on his guard, bringing everything to his knowledge which he himself knew . . . . but where the relation in which the parties stand to each other is of a sort less known and definite, the jealousy is diminished." The confidential adviser employed specially to perform a particular business or write a particular instrument does not, in this view, lie under the same suspicion with an attorney, or one having a general management. I do not propose to your Lordships that we should rest our judgment upon that distinction, but I refer to Lord Brougham's opinion for the purpose of shewing that what we have to consider in a case of this kind is not a fixed and rigid rule of law, but a presumption of fact the force of which must vary with the circumstances of the case.

The question therefore comes to be—Is there, on the whole evidence before us, sufficient ground for holding that the will was obtained from the testator by undue influence exercised by Mr Guthrie? Now, although there is an onus on the law agent in these circumstances, that does not imply that he may be required to prove a negative or to exclude indefinite possibilities for which no foundation has been laid in evidence. If he gives a clear and consistent account of his conduct which satisfies the judge before whom he is examined of his perfect honesty, and if his own evidence, being credible in itself, is supported by the other evidence in the case, and if he is able to displace any inference of fact which may be prima facie unfavourable, I see no good ground for holding that he must nevertheless be found to have failed in discharging the onus incumbent upon him.

The meaning of obtaining a will by undue influence has been the subject of decision, and in two of the most important cases on the subject in the House of Lords it has been laid down with authority that a will said to have been obtained by undue influence must be proved to have been obtained by fraud, because, in the case to which I have already referred of Boyse v. Rossborough, Lord Cranworth, after examining the grounds upon which undue influence may be sustained to set aside a will, goes on to lay down the general ground in this way. He said: "In order, therefore, to have something to guide us in our inquiries on this difficult subject, I am prepared to say that influence, in order to be undue within the meaning of any rule of law which would make it sufficient to vitiate a will, must be an influence exercised either by coercion or by fraud," and Lord Halsbury, in the recent cases of Weir v. Grace, 1899, 2 F. H.L. 30, cites Boyse v. Rossborough, and quotes Lord Cranworth's opinion as a sound exposition of the law on the subject; and therefore we have to consider whether there is any evidence, taking the whole circumstances of the case before us into consideration, to suggest that Mr Low was under any misapprehension in making the will which he is said to have made, and, if he was, whether that was due to the undue influence, or, in other words, the fraud of Mr Guthrie. Now, upon the whole evidence in the case, I must say I am unable to see any shadow of evidence for charging Mr Guthrie with undue influence, or, in other words, with fraud.

A question of this kind must, of course, be considered with reference to the particular character of the will, and there are only two points to which the Lord Ordinary adverts to which it is necessary to refer. In the first place, the will disinherits the children of the testator, and the question is whether that supplies any ground for disputing that it expresses the unbiassed intention of the testator himself. There are cases in which a disinheritance of that kind would raise an unfavourable presumption, because the mere fact that a will disappoints just expectations is in itself a note of suspicion. But in this case it appears to me to be clear on the evidence that what the testator did in disinheriting his children was exactly what he might have been expected to do. It appears that he and his wife were living together in Brechin in 1851, and in that year she deserted him. She emigrated to America with another man, taking the three children with her, and she lived there thereafter with that other man as his wife, and the testator's children were brought up in America as his children. From that time till the date of his death, Mr Low, the testator, heard nothing from them. He considered that he owed them no duty of support, and the evidence shows that the last thing he desired was that his estate should go to his children, who, with their mother, had deserted him under circumstances which certainly were sufficient to estrange his affections from them altogether. Therefore, I do not think his disinheriting them a circumstance which tells against the will. The other circumstance to which the Lord Ordinary refers is of a very different kind, and does not appear to me to have any direct bearing on the question whether the will was the true will of the deceased man or not. It appears from the evidence that he desired to make certain gifts in view of his death to persons who were not his relations, but did not desire that their names should appear as legatees in the will. I do not think it at all material to consider his reasons for transacting the business in this way; but what he did was, he drew a certain amount of the money he had on deposit receipt and put sums into envelopes on which he marked the names of certain donees, and these sums were put into the hands of Mr Guthrie, the executor and residuary legatee, in order that he might hand them to the donees. There appears to have been some doubt in the mind of the executor as to whether Mr Low had made complete and effective gifts during his lifetime by having set them aside in the way I have described. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that these were not gifts completely carried out so as to divest the testator, and that in a question between the persons whom they were intended to benefit and executors or residuary legatees, who knew nothing of the testator's intention, they would not be good and effective gifts at all. But then, on the other hand, they were perfectly good against Mr Guthrie, for the money was put into his hands, as he says, for the purpose of his making it over to the donees; and he could not, I think, have set up his right as the residuary legatee against their claims, not merely because, as the Lord Ordinary suggests, it would have been a duty on his conscience to carry out what he knew to be the testator's intentions, but because the donees would have good claims against him which they could establish by reference to his oath.

But all that does not tend to throw any doubt on the will, so far as I can see. On the contrary, it appears to me to be in favour of and not contrary to the opinion of Mr Guthrie's truthfulness which the Lord Ordinary entertains, and in which, so far as I can judge from the printed evidence, I agree with him. There is no suggestion, so far as I can find, in any of the circumstances of the case, that Mr Guthrie made any kind of misrepresentation to the testator which could mislead him, or that he used any influence which could have coerced the testator into acting as an instrument of Mr Guthrie instead of as a free agent making his own will. So far as it goes, the evidence as to Mr Guthrie's influence is all to the contrary, because the pursuers brought a good many witnesses to show that the testator had spoken of him with considerable disrespect, and indicated by his manner that he was not a person under whose influence he was likely to have acted. Accordingly I am of the opinion, on the whole matter, that this ground of reduction completely fails.

The benefit of the will to Mr Guthrie is, however, a material fact to be taken into account in coming to a conclusion, and I think it is right to observe that, at the best, the benefit he could procure under the will would be extremely small. I do not desire to go into exact figures on these questions, because there has as yet been no accounting, and we have no sufficient evidence to enable us to determine the precise amount Mr Guthrie would have to account for if he were ordered to account under this action; but so far as it goes, the evidence seems to indicate that after paying the legacies, and after making good the mortis causa gifts—if one may so describe them—which he had been entrusted to give, and deducting certain expenses, which from his evidence may have been considerable, he would have derived but small benefit from the residuary bequest in his favour. But then I am afraid that even that small benefit must be very greatly reduced, because the pursuers have brought this action to enforce as an alternative claim, failing their right to obtain an accounting for the whole estate, their right to legitim, and I do not find on record any plea against the validity of that claim. Accordingly it does appear to me very doubtful whether, if the defender has to account for the portion of the estate which goes in legitim to the children, there will be any material residue left for him. That, however, is a question with which we are not concerned at present.

I think on the whole matter the defenders must be assoilzied from the reductive conclusions, and that the case must be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as shall be just to dispose of the conclusions for legitim. I think I need hardly say that in the observations I have made on these conclusions I am not expressing any opinion on the question, which has not been argued to us, whether the claim for legitim can be made good or not; but there is no plea on record against the claim, and if there is any doubt about it, the parties will have an opportunity for discussing it before the Lord Ordinary when the case goes back to him for further procedure.

CONTRACT—PROOF—INNOMINATE CONTRACT—AGREEMENT BY INJURED WORKMAN IN RECEIPT OF WEEKLY PAYMENT UNDER WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT TO ACCEPT SUM OF MONEY IN SETTLEMENT OF ALL CLAIMS AGAINST EMPLOYER—DEATH OF WORKMAN BEFORE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTED—NATURE OF AGREEMENT — PROOF BY WRIT ALLOWED — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897 (60 AND 61 VICT. CAP. 37), SCHED. II., SECT. 8—DOWNIE V. BLACK (13 R. 271) COMMENTED ON.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

In this action Thomas M'Fadzean, the brother and executor-dative of the late Malcolm M'Fadzean, labourer, sued Messrs Robert M'Alpine & Sons, the employers of the deceased, for the sum of £40 alleged to be due to the deceased under a contract entered into between him and the defenders in relation to a claim for compensation for injuries suffered by the deceased in the employment of the defenders.

The material averments on record were as follows:—

COND. 2. On or about the 31st day of July 1902, while the said now deceased Malcolm M'Fadzean was engaged in the service of the defenders at Provanmill Gas Works, Germinston, Glasgow, he received injuries at a brickmaking machine at which he was working which resulted in the amputation of his right arm near the elbow. Consequent upon said accident it was agreed that the defenders should pay to the said deceased as compensation for said injuries the sum of 9s. 1½d. per week, which was latterly reduced to 3s. 1½d. per week. Said reduced sum was paid down to 13th December 1905.

Ans. 2. Admitted, subject to the explanation that the payments referred to were made in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and under decree of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, recorded in the Sheriff Court books.

Cond. 3. On or about 16th December 1905, after sundry negotiations, the said deceased, through his law agent, offered to accept £40 in full settlement of all his claims, whether under the statutes or at common law, against the defenders, and on or about 29th December 1905 the defenders, through their law agent, accepted said offer. A binding contract was thereby completed between the parties for payment to the deceased by the defenders of the sum of £40.

Cond. 4. On or about the 6th January 1906, the said Malcolm M'Fadzean died suddenly before the above-mentioned sums had been paid to him. The receipt sent for his signature will be produced in process at the calling hereof and founded on. Defenders' statements in answer are denied. Explained that defenders, through their law agents, accepted the offer of £40 on or about 29th December 1905, and arranged to send the receipt for the deceased Malcolm M'Fadzean's signature by the middle of the following week, but failed to do so.

Ans. 3 and 4. Admitted that on or about 16th December 1905 the deceased's law agent offered to accept £40 in redemption of the payments due in terms of the said decree. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that on or about 29th December 1905 the law agent of the deceased Malcolm M'Fadzean met with the law agents of the defenders, when they informed him they had not yet obtained their client's instructions to accept of said offer, but that they hoped to get definite instructions shortly. It was then arranged that the defenders' law agents should enquire what procedure was necessary to have the decree terminated in the event of a settlement being come to. On 9th January 1906 the defenders' law agents received instructions to complete the arrangement, and on 10th January they wrote the agent of deceased with a memorandum of agreement for his client's signature, which after being signed by him and defenders required to be registered with the Sheriff-Clerk in order to terminate the decree. The pursuer is called upon to produce said agreement. A receipt in general terms for signature by the deceased was also sent. On 12th January, the pursuer's agent replied stating his client had died suddenly on Saturday, 6th January 1906. The pursuer's statements in answer are denied.

The pursuer pleaded :—

1. The said deceased Malcolm M'Fadzean having offered to accept said sum of £40 in full settlement of all his claims against them, and defenders having accepted said offer, an agreement was thereby concluded between them which defenders are bound to implement.

2. The pursuer now being in right of said agreement as executor-dative foresaid, is entitled to decree against the defenders for said sum of £40 first sued for.

3. The defenders having been due and resting owing the said deceased Malcolm M'Fadzean the sums sued for, and the pursuer, as executor-dative as aforesaid, now being in right of same, is entitled to decree against the defenders therefor, with expenses as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded :—

1. No title to sue.

2. The action is incompetent.

3. There having been no completed agreement between the deceased and the defenders, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

4. Separatim, if a completed agreement had been come to, it was for the redemption of compensation due in terms of a decree under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and was personal to the deceased and does not transmit to his representatives.

The receipt and memorandum referred to in Ans. 3 and 4 for the defenders were in the following terms :—

Discharge (unsigned) by Malcolm M'Fadzean in favour of Robert M'Alpine & Sons.

I, Malcolm M'Fadzean, labourer, residing at 7 Forge Street, Springburn, Glasgow, do hereby acknowledge to have received from Robert M'Alpine & Sons, contractors, 188 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, per the hands of Howarth & Stewart, writers, Glasgow, the sum of £40 sterling, together with weekly payments made to me under and in virtue of (First) Memorandum of Agreement recorded in the Sheriff Court books of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, on 25th January 1904; and (Second) Interlocutor of Mr Sheriff Boyd, dated 29th March 1904, in the Petition for Review of the former weekly payments in full payment and satisfaction of all claims and expenses present and future competent to me for injuries sustained by me on 31st July 1902 while in the employment of the said Robert M'Alpine & Sons at the erection of the Provan Gas Works, Glasgow, in respect of which accident I received such injuries to my left arm as necessitated its partial amputation: And I discharge all claims competent to me at common law under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, and the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897: In witness whereof.

shire, at Glasgow, in terms of order of Mr Sheriff Boyd, of date 8th January 1904; and (Second) Interlocutor by the said Mr Sheriff Boyd, dated 29th March 1904, in the Petition for Review of payments settled under above-mentioned Memorandum of Agreement.

You are requested to record this Memorandum pursuant to paragraph 8 of the second schedule of the above-mentioned Act, dated the 10th day of January 1906.

To the Sheriff-Clerk of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow.

On 23rd October 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) sustained the defenders' second plea in law, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed.

Argued for the Pursuer: 1. The action was competent. It was not an action under the Workmen's Compensation Act. 2. The averments on record disclosed a contract such as the appellant was entitled to prove prout de jure (Downie v. Black, 1885, 13 R. 271). The contract was not of an unusual or anomalous nature; it was analogous to an agreement for the payment of a sum of money in settlement of an action, and proof should not be restricted to writ or oath (Forbes v. Caird, 1877, 4 R. 1141; Reid v. Reid Bros., 1887, 14 R. 789). In any case the appellants were entitled to a proof by writ.

Argued for the Respondents: 1. The action was incompetent. The appellant's remedy was to apply to the Sheriff for registration of a memorandum of agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Cochrane v. Traill, 1900, 2 F. 794; Binning v. Easton & Sons, 1906, 8 F. 407). 2. Assuming the action to be competent, the contract was one which could only be proved by writ (Cochrane v. Traill, supra, per Lord Young at p. 798, and Binning v. Easton, supra, per Lord Kyllachy at p. 415). Proof by oath was excluded, as the alleged contract was entered into through an agent (Sawers, 1902, 19 R. 1090).

The Court sustained the appeal, recalled the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor of 23rd October 1906, and remitted to him to allow the pursuer a proof by writ of the averments contained in Cond. 3, and to the defenders a conjunct probation.

The Lord President. — The pursuer here, Thomas M'Fadzean, is the executor of Malcolm M'Fadzean, a labourer who was engaged in the service of the defenders at Provanmill Gas Works, Glasgow. While engaged in such service he met with an injury, and he made a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The parties seem to have come to an agreement without resorting to arbitration, and compensation was paid—first at the rate of 9s. 1½d. per week, and latterly at 3s. 1½d. per week—and a memorandum of agreement as to compensation was recorded in the Sheriff Court books under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Matters so standing, in the month of December 1905 the parties seem to have begun negotiations as to whether they might not come to some sort of a settlement which would, by a payment of a lump sum, get rid of the weekly payments which had still to be made under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The pursuer's averment in this matter is contained in Cond. 3, and it is this: "On or about 16th December 1905, after sundry negotiations, the said deceased, through his law agent, offered to accept £40 in full settlement of all his claims, whether under the statutes or at common law, against the defenders, and on or about 29th December 1905 the defenders, through their law agent, accepted said offer. A binding contract was thereby completed between the parties for payment to the deceased by the defenders of the sum of £40." The answer to that is. [His Lordship read Ans. 3 and 4.]

Now that is the averment and the answer, and the pursuer, of course, asked a proof of his averment. The case was dismissed by the learned Sheriff-Substitute, who sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, which second plea in law is that the action is incompetent. There are other pleas, that there was no completed agreement, and that the agreement was personal and did not transmit to the representatives of the deceased. But the plea sustained is that the action is "incompetent." I have not been able to see exactly on what ground that plea can be sustained, and I am bound to say the learned Sheriff-Substitute's note, which he has appended to his interlocutor, does not help me, for it seems to be, not a criticism of competency, but of relevancy—which is a different thing. After stating the facts, he says:—"But before this arrangement had been formally concluded, M'Fadzean died. I do not think there is any room for pursuer's plea that a new and binding contract had been completed. M'Fadzean might have changed his mind, as workmen so often do. So might the employers. Till the Court had reviewed the 3s. 1½d. award it stood, and that payment would only have been ended upon the £40 having been actually paid over. The situation amounted to no more than this—that the law agents had arrived at a basis upon which they would advise their clients to concur in ending the weekly payments. But this was not a new contract." Now all that does not seem to me to go to the competency at all, but only to the relevancy of the agreement as averred, and therefore I cannot see my way to sustain the judgment on the grounds on which it at present stands.

But that opens the question of what ought to be done with the case. Now I am bound to say that I do not think the averment of the pursuer is very satisfactory, because it does not bring out clearly what he alleges the contract really was.

But the contract must have been one of two things. The contract may have been a contract that, in respect of a payment of £40, the deceased man would take such steps as would free the employers from the obligations under which they at that time stood in virtue of the recording of the memorandum, and also relieve them from any claim in the future whether at common law or under the statutes. Well, if that was the contract, it is quite obvious that the action cannot stand, because it was a contract with mutual prestations, and M'Fadzean, by dying, has put it out of his power to fulfil his part of the bargain, and consequently the defenders are free of the contract. I think that is the view the learned Sheriff has taken of the contract, but his disposal of the case on that view is based really on irrelevancy and not on incompetency, in respect that the pursuer has not set forth the possibility of carrying out M'Fadzean's part of the contract.

But then that is not the contract that I take it the pursuer wishes to make out, and though, as I say, I do not think his averment is very clear on the point, it was perfectly clear in the mouth of his counsel. He wants to infer the second of the two views of the contract that I have referred to, viz., that a concluded bargain was come to under which one person said, "I will pay you £40," and the other person said, "You have promised to pay me £40. I therefore cry quits for any other claims I may have against you in respect of this accident," and that there and then a concluded bargain having been come to, the £40 was immediately exigible, and so was in bonis of the deceased. That is the only theory on which the executor can maintain the claim he makes in this action.

Now in that view of the contract the question of what is to be done with the case is a delicate one, but I have come to the conclusion that a contract of that peculiar description—for it is peculiar; it is not likely that a person would bind himself to make a payment of £40 down under these conditions; it is much more likely that he would not—a contract of that description can only be proved by writ or oath; and accordingly I propose that we recal the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute and remit to him to allow a proof by writ of the averments in Cond. 3. The law upon the question of what can be proved by parole is perhaps not in a very clear state, and if this case had been a case of a larger character I should not have been unwilling that the whole matter should be carefully considered by a larger Court, especially having regard to the decision in Downie v. Black, 13 R. 271, which, so far as I am concerned, I should like to have an opportunity of reconsidering. But I may say that I know of no case which is authority for the view that an obligation to pay money, not incidental to one of the well-known ordinary consensual contracts, is provable in the law of Scotland otherwise than by writ or oath; and the learned counsel who pleaded this case was unable to point to any such decision. I cannot say that I find that the law has ever been exactly laid down in that formula, but I do say that I know of no case in which an obligation to pay money has been allowed to be proved otherwise than by writ or oath, except where the payment is an essential part of one of those contracts which can be proved by parole. I am fortified in the view I take of this case by the opinion delivered by Lord Young in Cochrane v. Traill, 2 F. 794, and by the opinion indicated by some remarks of Lord Kyllachy in the case of Binning v. Easton & Sons, 8 F. 407.

Lord Kinnear.—I have had considerable difficulty in dealing with this case. I have some doubt whether there is any relevant averment of contract at all, in this respect, that the averment seems to me to be so wanting in specification that it may reasonably be considered as meaning either of two different agreements; and I have some doubt whether the framer of this condescendence had any distinct idea in his own mind what contract he meant to aver. But it has been said to us with perfect distinctness at the bar that what the pursuer now wishes to prove is an agreement to the effect your Lordship has stated, and therefore, as I am not disposed to criticise the averments too strictly in cases of this kind, I assent to your Lordship's proposal that this case be sent to proof.

I agree also that the law in regard to cases in which proof ought to be limited to writ or oath is so unsettled that, if the amount of money involved in this case was sufficient, it might be very proper that the recent decisions should be reconsidered by a Court of Seven Judges. But it would manifestly be altogether improper to subject a litigant in the circumstances of this pursuer to such expense as would be involved in that proceeding. I therefore think we must do the best we can on the law as it now stands; and, though not without considerable hesitation, I agree that we should follow the opinion expressed by Lord Young in the case to which your Lordship referred.

Lord Dundas concurred.—17*th July* 1907.

Process—Proof or Jury Trial—Question Involving Construction of Statute—Death of Pursuer's Son After Partaking of Fish Dinner Supplied by Defender—Action Laid OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie. — Stocks v. Holstein.

ON FAULT AT COMMON LAW AND BREACH OF WARRANTY UNDER STATUTE—RELEVANCY—THE SALE OF GOODS ACT 1893 (56 AND 57 VICT.), SECT. 14, SUB-SECT. 1.

William Stocks, the pursuer in this case, sued the defender, Francis Louis Holstein, carrying on business at the Peacock Hotel, Newhaven, for damages and solatium for the death of his son, on the ground that his death was caused by his partaking, along with others, of a fish dinner or supper supplied by the defender at his hotel on 2nd February 1907. The pursuer made, inter alia, the following averments:—

The members of the staff in the office of the Superintendent of the Line of the North British Railway Company have been in the habit for some years of having an annual gathering and "fish dinner" at the defender's hotel, and this year it was arranged between them and the defender that the function should be held on Saturday, 2nd February 1907. Accordingly on that date the said staff, with one or two guests—the party numbering altogether about 30—met at the defender's said hotel, and partook of a fish dinner or supper provided for them by the defender. Among those present was the pursuer's son, Laurence Stocks, of the office staff of the District Goods Manager of the North British Railway.

Within an hour or thereby of leaving the hotel, pursuer's said son began to feel ill, and next morning (Sunday, 3rd February 1907), between 3 and 4 o'clock, he became seriously ill, being seized with vomiting and purging. His illnesss continued, his stomach being seriously affected, and although he received the best attention and medical advice he did not recover his health. No alarming symptoms developed at first, but about three weeks after 2nd February 1907, viz. 24th February 1907, the pursuer's son's illness assumed a much more serious aspect, and on or about 1st March 1907 it was pronounced to be typhoid or enteric fever. The interval of time which usually elapses before such a fever can be diagnosed is about three weeks. On 2nd March 1907 the pursuer's said son was, by his own medical attendant's orders, removed to the City Hospital, where he was treated with the best medical skill, but, nevertheless, he died there on 16th March 1907. The cause of death was certified to be enteric fever. Of the party to which pursuer's said son belonged, and who partook of the same fish dinner with him, at least twelve others also became seriously ill as a result of having so partaken.

The death of the pursuer's said son was caused through the fault or negligence of the defender. It resulted from his having, at said fish dinner in defender's said hotel, on 2nd February 1907, partaken of food, supplied by the defender, which was contaminated, or was otherwise unfit for human consumption. In particular, some of the fish supplied at said dinner was served with mussel sauce which, it has been discovered and is now averred, had been made from mussels that were tainted with sewage, and so not only unfit for human consumption, but very dangerous to the health and life of anyone partaking of it. All the mussels used by the defender for the purposes of his business were gathered from an area within the estuary of the Firth of Forth, situated between Leith pier and Craigentinny Meadows, which is polluted with the sewage of adjoining towns. It was known to the defender when he supplied the mussels in question that they had been taken from said area. It was also known to him that the waters in said area were polluted with sewage which affected shellfish, such as mussels, and made them unfit and highly dangerous for people to eat. He had also previously been warned several times by the medical officer of health for Leith, and by his inspectors, that the eating of mussels gathered in said estuary had been causing serious illness to people who had partaken of them, because of the pollution of the waters from which they were taken, and of the great danger of using the same for human consumption, and that therefore he should cease to use them in connection with his business. The defender also knew that there were printed or painted sign boards erected along the shore warning the public generally against eating mussels taken from these waters. Notwithstanding his said knowledge and the above repeated warnings, the defender continued to use, for the purposes of his said business, mussels which he knew were gathered on the south shore of the said estuary and within the said polluted area. The mussels from which the sauce supplied at said dinner on 2nd February 1907 was made were gathered from said polluted area, and the illness from which pursuer's son died was brought on by his having innocently partaken of said sauce supplied by the defender at said fish dinner on 2nd February 1907. It was gross negligence on the part of the defender to supply sauce made with the said mussels to the pursuer's son, and the death of the latter was the natural and probable result of his negligence.

By thus persisting in using mussels gathered from an area known to be polluted, and serving them to the members of the said party, including pursuer's son, the defender was guilty of gross negligence, and is liable for all the evil consequences caused by his having done so. Further, apart from defender's fault as aforesaid, he is liable in damages to the pursuer under the Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sect. 14 (1), in respect of his implied warranty of the fitness for human consumption of the food supplied by him to the pursuer's said son at the said dinner. The defender knew the purpose for which the said fish dinner was required and supplied, viz. for human consumption. The various articles of food supplied were of such a description as it is in the course of the defender's business to supply, and he knew, as was the fact, that the individual members of said party relied on the defender's skill and judgment that the food supplied by him on said evening would be fit to be safely partaken of.

Sect. 14, sub-sect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act is in the following terms:—

Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose.

The pursuer proposed the following issues for the trial of the cause :—

1. Whether the illness which resulted in the death of the pursuer's son Laurence Stocks on or about 16th March 1907 was caused through the fault of the defender, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?
2. Whether, on or about the 2nd February 1907, the defender, in the course of his business, supplied a fish dinner to a company which included the pursuer's said son; whether the same or part thereof was not reasonably fit for human consumption; and whether pursuer's said son, relying on defender's skill as a purveyor, partook of said dinner and was in consequence thereof seized with illness which caused his death, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

The pursuer moved for approval of issues.

The defender opposed this, and argued (1) that the pursuer's averments relating to the first issue were irrelevant; and that in any event the defender would be prejudiced if the case were sent to a jury.

The Lord Ordinary, on account of the questions involved in the second issue, found that the case was more suitable to be disposed of by way of proof, disallowed the issues, and allowed a proof before answer.

Lord Guthrie.—I reject the defender's argument that the pursuer's averments relative to the first issue, that of fault, are irrelevant. Nor do I see any grounds for his contention, in relation both to fault and breach of contract, that the case ought not to go to a jury, because of possible prejudice.

I have allowed a proof and refused the pursuer's motion for a jury trial, on account of the nature of the questions involved in the second issue, that of breach of contract under sect. 14, sub-sect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893; and I proceed to consider the question of jury trial or proof, as if the only case made by the pursuer was under the Act. The onus under the Act is probably lighter than in a case of fault, and he has therefore a reasonable ground for insisting in his second issue.

The question under the second issue is not so simple as the pursuer's counsel represented it. His issue, as framed, does not exhaust the elements necessary for the jury's consideration under the Act. The second issue asks the jury to find, first, that the food in question was supplied by the defender in the course of his business; second, that it was not reasonably fit for human consumption; and third, that the deceased relied on the defender's skill. But the Act further requires that, expressly or by implication, the buyer must have made known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods were required. The purpose may be obvious in a case like the present, but still this is an element to be expressly considered by the jury. It illustrates the difficulty of the question of breach of contract that the pursuer's skilled advisers first proposed an issue which, if affirmed, would not have entitled them to a verdict, and then, at the end of the discussion, suggested that the case might be tried by a jury, on the record, without an issue.

As to practice, I consider only the practice of the Scotch Courts. In England the custom of putting questions to juries and obtaining special verdicts may diminish the risk of miscarriage in a case of this sort. The course followed by Lord Kyllachy in the cases of Macfadyen, 1897, 4 S.L.T. 321, and Sutherland, 1898, 5 S.L.T. 55, seems to me in accordance with precedent, and to be based on sound considerations of expediency.

I therefore send the whole case to proof.—25th July 1907.

Reclaiming Notes against Interlocutors of Lord Salvesen.

In July 1904 Boord & Son, distillers and spirit merchants, London, brought an action against Thom & Cameron Ltd., whisky merchants, Cheapside, Glasgow. The conclusions of the summons were—

(First) for declarator that the pursuers were the sole and exclusive proprietors of the registered trade marks Nos. 20,505, 257,763, 257,764, and 263,113; and (Second), "the defenders and their agents, or others acting for them, or for whom they are responsible, Ought and Should, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, be interdicted, prohibited and discharged from in any way infringing the pursuers' said trade marks, and from infringing the pursuers' sole and exclusive right to use the same, and from trading on and obtaining the benefit of the pursuers' established trade reputation; and, without prejudice to the foregoing generality, the defenders Ought and Should be interdicted, prohibited and discharged, by decree foresaid, from issuing, selling or using, as labels or as advertisements or otherwise, designs which infringe the pursuers' said registered trade marks or which are colourable imitations of the same, or which trade on and obtain the benefit of the pursuers' established trade reputation, and in particular from issuing, selling or using in labels, advertisements or otherwise the designs referred to in Article 6 of the Condescendence hereunto annexed, or any similar design which infringes the pursuers' said trade marks, or which trade on and obtain the benefit of the pursuers' established trade reputation or is in colourable imitation of the same; and (Third) the defenders Ought and Should be interdicted, prohibited and discharged, by decree foresaid, from selling, offering for sale, passing off, or attempting to pass off, or enabling others to pass off, Old Tom gin, unsweetened gin, or any spirits, wines, cordials, bitters, liqueurs, or other articles of a similar nature not of the pursuers' merchandise or manufacture, as and for the goods and merchandise of the pursuers in any way whatsoever, and in particular by using the words 'Cat and Barrel' in connection with the representation of a cat and barrel or otherwise, or by using the representation of a cat and barrel, or any words or a word, signs or a sign, figures or a figure, devices or a device, which are calculated to enable the defenders' gins or other fermented liquors or liqueurs, or goods of the defenders, to be passed off as or for the goods of the pursuers."

There was also a conclusion for delivery of all labels, etc., belonging to the defenders, and infringing, or calculated to assist in the infringement of, the pursuers' trade marks.

The labels, of which illustrations are given, are, first, No. 91 of process, which represents one of Messrs Boord's labels (No. 20,505 on the Register), and second, the four labels of Messrs Thom & Cameron referred to in Condescendence 6 and in the opinion of the Lord President, Nos. 21, 18, 39, and 33, and against which interdict was granted. Messrs Boord's other marks were similar in design to No. 20,505 except No. 263,113, which was a capsule mark containing only a representation of a cat on a barrel with "Boord & Son, London," printed round it.

The pursuers averred:

COND. 3. The pursuers and all their predecessors in business have for a great number of years manufactured, sold and advertised for sale, gin and liqueurs, as well as other fermented liquors and spirits, and have acquired a great reputation for the same respectively. Since at least the year 1854 they have so manufactured, sold and advertised said gin, liquors and spirits, under and in connection with a certain label or trade mark, whereof the important and essential feature is the representation thereon of a cat and of a barrel. Since at least the year 1854 the pursuers' goods have been well known and identified in the market under and by means of said label or trade mark. The pursuers are, moreover, the registered proprietors of said label or trade mark, which was registered as a trade mark in class 43 for fermented liquors and spirits on 8th April 1879 as having been used for twenty-five years before that date. Said trade mark was then registered by Thomas William Boord, carrying on business under the name of Swaine, Boord & Company. On 17th June 1892 the pursuers were entered in the Register of Trade Marks as proprietors of said trade mark. The registration of said trade mark was renewed on 8th April 1893, and will remain in force for fourteen years from that date. The pursuers are also the registered proprietors of the trade marks Nos. 257,763 and 257,764 and No. 263,113. The said trade mark No. 257,763, which is used for dry gin, was registered on 7th June 1904 as having been used by the pursuers and their predecessors in business continuously since upwards of twelve years before the 13th August 1875. The said trade mark No. 257,764, used for cordial Old Tom, was also registered on 7th June 1904 as having been used by the pursuers and their predecessors in business continuously since upwards of twenty-five years before the 13th August 1875. The said trade mark No. 263,113, which is a capsule mark and is used for bottled cordials (alcoholic), Old Tom and dry gin, juniper cordial (alcoholic), orange bitters (alcoholic), ginger brandy and whisky, was registered on the 14th July 1905 as on an application dated 29th April 1904, as having been used by the pursuers and their predecessors in business since at least one year previous to 13th August 1875. The pursuers' trade mark is also registered in most of the British Colonies, in the United States, and in many other foreign countries. The pursuers have always applied for and obtained injunctions against any infringements of their said trade marks as soon as said infringements have come to their notice.

No. 91 of Process.
No. 20,505 on the Register.

COND. 4. The fermented liquors, spirits and liqueurs, including gin, sloe gin, and other goods of the pursuers' manufacture and sale, have for about fifty years been known to purchasers and intending purchasers as the "Cat and Barrel" brand of fermented liquors, spirits and liqueurs, including gin and sloe gin, and any such goods or merchandise advertised or sold under or in connection with the said trade mark or label, or as or of the "Cat and Barrel" brand, have been known to, and have been and are identified by traders and the public as goods of the pursuers' manufacture or merchandise. The words "Cat and Barrel" brand are commonly used to indicate the pursuers' goods, and in the market the pursuers goods only are known by that name. The pursuers have carried on their trade in connection with their said trade mark in England, Scotland and Ireland, and in the Colonies and abroad.

COND. 6. . . . . The pursuers [in the course of the action after referred to, Boord & Son v. Huddart] ascertained that the defenders were, and are, using a variety of labels in connection with their business which infringe the pursuers' said label and trade marks. Amongst these labels are the following: (1) A label with a barrel lying on its side, with a cat sitting on it, and having printed thereon Superior Old Tom Gin, manufactured by Thom & Cameron, Glasgow [No. 21 of process]; (2) a label with a barrel in an upright position, and the cat on the top thereof, with a bottle and a glass, and having printed thereon Thom & Cameron, Cream Old Tom Gin, Thom & Cameron, Limited, Glasgow and London [No. 33 of process]; (3) a label with a barrel also in an upright position, and the cat sitting on the top thereof, and having printed thereon Superior Old Tom Gin, Old Tom, Thom & Cameron, Glasgow [No. 39 of process]; and (4) a label with two barrels close together, laid on their side, and a third barrel on its side put on the top of them, with a cat on the top of it [No. 18 of process].

The said labels, which are colourable imitations of the pursuers' trade mark, registered as aforesaid, have, as the pursuers have now ascertained, and aver, been largely used by the defenders in connection with their export trade for a number of years. The said labels are an infringement of the pursuers' trade mark. Said labels, containing representations of a cat and a barrel similar to the pursuers' registered trade mark, have been, and are still being, largely used by the defenders in connection with the sale of gin and other spirits and liqueurs in Scotland, and for their foreign and colonial trade. . . . The defenders' labels referred to in the present action are not registered.

The Pursuers pleaded:—

"1. The pursuers, being proprietors of the said trade marks and having an established trade reputation for their goods under the term 'Cat and Barrel Brand,' are entitled to the sole and exclusive use of the same, and to prevent any other person, firm or company selling their goods upon such established trade reputation.

"2. The defenders having infringed the pursuers' said trade mark and exclusive right to use the same, the pursuers are entitled to interdict as concluded for."

The defenders averred in answer:

Explained that the defenders and their predecessors have since at least 1850 used in connection with their business, and particularly in selling gin, labels which bore as a distinctive feature the representation of a cat and a barrel, and that in consequence thereof the gin sold by them has for many years been known in the market as the "Cat Brand" and the "Cat and Barrel Brand" of gin. The defenders and their predecessors were not aware until about eighteen months ago that the pursuers used labels in connection with their business upon which there was a representation of a cat and a barrel. The said representations upon the labels of the pursuers and defenders respectively are not similar in appearance, and would not in any event constitute an infringement of trade mark upon the part either of pursuers or of defenders.

The Defenders pleaded:—

"2. The pursuers not having an exclusive right to the 'Cat and Barrel' brand, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

"3. In respect that the defenders have not infringed the pursuers' trade marks, they should be assoilzied."

On 7th July 1905 Thom & Cameron Ltd. brought a cross action against Boord & Son. The conclusions of the summons were as follows:—

"(Primo), it Ought and Should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the entries of the four trade marks after mentioned in the register of trade marks kept under and in terms of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act eighteen hundred and eighty-three, as amended by the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, viz. [The summons then set forth Boord & Son's trade marks], were made in said register without sufficient cause, and that the same ought to be expunged therefrom accordingly. Or otherwise (Secundo), it Ought and Should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said alleged trade marks were incapable of registration, and that the alleged entry thereof in the aforesaid register is invalid and illegal, and contrary to the provisions of the aforesaid statutes and relative official notices issued by the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks in pursuance thereof, and that the said alleged entries ought to be expunged from the said register accordingly: Or otherwise (Tertio), it Ought and Should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the defenders have no exclusive right to use the sign, figure, or device of a cat, or of a cat and barrel, on labels, advertisements, or otherwise, in connection with the sale of Old Tom gin, unsweetened gin, or spirits, wines, cordials, bitters, liqueurs, or other articles of a similar nature, and that the pursuers are entitled to use the said sign, figure, or device on labels, advertisements, or otherwise, in connection with the sale of Old Tom gin or any of the liquors before mentioned which is not made or manufactured by or on behalf of the defenders, and to sell, offer for sale, and advertise Old Tom gin, or any of the liquors before mentioned, made or manufactured by or on behalf of the pursuers under the said sign, figure, or device, by label, advertisement, or otherwise."

No. 39 of Process.

The pursuers set forth the entries on the register relating to the defender's trade marks, and further averred:—

An essential and important feature of the whole of said trade marks is the representation of a cat, or of a cat and a barrel. The whole of said trade marks were incapable of registration . . . . in respect that the device of a cat, or otherwise of a cat and a barrel, were in common use prior to the respective dates of registration, and were common to the trade, and were not disclaimed in the respective applications for registration. In particular [the pursuers made specific averments as to the use of the device of a cat and barrel by other traders].

The pursuers were not aware until recently of the registration of the said trade marks, or any of them. The defenders claim that they are exclusively entitled to use the representation or device of a cat, or a cat and barrel, in connection with the sale of gin and other liquors, or to the exclusive use of a label or trade mark for gin of any devices whereof an essential feature is the representation of a cat or a cat and barrel.

The Pursuers pleaded:—

"1. The said trade marks having been entered in the register of trade marks without sufficient cause, and the pursuers having been aggrieved thereby, they are entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons.

"2. The said trade marks having been incapable of registration, and the entry thereof in the register of trade marks having been illegal and contrary to the provisions of the statutes and the notices issued in pursuance thereof, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, and to decree of reduction, as concluded for, with expenses.

"3. The defenders having no exclusive right to the use of the figure or device of a cat, or cat and barrel, in connection with the sale of gin or other liquors, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator to this effect, and to decree of reduction, as concluded for."

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. The statutory enactments referred to are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the Lord President.

1st Div.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

On 27th March 1906 the Lord Ordinary in the action at the instance of Boord & Son against Thom & Cameron Ltd. assoilzied the defenders. In the action at the instance of Thom & Cameron Ltd. against Boord & Son, his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Finds and declares that the defenders have no exclusive right to use the sign, figure or device of a 'Cat,' or of a 'Cat and Barrel,' on labels, advertisements or otherwise in connection with the sale of 'Old Tom' gin, but that the pursuers are entitled to use the said sign, figure or device on labels, advertisements or otherwise in connection with the sale of 'Old Tom' gin which is not made or manufactured by or on behalf of the defenders, and to sell, offer for sale, and advertise 'Old Tom' gin made or manufactured by or on behalf of the pursuers under the said sign, figure or device by label, advertisement or otherwise; finds it unnecessary to deal with the other conclusions of the action, and dismisses the same."

Lord Salvesen.—On 1st July 1904 Messrs Boord & Son raised an action against Thom & Cameron Ltd., in which they sought declarator that they were the sole proprietors of certain trade marks, and interdict against infringement of same. There was also a conclusion to the effect that Thom & Cameron should be interdicted from using the words "Cat and Barrel," or the representation of a Cat and Barrel, in connection with the sale of gin and other liquors. About a year later Thom & Cameron replied by an action of declarator and reduction, in which they sought to have Boord & Son's trade marks removed from the register, or otherwise a decree that the latter have no exclusive right to use the device of a Cat, or of a Cat and Barrel, on labels or advertisements in connection with the sale of "Old Tom" gin and other liquors. Both cases were ultimately sent to trial together, and I thought it right that Thom & Cameron should lead in the proof, on the ground that the registration of the trade marks threw the onus of proof on those who attacked their validity. In what follows I shall accordingly refer to Thom & Cameron Ltd. throughout as the pursuers, and Boord & Son as the defenders.

The defenders are an old-established firm of distillers and wine and spirit merchants. For some time prior to 1848 they had done a considerable trade in gin. The liquor then in vogue was a sweetened gin, and it had long previously acquired the name of "Old Tom." How that name originated is mere matter of conjecture, and it is of no materiality in the present case, as it is admitted that it was a name in common use. Prior to 1848 the defenders' business was entirely confined to the home trade; but after that year, owing to an Act having been passed which allowed a drawback on exported spirits, it became possible for British distillers to compete in foreign and colonial markets with the Dutch distillers of gin; and the defenders appear to have prosecuted the export trade with vigour and success from that time onwards. About 1849, or possibly a couple of years later, the defenders adopted a device upon their labels which consisted of a circular disc, on which was placed a Barrel on its bilge, which again carried a Cat in a standing position, with one paw uplifted and the back somewhat curved. This device they have consistently used on the labels of bottles in which their gin was bottled for export as well as for the home market—on showcards which they distributed to their customers, on caution notices which they issued from time to time with a view to preventing imitations, and on the other usual literature which is employed in connection with such a business. In 1879 the defenders applied for and obtained registration of the device as their trade mark, on the representation that they had used the same for twenty-five years prior to the date of their application. This was a true representation so far as gin was concerned, but it was not accurate so far as it applied to whiskies and other liquors. The defenders have uninterruptedly used the device in question as their registered trade mark ever since, and until now their right has never been judicially challenged. During the whole period from about 1850 onwards they have done a large trade in England and a large export business to various parts of the world, including India, Australia, Africa and America. To some extent also they have, during the whole period, carried on a business in gin with Scotland and Ireland, although—so far as their Scotch business is concerned—it has throughout been relatively small, and has diminished rather than increased.

From the first the defenders appear to have attached considerable importance to the device of the Cat and Barrel, which—so far as they knew—they were the first to adopt in connection with the sale of gin and other spirits. From time to time the device was fraudulently copied, and whenever a case of this kind came to their knowledge the defenders took prompt means to have it punished or stopped. So early as 1856 they found it necessary, for their protection, to issue printed notices to their customers and others, warning them against the unauthorised use of their label, and similar notices were periodically issued both before and after the device had been registered as the defenders' trade mark. In 1903 they raised an action in the High Court of Justice against a Mr Huddart, who was selling gin manufactured by Melrose, Drover & Co. Ltd., of Leith, on the ground that the label under which the gin was sold contained the representation of a Cat's head and paws protruding from the upper part of a barrel, a device which the defenders maintained was an infringement of their trade mark. The case went to trial; and after a large number of witnesses had been examined on both sides, the defenders obtained an injunction against Huddart from Mr Justice Swinfen Eady. This judgment was allowed to become final; and the defenders thereupon, having had their attention called to the use by other distillers and merchants of the device of a Cat and Barrel in connection with the sale of "Old Tom" gin, threatened these firms with proceedings unless they agreed to discontinue its use. In every such case they had hitherto been successful, and they have now taken action against the pursuers, one of whose directors was a witness for the defenders in the Huddart case.

The above facts, which are practically undisputed, present a formidable prima facie case in favour of the defenders' claim to the sole and exclusive use of the device which they have so long displayed on their labels—apart altogether from the statutory privileges which the registration of the device confers upon them. The pursuers, however, now assert that the defenders' trade marks were incapable of registration "in respect that the device of a Cat, or otherwise of a Cat and a Barrel, were in common use prior to the respective dates of registration, and were common to the trade, and were not disclaimed in the respective applications for registration." They gave a list of twelve firms, including their own, who they say used labels in connection with the sale of gin whereon the figures of a Cat and a Barrel appear. This defence was not properly raised in the Huddart case, and at all events was not elaborated in evidence as it has been here.

The labels used by the pursuers and by those other traders have been conveniently collected on sheets, so as to make comparison with the defenders' registered device easy. Except that all the labels bear the device of a Cat and Barrel in whole or in part, there is, with perhaps four exceptions, in my opinion, no resemblance between these labels and those used by the defenders. In all of them the manufacturers' name is printed in large and legible type; and I do not think it possible that those who were familiar with the defenders' labels could for a moment imagine when they saw any of the alleged infringing labels that the contents of the bottles to which they were affixed were the defenders' manufacture. The possible exceptions are (1) labels 18 and 34, which were used on gin of the pursuers' manufacture imported by Weir, Scott & Co. to Valparaiso. There is a pretty close resemblance between these two labels and the defenders' trade mark, all the more striking that the word "Cordial," which the defenders from the first applied to "Old Tom," is also used in the same connection on them. It is suggested accordingly by the defenders that the person who designed labels Nos. 18 and 34 must have seen and copied their labels, and I confess that a very small amount of evidence might have induced me to draw this inference. The history of the labels, however, has been explained by Mr Steven, the lithographer by whom they were designed, at the request of Mr Scott, and the general import of his evidence is to the effect that they were not copies of the defenders' labels, of which he was ignorant, and that the resemblance is entirely accidental. No partner of the firm of Weir, Scott & Co. was examined on either side; but the proved fact that these labels have been used in the Valparaiso business since 1873, a place where the defenders say they have all along been doing business, and that there seems never to have been a complaint of the similarity between the two labels, or of any injury done to the defenders' business there, are prima facie evidence that no confusion did in fact arise. In view of this, and the entire absence of contrary evidence, I am unable to hold it proved that these two labels were conscious imitations of the defenders'; and even if they had been, the name of the manufacturers, which was printed in large letters, was sufficient to prevent any person who could read from drawing the inference that the gin sold under these labels was the manufacture of the defenders. (2) The labels Nos. 200, 201, and 35 of process are all plainly taken from the same design, and also bear a strong resemblance to the defenders'. The original label No. 200 is spoken to as having been used by James Mackenzie, Son & Co. at least as far back as 1859 or 1865, and up till two years ago. It is obviously impossible to expect evidence after a lapse of more than forty years as to the history of such a label, and everything, therefore, is to be presumed in its favour. The resemblance is by no means so close as to suggest that the one design was copied from the other; and I think, therefore, I must assume that the label No. 200 was independently designed in ignorance of the defenders' label, and, for all I know, at an earlier date.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

The defenders, however, have led a large body of evidence to the effect that in consequence of the long-continued and extensive use of their trade mark their make of gin has become favourably known as "Cat and Barrel brand," and that any representation of a Cat and Barrel on bottles of gin is liable to be injurious to their business. It was largely on this ground that Mr Justice Swinfen Eady decided that the head of a Cat protruding from the end of a Barrel, which was the device used by Melrose, Drover & Co., was an infringement of the defenders' trade mark, although the device is perhaps more unlike the defenders' trade mark than any of those on which the pursuers rely. The only part of the evidence on this head which impressed me was that which related to the trade with India, Burmah, and other countries, where English characters are not understood, and where the picture upon the bottle is the recognised mode of identifying the goods of a particular manufacturer. All that the evidence, however, comes to is, that the native dealer or middleman would be enabled, if Cat and Barrel labels of any kind were used on gin, to pass off, as the goods of the defenders, gin which was of an inferior quality, and thus succeed in defrauding the unwary purchaser to whom the words "Cat and Barrel brand," as applied to the defenders' gin, had become known. If the adoption of a Cat and Barrel on labels had been of recent use, and in the knowledge or presumed knowledge of the defenders' trade mark, it would have required very little actual evidence of deception to have predisposed me in the defenders' favour; but when I find that for half a century goods bearing some of the labels complained of have been exported to markets where the defenders' gin has been regularly sold, and that not a single instance can be adduced of a purchaser having been deceived, I am unable to draw the inference that the defenders desire. It is noticeable that in their price lists and advertisements the defenders did not, until very recent years, ever offer their gin for sale under the name of "Cat and Barrel brand." In this respect the case is in marked contrast with the case of the "C. B." corsets, which had been widely advertised under that description, and in such a way that the public generally were not aware that the letters "C. B." were the initials of the manufacturer's name; and although the defenders produced 155 written orders as evidence that their gin has become known in the trade as "Cat and Barrel brand," only 34 of these support their contention. In 104 instances "Old Tom" gin was ordered under the designation "Cat brand," and the defenders do not seek in this action to interdict the use of the device of a Cat by itself on any label applied to gin. This is noteworthy, as the defenders seem to me to have quite as much—if not more—to say for their gin being known as the "Cat brand" as for it being known as the "Cat and Barrel brand."

I do not doubt that, amongst customers of the defenders and others who had become familiar with their trade mark, their gin would be not unfrequently spoken of as the "Cat brand" or the "Cat and Barrel brand." But the defenders themselves at no time seem to have made any effort to get their goods recognised under this name; and, in the great majority of cases, I am satisfied that their gin was ordered under the name of the manufacturer. The evidence as to Scotland is extremely meagre on this head, and relates to very recent years. Even, therefore, if the only question in the case had been one of infringement of the defenders' trade mark, or of the resemblance between the pursuers' and the defenders' labels being such as was calculated to deceive, I should have great difficulty in granting interdict. The case appears to me to present many features similar to those which were the subject of discussion in the case of Cowie v. Herbert, 24 R. 353, where the alleged gullibility of Orientals was also emphasised.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

Before dealing with this part of the case, I may notice in passing that there are formal averments as to the pursuers having attempted to pass off their goods as the goods of the defenders. No attempt has been made to prove these averments—even assuming that they were relevant—and I am satisfied that they are without the smallest foundation.

But the pursuers, in the action at their instance, challenge directly the validity of the defenders' trade mark, and it is necessary that I should now deal with the evidence bearing on this challenge. The evidence is voluminous, and I shall content myself with summarising the conclusions at which I have arrived as to the alleged common use of a Cat and Barrel device.

(1) The pursuers' business was founded by Mr Robert Thom in 1848. In 1865 he assumed Mr Cameron as a partner, and the business was carried on as a private concern until 1888, when it was converted into a limited liability company. From the commencement a moderate business in gin was done, at first in the home trade, afterwards in both the home trade and the export trade, and since 1869 in the export trade only. From 1853 onwards the pursuers and their predecessors have used a label as applied to "Old Tom" gin, on which the conspicuous feature was a Cat sitting on a Barrel. I incline to think that No. 39 of process was the first, that afterwards No. 21 was used for a considerable time, and that, concurrently with this, No. 32 of process was used as a flask label. Since 1869 the label regularly used on quart bottles of "Old Tom" has been No. 33 of process, although in the case of one or two customers the stock label No. 35 has been purchased and affixed to the pursuers' gin. Not unnaturally the earliest use of the label depends on the evidence of Mr and Mrs Thom. One other witness speaks to the year 1859, and from at least the year 1863 the continuous use of labels with the "Cat and Barrel" design is, I think, amply established. Since 1873 the business has been practically stationary so far as the turnover of gin was concerned, and has amounted on the average to something between 1000 and 2000 cases per annum. Prior to that period it seems to have been of a very fluctuating nature, reaching the lowest point in 1869, so far as the information now available goes, when only 190 cases are recorded as having been sold, and rising at times, according to Mr Thom's evidence, to considerable proportions.

(2) A firm of James Mackenzie, Sons & Co., who carried on business in Glasgow, used the device of a Cat and two Barrels, shown on label No. 200 of process, from some time prior to 1859. Their successors in business—Messrs Peter M'Donald & Co. —used the same label until 1904, when, at the request of the defenders, they agreed to discontinue it, on the ground that their trade in gin had ceased to be of any importance. The use of this label No. 200 depends on the evidence of Peter M'Donald corroborated by J. T. Stewart, who speaks to seeing the label in 1859. Apart from this corroboration I saw no reason to doubt Mr M'Donald's evidence. He has no motive to serve by giving false evidence, and no conceivable interest in the result of the present action.

(3) Stewart Pott & Co., another firm of wine merchants in Glasgow, have since 1859 used a label for "Old Tom" gin which had the device of a Cat sitting on a Barrel. At first the Cat was represented as sitting on the side or bilge of the Barrel, but afterwards the label No. 85 of process was adopted, which closely resembles that of Thom & Cameron for flasks, except that the Cat is facing in the opposite direction. It is peculiar to their case that they have apparently used this label since 1876, mainly on gin supplied by the defenders, but without arrangement with them.

(4) Messrs Wright & Greig Ltd., another large firm of distillers and spirit merchants in Glasgow, used a Cat and Barrel label for their gin between 1875 and 1885, after which they discontinued the use of that label, and utilised one with the figure of a Cat alone in the centre. Their business in gin was a small one, not exceeding a hundred cases per annum, but it was almost entirely in Glasgow and the surrounding districts.

(5) Messrs R. H. Thomson & Co. of Leith seem to have used the label No. 201 of process between 1873 and 1901. Apparently they also used at the same time a label with an anchor upon it, with no representation of a Cat and Barrel, and this became the one commonly applied shortly after 1886. The trade in gin did not exceed 500 dozen-cases per annum.

(6) The use by Messrs Bernard & Co. of Leith of a label having the device of a Cat and Barrel upon it was somewhat more extensive; and, in addition, Messrs Bernard caused to be printed and distributed 2000 showcards similar to No. 203 of process. They also registered their trade mark, containing the representation of the Cat and Barrel, for "Old Tom" in May 1876, it being stated in their application that they had used it for sixteen months before. They continued to use the label until after Huddart's case, when, at the request of the defenders, they discontinued its use and cancelled their registration.

(7 and 8) For the Valparaiso market two labels were printed for Rodger & Co., and Rodger, Symington & Co., who got the labels designed expressly with a view to a sale of the pursuers' gin. There is evidence that from 1873 large shipments of gin with these labels were made by the pursuers to Valparaiso. The other labels for Weir, Scott & Co. have already been referred to. They were also got up for that firm's use in the sale of gin at Valparaiso.

(9) The evidence of Mr Henry Hughes is to the effect that the stock label No. 253 of process was used by Mr Blake, a wine merchant in Dublin, in October 1868, and has been in use since then.

In addition to deponing to their own use of what may be called for shortness Cat and Barrel labels, many of the witnesses say that they understood that the device was common to the trade, and that they had seen it from time to time on the labels of other persons. Most of them were entirely unaware that the defenders used a similar device on their labels, or that they had registered it as their trade mark. The existence of a stock label, which could be purchased both in Dublin and in Glasgow, with the device of a Cat and Barrel upon it, is a peculiar feature of this case, when regard is had to the long period over which its use is proved to have extended. Taken as a whole, the evidence, I think, amply establishes that prior to 1879 the device of a Cat and Barrel, as applied to "Old Tom" gin, was commonly used in the trade, and the explanation given by a good many of the witnesses of this circumstance is that the name

"Old Tom" suggested the picture of a Tom Cat sitting or standing on or near a barrel of spirits, as an appropriate symbol of the commodity itself.

The defenders have no means of meeting this large body of evidence, or even of seriously criticising it. They say, and I think truly, that they were unaware of the use, which seems to have been so prevalent in Scotland, of the Cat and Barrel label in connection with "Old Tom," and they might well be so, looking to the small trade which they themselves did in Scotland. They say further, and I think with justice, that such use, in order to invalidate their trade mark, must not merely be common use, but must have been substantial and lawful. But the facts already stated are sufficient to shew that the use was substantial, although probably all the traders whom I have enumerated did not together do as large a business in gin as the defenders. As regards the lawfulness of the use, if the defenders had been in a position to prove that prior to (say) 1860 their gin had become known in the market as "Cat and Barrel" gin, it may be that they would have had a case for interdicting all others from thereafter adopting a Cat and Barrel device on labels used on gin bottles. As might be expected, however, the evidence to this effect is meagre in the extreme, and a very strong case indeed would have to be made out in order to shew that a practice that has continued for more than forty years was all the time unlawful. Even where they did discover—as in the case of James Mellor & Sons—that a Cat and Barrel label had been adopted subsequent to their own registration, and were informed by the user that he considered himself entitled to continue its use, they took no steps for a period of nearly twenty years to follow up their challenge. The truth appears to be that the importance of the Cat and Barrel label to the defenders has grown with their increasing business, and that it is only in comparatively recent times that they have ventured to assert their right to a monopoly of these pictorial emblems in connection with the sale of gin. It is worth noticing, as corroborating the account which the witnesses gave of the numerous forms of Cat and Barrel labels, that no attempt seems to have been made to imitate the labels or trade marks of other well-known distillers of London gin; and it would be extremely odd that the defenders—who did a comparatively small business in Scotland, and cannot, therefore, have acquired any wide reputation for their gin—should be the only victims of this supposed imitation of their trade mark.

On the grounds above stated, I should have been prepared to hold that the device of "Cat and Barrel" was common in the trade long prior to the registration by the defenders of their trade mark. But Mr Dickson urged that even on this assumption certain decisions in the English Courts, by which the so-called "three mark" rule has been established, were not binding in Scotland, and ought to be reconsidered, as being contrary to the trade mark statutes. It is unnecessary that I should consider this argument, as the pursuers' counsel stated that he did not press for any rectification of the register provided he obtained decree in terms of his third conclusion—this being the only conclusion in which the pursuers have a direct interest. Moreover, the defenders' registration in respect of all liquors except "Old Tom" gin has not been attacked. Even as regards dry gin, there seem to be no cases (apart from Melrose, Drover & Co. Ltd., who are now out of the field) of persons using a "Cat and Barrel" label in connection with that ommodity except the defenders.

It follows that the pursuers are, in my opinion, entitled to a declarator that the defenders have no exclusive right to the "Cat and Barrel" device in connection with the sale of "Old Tom" gin, and that the pursuers are equally entitled to employ the same. I think that we have here an honest concurrent user of a similar device in different parts of the kingdom by traders who never saw each other's labels, or, if they saw them, had not their notice specially directed to their similarity. It cannot be contended that the fact that the one business has throughout been a large, prosperous, and increasing one in this commodity is to prevent a smaller rival from continuing a use which has extended over an almost equally long period. Nor do I think the element upon which Mr Dickson waxed eloquent—that the defenders' trade mark is considered by them to be of enormous value, while the pursuers do not estimate the value of their "Cat and Barrel" labels in connection with the sale of gin at a £5 note—is of the least materiality in this question of legal right. It might have been an excellent reason for the defenders settling with the pursuers upon generous terms, but is no reason at all for depriving the pursuers of their established rights.

Argued for Reclaimers: On the evidence led at the proof, it was established that reclaimers invented the Cat and Barrel mark; used it exclusively and advertised largely, and stopped infringements whenever brought to their notice. The mark was by the trade identified exclusively with Boords' goods in the early fifties. They did an immense trade, and the Cat and Barrel design of their trade mark had become vocalised—traders and customers ordering their gin as Cat and Barrel gin. Owing to this vocalisation any design with a Cat and Barrel was an infringement of the trade mark. Boords' use was so extensive that attempted infringements had begun and a caution notice was issued to the trade as early as 1856, and since then Boords had stopped all infringements that came under their notice. They registered in 1879. They did not know of the defenders' Cat and Barrel labels until some of these were produced against them at the trial of the action of Boord v. Huddart. They thereupon brought their actoin against the defenders for infringement. The defenders defended the action, and brought a counter-action craving rectification of the register by removing Boords' mark. Their pleadings in the two actions were contradictory. In the infringement action they stated that "Cat and Barrel" was their mark and that their gin was known as "Cat and Barrel gin." In the declarator they said that the Cat and Barrel mark was common to the trade and should therefore be expunged from the register—or alternatively, that they had a concurrent right with Messrs Boord to use the mark. They did not crave to be put on the register, and their declarator of right to concurrent use was incompetent, and not contemplated in the statutes. Further, their averments were not relevant to sustain a claim that they should be put on the register. On the facts, they had failed to prove either that the mark was common or that it was their own mark. No one but Boords had proved a right to use arising from original and independent invention or adoption. The user required to make a mark common must be (a) lawful, (b) substantial, and (c) within the knowledge of the owner of the mark. The users founded on by the Lord Ordinary had none of these qualities. They were all infringements, had all with two exceptions been stopped, and the use of the infringing labels had been insignificant in comparison with the volume of reclaimers' trade. In regard to the respondents' user it was not proved that they used a Cat and Barrel label from 1851, nor did they say that they then invented the mark. They said they adopted a common mark, but they had really seen Boords' and copied it. The probable first date on which they used such a label was 1869, but it must be admitted that for export trade only and to a small extent they had used Cat and Barrel labels for some years prior to reclaimers' registration in 1879. The right in a trade mark is one of property, and apart from registration the evidence shewed that under the old law Boords had by their reputation a property in this mark dating, say, from the early fifties. That would have entitled them to be registered in 1879, even had Thom & Cameron then opposed and pleaded their own and the other users referred to in this action. None of these users except Boords were of right. They were all wrongful, and therefore not lawful. They were merely adoptions or colourable imitations of Boords' mark. These users would not then have been considered sufficient to prevent Boords' being registered, and they were not now sufficient as a defence to Boords' present action, or as a ground for rectification of the register.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

In dealing with a mark which had been so long on the register every presumption must be made in its favour; and the onus was on those attacking it. Documentary evidence of user was of great value in such a case. Boords had ample documentary evidence. The evidence of the respondents as to early years was entirely parole. Most of the labels founded on by the respondents had been used only in export trade, and user outside the United Kingdom would not make a mark common.

The reclaimers were entitled to interdict against all the Cat and Barrel labels which the respondents were using. Some of these (e.g. the Valparaiso labels) were manifestly copies of Boords' label. Others did not so closely resemble Boords' label, but they were all more like it than the label which had been stopped in Boord v. Huddart.

No argument was offered against the competency of the declaratory conclusions as to rectification of register in the Scottish Courts. The reclaimers did not dispute the decision in Dewar's case, 2 F. 249.

Argued for Respondents: The Lord Ordinary's judgment was well founded. The case is different from any in the Books. Admitting that Boords have used their mark for many years, the respondents had used their labels for the same if not a longer time. Thom & Cameron's was a concurrent, independent, and honest user probably since 1851 (which was earlier than Boords' use had been proved), but at any rate for many years before Boords' registration, and Boords' registration did not deprive the respondents of any right they had in their labels. There was no case in which a mark which had been honestly and continuously used (as one or other of the Cat and Barrel labels of the respondents had been used) for a period of nearly fifty years being challenged or stopped after that interval. Every presumption must be made in favour of a mark which had been honestly used for so long. Boords had not the reputation as Cat and Barrel people that their witnesses spoke to, at least not in Scotland. In Scotland at any rate the mark was common to the trade long before Boords registered. The Lord Ordinary was right in holding on the evidence that the mark was common.

The labels Nos. 21, 33 and 39 are Thom & Cameron's labels, and are not infringements or in any way calculated to deceive. They are materially different from Boords' labels. No. 18 was not Thom & Cameron's label, but was Weir Scott's. In all probability it had been copied from one of the stock labels produced, not from Boords' label. There was no date given when the alleged vocalisation of Boords' Cat and Barrel mark took place. Their reputation, if any, was only connected with their own mark, and that gave them no right to stop other Cat and Barrel marks. There was no case of any one being deceived mentioned in the evidence, and if Boords' Scotch trade was as extensive as they said, and there was any confusion between their labels and the other Scotch labels in use, they would have been able to prove cases of mistakes. Boords were guilty of a want of vigilance in regard to the other Cat and Barrel marks which were in daily use, which amounted to acquiescence, and barred them now getting interdict. Boords had no exclusive reputation in the Cat and Barrel, and therefore the honest concurrent user of Thom & Cameron should not be stopped. The respondents do not insist on the conclusion for the removal of Boords' mark from the register, but they maintain that Boords have no exclusive right, that there has been no infringement, and should be no interdict. In any event the interdict should be limited to certain markets where deception might take place. There should be no interdict in the United Kingdom, especially in Glasgow, where the labels had been so long used by the respondents.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

In the action at the instance of Boord & Son the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

". . . . Recal said Interlocutor, Find and Declare and Interdict, Prohibit, and Discharge in terms of the First and Second conclusions of the Summons; quoad ultra, Dismiss the action, and Decern."

In the action at the instance of Thom & Cameron the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defenders.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the firm of Boord & Son in 1904 raised an action against Thom & Cameron Ltd., in which they had declaratory conclusions that they were proprietors of certain trade marks, and also sought interdict against the defenders for infringing the same. The action did not proceed with any great expedition, and within a year Thom & Cameron raised a counter-action against Boord & Son, and the conclusions of that counter-action were for declarator (first) that certain entries in the trade mark register, which were specified and all of which were the property of Boord & Son, were made on the register without sufficient cause, and that the same ought to be expunged therefrom accordingly. There was also a second conclusion that the said trade marks were incapable of registration and illegal, and a third alternative conclusion that it ought to be found and declared that the defenders had no exclusive right to use the same in connection with the sale of "Old Tom" gin and unsweetened gin, and a long list of other spirits. Now these two actions depended before the Lord Ordinary and they were not conjoined, but the actions were taken together, and what the Lord Ordinary has done is this. In the second action—I mean second in point of time, that is, the action by Thom & Cameron against Boord & Son—the Lord Ordinary finds and declares that the defenders have no exclusive right to use the sign, figure or device of a "Cat" or of a "Cat and Barrel," on labels, advertisements, or otherwise. In other words, the Lord Ordinary grants declarator in terms of the third alternative conclusion; and then his Lordship proceeds, "finds it unnecessary to deal with the other conclusions of the action, and dismisses the same." And having come to that conclusion in that action, he naturally in the other action, at the instance of Boord & Son against Thom & Cameron, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action in so far as they relate to "Old Tom" gin. It is from these interlocutors that the present reclaiming notes are taken.

His Lordship has gone very carefully into the matter, and his opinion is embodied in one long note. He has written only one note in the two actions, and has written it in the action which he has made the leading action of the two, namely, the action of Thom & Cameron v. Boord & Son. Now, my Lords, I am bound to say, first of all, that I am not quite satisfied with the technical way in which the matter has been disposed of, and that not merely by way of technical criticism, for I think it goes somewhat deeply into the questions which are raised in these cases. I will make my meaning clear, I think, by first of all trying to consider what are the defences available to persons who, like Thom & Cameron, have been attacked. (I explain first that the Lord Ordinary, having taken the action of Thom & Cameron v. Boord as the leading action, calls Thom & Cameron the pursuers, and Boord & Son the defenders. I prefer, however, to deal with it the other way, because the matter is begun by Boord & Son, who are the undoubted proprietors of certain trade marks, objecting to infringement; and therefore in my judgment I shall use the term pursuers as applied to Boord & Son, and defenders as applied to Thom & Cameron.) I proceed therefore to ask myself—when the pursuer, who is the registered proprietor of a trade mark comes into Court and complains that his trade-mark is being infringed by someone else, what are the defences that are competent to a person so attacked? Of course there is an obvious defence that he does not infringe, because he does not use a trade mark resembling in any way the trade mark of the pursuers. I need not pause for a moment on that one, because it is perfectly simple on the statement of it. But there are other defences competent, and in order to see what they are one must first of all see what is the right a person has as the registered owner of a trade mark.

I need scarcely remind your Lordships that the law of trade mark is, in one sense, partly common law and partly statutory, but is, in another sense, purely statutory. That is to say, that the rights which follow from registration are purely statutory. Previous to the Trade Mark Acts altogether there was a right in a trade mark—a right which originally depended entirely upon the proposition, or on the view, that no man was entitled to pass his goods off as another man's, and that, accordingly, if one man had sold his goods in association with a certain mark for such a time as to make the public when they saw the mark think the goods were his goods, another person might be interdicted or prevented from using the same mark because that had a tendency to deceive. I need scarcely remind your Lordships that what in the initial stages depended solely on this view, and the idea of a mala mens that you associate with this view, came in the development of the law, especially after the well-known case of Millington v. Fox (1838, 3 My. and Cr. 338), decided by Lord Cottenham, to depend on a real right of property in the trade mark. All that was, I will not say altogether altered, but to a great extent altered by the Trade Mark Acts, and when the Trade Mark Acts were passed several new consequences happened. In the first place, the property in the trade mark was absolutely recognised by these Acts. In the second place, you could get property in a trade mark without use by the mere registration of a mark which had not been registered before, but subject of course to certain statutory restrictions as to the class of thing that could or could not be registered as a trade mark. Into all the particulars of that I need not enter, but one point must be alluded to. The original Act, I need scarcely remind your Lordships, has been amended more than once, and as recently as 1905 an Act was passed which alters what is the law, and, on the subject I am going to speak of, very much alters it; but I need not go into that matter, because the present case before us has to be decided on the law as it then stood, and the law as it then stood was the 1883 Act as amended by the 1888 Act. Now in the 1883 Act there is a division of the Act which is headed "Effect of Registration," and section 76 of that Act is in these terms: "The registration of a person as proprietor of a trade mark shall be prima facie evidence of his right to the exclusive use of the trade mark, and shall, after the expiration of five years from the date of the registration, be conclusive evidence of his right to the exclusive use of the trade mark, subject to the provisions of this Act." Now, if it had not been for the words, "subject to the provisions of this Act," it would have been possible to argue, though I do not say it could have been successfully argued, that the terms of the section are absolute, and that the terms are such that, if a person found himself left upon the register as owner of a trade mark for five years, he would then have an exclusive right to that trade mark and could prevent anybody else from using it, no matter what, so to speak, the past history of it might have been. But then there were those words, "subject to the provisions of this Act." Now there are provisions in the Act, not only for making the register, but also for altering the register, and the section of the Act that deals with that is section 90, which is this: "The Court may, on the application of any person aggrieved by the omission, without sufficient cause, of the name of any person from any register kept under this Act, or by an entry made without sufficient cause in any such register, make such order for making, expunging, or varying the entry, as the Court thinks fit"; and in any proceeding under this section they may decide any question which it may be expedient to decide for the rectification of the register.

Now, it was very early decided, and decided very authoritatively, by a well-known leading case — the case of The Apollinaris Company L.R. [1891], 2 Ch. 186, — that a person who was said to be an alleged infringer was in the sense of the statute aggrieved, that is, if he choose to say so; in other words, it was settled, and I think it is absolutely settled law, that a person who is proceeded against for infringement is entitled to say "Apart from infringement, I say your trade mark ought never to have been on the register, and I will have the register amended and take it off." Its presence on the register is the condition precedent for raising an action for infringement, and it follows that if the complainer's trade mark ought never to have been on the register, then there is an end of an action for interdict or infringement. All that was held in the Apollinaris case. The next step was, that it was held that being five years on the register was no bar to removal. Your Lordships observe there was no limitation of time in section 90 for expunging entries from the register. It is simply "the Court may, on the application of any person aggrieved." Accordingly, it was held that though there was limitation of time in section 76 to the effect that entry in the register should be conclusive evidence, at the end of five years, of the right to the trade mark, yet the words "subject to the provisions of this Act," let in section 90, and so might control, if it was in operation, section 76. In other words, therefore, the defence open to an alleged infringer of saying that the trade mark ought never to have been on the register was open after five years.

Now, there is a whole set of cases dealing with this which I need not quote. They vary, because the reasons why the trade mark ought not to have been on the register may vary; but we can take one as an example. A trade mark ought not to be there, for instance, if it is not a registrable mark. It ought not to be there also if no one can appropriate it, and therefore I take that illustration to see what we are coming to in this case. The case of La Minerva Habana (In re Lloyd & Sons' Trade Mark, Lloyd v. Bottomley, 27 Ch. D. 646) was a case where a mark was removed after five years at the instance of a person who was being attacked, and the ground for removal of the mark was that it ought never to have been on the register, because it was common property, and that no one could appropriate it. It may be as well to digress and explain what common property means. When this register was first introduced it was obvious that among people who would apply to be registered would be not only those who, for the first time, had invented what was apparently a new trade mark, and therefore proposed to get the priority of others by its registration, but also persons who sought to put on the register what they had already been using. There were, of course, many instances where more than one person had been using the same trade mark, and accordingly that question very early came up. The Act evidently contemplated something of the sort, for in the section dealing with applications for registration it expresses itself thus—I am reading from section 71: "Where each of several persons claims to be registered as proprietor of the same trade mark, the Comptroller may refuse to register any of them until their rights have been determined according to law, and the Comptroller may himself submit, or require the claimants to submit, their rights to the Court." Now, the meaning of that section is, I think, clear in itself. Of course, if one person wanted to register a trade mark who had been using it, and another person came and said, "I want to register it as well, but I have not been using it," that would be a clear case—it would show that there was a right in the one and not in the other. But in the case which I have mentioned, where more than one had in the past been using a trade mark, there were rules settled by decisions to this effect, that up to the number of three there would be registration of persons who had bona fide used the same mark, but if more than three applied and said they had used the mark, then the mark was really such common property in the trade that it was not registrable at all. The import of all this is, I think, that the true meaning of a trade mark is the association of the mark with one person's goods. If you show that a large number of people have all been using the same mark, then it becomes a practical impossibility to say that the mark was associated with any one person's goods. And, accordingly, I think the matter is well settled that the registration of a mark, an old mark, may be given to persons not exceeding the number of three, but that if more than three are shown to have used it, it is common property, and cannot be registered at all.

I have now got so far that that is one defence that an alleged infringer may make. He may say, "Notwithstanding that five years have passed, I propose to show that the mark ought never to have been on the register at all." But there is another defence which he may make. Without saying that a mark is common property, and that therefore the complainers ought not to have been registered as the owners of it, he may say, "I, myself, would have been entitled to be put on the register; it is quite true I have not applied, but I make the application now, and, of course, if I am entitled to be on the register for the mark, there is no infringement, for I am not using any mark but my own." That distinction was early taken, and I think it entered into the law of the decision of several cases, but I will refer merely to the admirable decision, if I may say so, of Mr Justice Stirling in Jackson v. Napper, 1886, L.R. 35 Ch. D. 162.

Now, your Lordships will see that these two defences, although in one sense different, are yet technically the same. They both rest on this, that the register as it is, is wrong, and that it ought to be corrected. In one case the correction is by striking out the complainer's registration, and in the other case the correction is by putting on a mark as belonging to the alleged infringer. Accordingly, in England I think it is perfectly well settled that, if the infringer is gone against by the registered proprietor of a trade mark who has had his trade mark on the register for more than five years, the infringer cannot be heard to say anything on these matters unless he makes an application to rectify the register, and he cannot make that by way of defence to an action. That has been settled a good many times, but particularly in the case of Pinto v. Badman, 8 R.P.C. 181. I take it further that, if the defence which is made here had been made in England, it would not have been listened to, unless Thom & Cameron had at the same time made an application either to rectify the register by striking out Boord & Son, or to rectify it by inserting Thom & Cameron as proprietors of the same trade mark. Now, technically speaking, I do not think that that is exactly the same in Scotland, because there is a decision of this Division which is binding, and I do not intend to suggest for a moment that I have any wish to go back on it at all. I refer to the case of Dewar v. Dewar, 2 F. 249. That was an action raised by one Dewar against another Dewar, they both being in the whisky trade, concluding for declarator (1) that the defender's trade mark "Dewar's Whisky" had been entered on the register without sufficient cause and should be expunged; (2) that it was incapable of registration; and (3) that the defenders had no right to the exclusive use of the words "Dewar's Whisky" as a trade mark, and for reduction of the entry in the register of trade marks. The defender pleaded "No jurisdiction." Well, I do not think that that phrase is very correctly used there. They did not plead "No jurisdiction" in the ordinary sense of the word, because they were a Scottish limited company. There was no question about their being subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. I think their true plea there was not "No jurisdiction"—as stated in the rubric—but "incompetency." What they argued was that the Court could not give the declarator that was asked for because the application was in substance for a rectification of the register, and the condition of the law in England was pointed to, and it was said that the only person who could alter the register was the person who had charge of the register, in other words, the registrar in England, who was subject to the English Court; and therefore if they wanted to get rid of this erroneous entry—as they said it was—they must go to England and present a petition and get it done there. They said that that could not be done in Scotland. That plea was repelled, and I think rightly repelled; and at any rate the judgment is binding. It was held there that the rights of the Scottish Court were defined by section 111 of the Act, and section 111 is in these terms: "The provisions of this Act conferring a special jurisdiction on the Court"—and the Court as defined by the Act was of course the English Court—"shall not, except so far as the jurisdiction extends, affect the jurisdiction of any Court in Scotland or Ireland in any proceedings relating to patents or to designs or to trade marks." And then it defines what it means by the Court in Scotland, which is the Court of Session; and then it goes on: "If any rectification of a register under this Act is required in pursuance of any proceeding in a Court in Scotland or Ireland, a copy of the order, decree, or other authority for the rectification shall be served on the Comptroller, and he shall rectify the register accordingly." And accordingly this Court held that, inasmuch as this was a question of right in a trade mark, they were perfectly entitled to pronounce a declaratory finding on that matter; and that if they did so, and if the result of their finding was such that the trade mark ought never to have entered the register, then the second subsection of section 111 would come into play, and the Comptroller would be bound to alter the register in accordance with the decree that was made by the Scottish Court.

Now that, I take it, is good law, and was rightly decided, and that of course disposed of the plea that had been raised. It was not raised in this case, but it was in the one referred to—that, technically speaking, these matters could not be raised in the Scottish Court at all. But it seems to me quite clear that it leaves the underlying ratio of the matter precisely as it is in England. That is to say, it does not seem to me that you can raise this defence here, any more than you can in England, unless you make rectification the positive crave. In Dewar's case it was made the positive crave, because an order was asked from this Court in one of the conclusions of the summons that the mark ought to be expunged. That also is done here in the action of Thom & Cameron against Boord, and I am quite clear that the matter is perfectly properly raised, in so far as declarator is asked that the mark should be expunged on the ground that it ought never to have been on the register because it was common property. But I am bound to say that I do not think the other defence is properly raised—a defence which your Lordships will observe is per se inconsistent with the first defence—namely, that the trade mark is not common property, but that Thom & Cameron have as good a right to it as Boord & Son. The two defences are inconsistent. I do not mean that inconsistent defences cannot ever be pleaded, because there are cases in which defenders can plead inconsistent defences. But these defences are inconsistent in the underlying substratum of fact, because, of course, it is perfectly clear that if such and such a mark was such common property that it could not be registered by B, that is equally destructive of its capacity to be registered by C. Therefore the main defence that the pursuers ought never to have put it on the register because it was common property, is one defence. But that Thom & Cameron were themselves entitled to put it on the register is quite another defence. I find record for the one, but not for the other, and I do not see how you can contend, without a record to support your contention, that you are entitled to be put on the register as proprietor of a trade mark.

Now I come, after this somewhat long preamble, to the criticism which, as I think, runs rather deep into the Lord Ordinary's judgment. The Lord Ordinary has not given declarator on the conclusion which I think perfectly well raised against Boord & Son, namely, the conclusion that Boords' mark ought to be expunged from the register, but has given declarator in these words, that Boord & Son have no exclusive right to use the sign of a "Cat" or of a "Cat and Barrel" in labels, advertisements, or otherwise in connection with the sale of "Old Tom" gin. Now I point out at once that the finding that Boord have no exclusive right to the "Cat and Barrel" or the "Cat" may rest on one or other of two propositions. It may rest on the proposition that Boord's mark ought never to have been on the register, and so, not being his property, he cannot go against anybody else for using it; or it may rest on the view that, although his mark is there, he cannot say he has exclusive right to it, because Thom & Cameron have right equally with him. Therefore my first observation on the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that it does not shew which one of these pleadings in the inconsistent defence is given effect to. I apprehend that, inasmuch as there is record for one and not for the other, he has given effect to the first, and I would have concluded that that was perfectly clear had it not been for the way in which his Lordship, after reviewing the evidence, brings in his argument. I am not going through the long note; but summarising it very briefly, the skeleton of the Lord Ordinary's note is this—Boord & Son have led abundant evidence to establish their long use of this mark, and that their goods have gained a reputation which is associated with the "Cat and Barrel" mark. Indeed the Lord Ordinary says that the prima facie case in favour of Boord's claim is formidable. I only pause to say that though no doubt it was necessary for Boord to lead this evidence so far as being on the question of infringement, yet so far as title is concerned I do not think it is necessary to look beyond anything but the fact that they have been on the register for five years. The Lord Ordinary goes on to say that there was sufficient evidence to establish a substantial use of this mark by other people in the trade than Boord & Son. Then he proceeds on page 9 to say (and it is this that makes me doubtful what he really founds on): "On the grounds above stated, I should have been prepared to hold that the device of 'Cat and Barrel' was common in the trade long prior to the registration by the defenders of their trademark." Then he refers to the argument about the "three-mark" rule, which does not matter, and then he says—"It is unnecessary that I should consider this argument, as the pursuers' counsel stated that he did not press for any rectification of the register provided he obtained decree in terms of his third conclusion—this being the only conclusion in which the pursuers have a direct interest. . . . It follows that the pursuers are, in my opinion, entitled to a declarator that the defenders have no exclusive right to the 'Cat and Barrel' device in connection with the sale of 'Old Tom' gin, and that the pursuers are equally entitled to employ the same." Now, with great deference to his Lordship, I do think that that phrase is a non-sequitur. If he had said—I am prepared to hold that the device of "Cat and Barrel" was common in the trade long prior to the registration by Boord & Son of their trade mark, and had gone on to find that it ought to be expunged from the register, that would be a good conclusion, namely, that the trade mark ought never to have been registered because it was common in the trade. But when his Lordship says—"I do not consider it necessary to affirm one way or the other whether the 'Cat and Barrel' was common in the trade," and goes on to say, "In my opinion, he has no exclusive right to the device," that would, strictly taken, be an affirmation of the other defence, for which, as I have said, there is no record, and with which in his note on the evidence the Lord Ordinary has not dealt. Accordingly, on the terms of his judgment, I come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary has left me in doubt as to whether he really proceeds on the device being not registrable as being common in the trade, or whether he proceeds on the fact that he thinks that Thom & Cameron had also a right to that device.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

The Lord President.

But assuming, as I am rather inclined to do, that it is on the first that he has proceeded, I think the declarator he has given is not the proper declarator in the circumstances. I should not have made so much of this if it had been a mere technical criticism on the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but I think it goes very deep into the matter, for in my opinion the only question properly raised in these pleadings is the first, and not the second. I think that there is evidence enough to dispose of the second adversely to Thom & Cameron as well as of the first, but still there is no pleading that entitles Thom & Cameron to a defence on the second. Of course the best test to take is to examine the pleas. Now, in Boords' action, that is to say where the attack comes in, what are the pleas in law for the defenders? They first of all say in their averments that the "Cat and Barrel" has been used by a great many people; and then in their pleas, after the usual plea of irrelevancy, they simply put as plea 2—"The pursuers not having an exclusive right to the 'Cat and Barrel' brand, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced"; and as plea 3—"In respect that the defenders have not infringed the pursuers' trade marks, they should be assoilzied." That, I think, can only be taken with what they say before—that these marks were well known in many other places, and in particular must be taken with this—that nowhere is there intimation that they propose to have themselves put on the register. In short, I do not see how they can have a relevant defence founded on the fact that they have a right to these marks when they say they have been used as well by all these other persons. In regard to the Thom & Cameron action against Boord, the pleas there necessarily cannot touch that point, for none of the conclusions touch it. The conclusions are only pleadable to taking a party off the register; and though there is one that Boord & Son have no exclusive right, yet there is no explanation of it in that case either by any intimation that Thom & Cameron themselves want to go on the register.

1ST DIV.

Boord & Son v. Thom & Cameron Ltd.

The Lord President.

The leading and therefore the proper question in this case is—Ought the pursuers' label to be expunged from the register as being common property? Now I think the determination to which you would come in such a matter must vastly depend on what criticism you apply to the evidence. My Lords, I think it is very necessary to keep this firmly in view—that what we are doing in this case is something very different from what one does in examining the evidence in a case, say, as to anticipation of a patent. If the right to a trade mark was constituted by the fact that it was, so to speak, an invention, then it is quite clear that as soon as it was proved that the trade mark had been used by anybody, however little the use was, but still had been used at a period prior to that when it was first possible to register it, that would be sufficient to put out of the way the claim to exclusive right of a person who had got registered for it. But that is not the nature of the right to a registered trade mark. I again remind your Lordships that the idea of right to a mark by putting it on the register—that is to say, right by registration itself, and nothing more—was an entirely new idea under the Acts; and there never could be any question as to competition in that matter, unless you suppose such a state of things as two people coming up at the same time and presenting themselves hand-in-hand with applications for registration of the same mark. But you can put out of view that fantastic case. Now, what we find here is Boord coming forward and entering the "Cat and Barrel," but nobody else coming forward. Then, if it were a new mark, there could have been no question. But it was not a new mark—it was an old one; and therefore you have to consider the question of whether the mark was common property, and in doing so you must consider what you mean by property in a mark in the state of facts antecedent to the registration.

Now, property in a mark does not mean a few isolated sales under that mark, but it means, as I take it, that you had sold so much goods under it that the mark had come, in a certain market, to be associated with your goods. And it is just because I think the Lord Ordinary has, to my mind, not taken that sufficiently into view, that I come, on the whole matter, to a conclusion different from him. I do not think the evidence led in this case is evidence such as to enable us to affirm as a proposition that the mark was common property, and so ought not to have been registered. And I must say this, that though mere lapse of time, as I before said, is not in itself a bar, yet if a mark is allowed to be on the register all the time that this has been, it is not too much to say that the onus is on the other person to shew that it never ought to have been there. The Lord Ordinary has gone through the evidence in his note as to the cases which he thinks shew general use of the mark. Passing over for the moment the evidence as to Thom & Cameron themselves, he first deals with James Mackenzie. Well, James Mackenzie's firm has abandoned the use of the mark as of right. One of the partners describes their trade in gin as being infinitesimal. The label was only made in 1883, and the older trade was nearly all export, and very little in Scotland. The next case is Stewart, Pott & Co. In later years, at any rate, all the gin they got was Boords' gin. Wright & Greig say their trade was only a small trade. Thomsons of Leith was in the same position—very small in amount. Messrs Bernard gave up the label as soon as they were appealed to, and would not fight the matter at law, and disclaimed it. The Valparaiso case, I am bound to say, left on my mind the opinion that that was a definite attempt by a firm in Valparaiso to try to mimic Boords' label in order to pass of other gin as Boords'. And Hughes' was a very small trade. Now, as far as the use by Thom & Cameron themselves is concerned, there is a great deal of difficulty, I think, about the date. It is very variously stated, and there is almost no evidence of any home trade at all. My Lords, I do not go into these matters in detail, because it would only be reading evidence for hours. I will just say that, taking the matter as a jury would, it seems to me that none of these people have really proved anything more than a very sporadic use of the labels with a Cat and Barrel on them, and that by none of them is there really any trade proved that would associate their goods with a Cat and Barrel. It is not unworthy of remark that, in their defences as originally stated in answer 3, the defenders proposed to prove that they had for many years sold gin with labels which bore as a distinctive feature a representation of a Cat and Barrel; and that in consequence thereof the gin sold by them had for many years been known in the market as the "Cat" brand, or the "Cat and Barrel" brand. They have not even attempted to prove that, and of course it is dead in the teeth of what one of the defenders himself says, that there is really not a £5 note in the worth of the labels as far as he is concerned. On the whole matter I think the evidence falls far short of what would be necessary to displace Boord & Son from the register as owners of the "Cat and Barrel" mark which has been associated for so long with their gin, and accordingly I have come to a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary.

The question still remains as to what is to be done. Of course in the action Thom & Cameron v. Boord it is simple enough; in that action there will be absolvitor. But as regards the other, Boords' action, various things are asked. The first is declarator in general terms, which is nothing, because that is merely saying that they are proprietors of their own trade mark. Then, second, there is an interdict—that Thom & Cameron be interdicted against using the designs said to infringe the pursuers' trade marks. Now in article 6 of the Condescendence there are four labels specified as infringing, and these four labels are numbered 21, 18, 39, 33 on their card. 21 is very obviously like. Next to it is 18, and that also is like. 39 is not quite so obvious: that is the "Cat" sitting on the top of the barrel; not on the flat end, but on the round. 33 also is a "Cat" on the top of a barrel, with a glass and a bottle. Now these two labels are certainly not so obviously like. But, my Lords, it seems to me that it is there that you get the benefit of the evidence which has been led by Boord & Son, and I think that the evidence is strong enough as shewing such association in the trade of the "Cat and Barrel" with Boords' gin that one must not be too nice about this matter, and I think these are practical infringements of the trade mark. I come to that conclusion all the easier, for I am fortified in my opinion with regard to these labels by the result at which Mr Justice Swinfen Eady came in the action tried before him. The labels which were held to be infringements in that action are not nearly so near to Boords' label as either of these two with which I am now dealing. Accordingly, I think that Messrs Boord are entitled to interdict in terms of that conclusion. Then there is the third conclusion for interdict against selling or passing off or attempting to pass off their manufactures as Boords' manufactures. I do not think there is any proof of that. That would be a fraudulent proceeding on the part of Thom & Cameron, which I do not think they have been guilty of, and it would not be right to stigmatise them by an interdict against a proceeding which they have never contemplated. Therefore I do not think decree ought to be granted on that conclusion. In regard to the conclusion for delivering up papers, I think that is not one the pursuers insisted upon.

My opinion, therefore, is that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that in the one case there should be decree of absolvitor, and in the other case there should be decree in the terms of the first and second conclusions.

Lord M'Laren.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

Lord Kinnear.—I also agree with your Lordships on all the points.

Diligence—Poinding—Poinding by Landlord for Rent—Receipt of Cheque for Rent Due Before Goods Inventoried—Effect on Diligence — Suspension and Interdict—Expenses.

This was an action of suspension and interdict by the Caithness Flagstone Co. Ltd. against Captain William Murray Threipland of Fingask and Toftingall, by which it was sought to interdict the respondent from following up a poinding of the complainers' goods commenced by him in respect of the half year's rent due at Martinmas 1906 by the complainers as tenants, to the respondent as landlord, for certain quarries on his lands.

The material facts, arguments and authorities, are all set forth in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, from which it appears that the question was one of expenses, depending on whether or not the receipt of a cheque for the rent suspended the respondent's right to proceed with the diligence he had commenced.

Outer House. Lord Guthrie.

Caithness Flagstone Co. v. Threipland.

The Lord Ordinary found the complainers liable to the respondent in expenses.

Lord Guthrie.—This suspension was brought to stop the further progress of a poinding, in which the goods poinded had already been inventoried. Parties are agreed that it is now unnecessary that I should pronounce any order on the prayer of the note, and they have asked me to decide the question of expenses on the pleadings and correspondence.

In considering what the true question between the parties is, the following dates must be kept in view:—

1906. 11th November. Rent of quarries in Caithness due under lease by the complainers to the respondent.

1907. 30th April. Charge given by respondent for payment of said rent.

,, 6th May, Monday. Officer started from Edinburgh at 4 a.m. to inventory goods at quarry next day.

,, 6th May. Cheque on the Bank of Scotland, Thurso, for said rent handed to respondent's Edinburgh agents at mid-day, and receipt granted.

,, 6th May. Charge expired at midnight.

,, 7th May. Poinding executed and inventory taken in morning.

,, 9th May. Suspension raised. Order for answers within eight days, and interim interdict granted.

,, 13th May. Respondent's Edinburgh agents informed that cheque met.

In these circumstances, the complainers say that the rent was paid before the expiry of the charge, which did not expire till midnight of the same day; that the respondent was not entitled to execute the poinding by inventorying on the 7th May; and that they were justified in bringing the suspension on 9th May. The respondent answers that his receipt of the complainers' Thurso cheque on 6th May did not operate as payment to interfere with his following out his diligence by inventorying at the quarries on 7th May, and that, even if the receipt of the cheque would have prevented his proceeding to sell, he did nothing thereafter, by threatening to sell or otherwise, to warrant the complainers' application to the Court on 9th May.

In the complainers' 4th statement it is said, "By the respondent's acceptance of said payment of the rent charged for and interest, the said charge fell." The complainers' counsel admitted that the charge did not fall; he maintained that its operation was suspended till it was seen whether the complainers' cheque was honoured by the bank, and that, until that appeared, the respondent was not entitled even to inventory under his diligence.

There is no dispute about the effect of the cheque given by the complainers. It was an order on the bank at Thurso to pay the respondent when the cheque was presented, which order was necessarily contingent on the complainers having either sufficient free cash in the bank, or sufficient credit with the bank to cover the amount. It was therefore a conditional payment, involving a certain amount of delay before the condition could be purified. The payment was conditional as truly, although the condition was not so serious, as if the course of post had been weeks instead of days, or as if the document had not been a cheque payable at sight but a promissory note, or a bill, payable at a certain time after date or sight.

The true question, therefore, is, Was the respondent not entitled at least to take such steps in the way of inventorying as might be necessary to make his diligence immediately effectual in the event of the cheque not being met, and an order for sale becoming necessary? It is admitted that, before the receipt of the cheque, at mid-day, on Monday, 6th May, the respondent was entitled to dispatch the officer early that morning to inventory at the quarries next day. I am of opinion that the receipt of the cheque did not lay on the respondent any obligation either to stop the officer by telegram in the course of his journey to Thurso, or to wire or write him not to proceed with taking the inventory.

I heard an elaborate argument, with a full citation of English authorities, on two questions —first, whether, in the ordinary case, the receipt of a cheque or promissory note or bill suspends diligence till the document has been duly presented and refused; and, second, whether, supposing that to be the ordinary rule, there is not an exception in such a case as the present, namely, a claim for rent, to which a higher right of recovery attaches than in an ordinary debt. The first rule is stated in Byles on Bills (16th edition) 24, 316; and Chitty on Contracts (14th edition) 628; and the leading cases are Pearce v. Davis, 1834, 1 Moody and Robinson 365; Carmarthen Railway Co., 1873, L.R. 8 C.P. 685; Cohen v. Hale, 1878, 3 Q.B.D. 371, per Cockburn 373; In re Palmer, 1881, 19 Ch. D. 409, per Brett 417. In none of these cases was the point made matter of express decision, and the proposition, as stated in some of the obiter dicta, would seem to require extensive qualification. The second point is dealt with in Byles on Bills at page 374, Leake on Contracts 634, Addison on Contracts 712, and Chalmers on Bills 311; and the leading cases are Davis v. Gyde, 1835, 2 A.

& E. 623; and Belshaw v. Bush, 1851, 11 C.B. 191, per Maule, J., 206.

The Scotch Courts have not had occasion to consider either the alleged general rule or the alleged qualification. It is, of course, clear that a debt cannot be extinguished and that a diligence cannot fall by a conditional payment. It may yet require to be determined whether a conditional payment suspends diligence to any extent. Meantime, the question before me does not relate to a threat of ultimate diligence, but only to a complaint of a step which it was important for the creditor to take at the time, in view of the possibility of the condition not being purified. I decide that question in the respondent's favour, and therefore hold him entitled to expenses. The complainers ask for suspension against the sale of their goods on the ground that, the respondent having proceeded illegally to inventory, they presume that he means to go on to sell. I hold that his inventorying was not illegal, and I see no evidence of his meaning to go on to sell before ascertaining whether the cheque would be honoured.—6*th August* 1907.

138. Findlay v. Walker.

Justiciary Cases — Complaint — Specification—Penalty—Common Law Offence—Necessity for Specification of Penalty for Common Law Offences Under General Police Act—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sect. 490.

Bill of Suspension.

David Findlay, potato merchant, 3 Hamilton Street, Paisley, was charged in the Police Court at Paisley on a summary complaint at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor. The complaint, which was headed "Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887," set forth—

That the accused, time and place libelled, "did assault William Keter, farmer, residing at Bogside Farm, Moorpark, Renfrew, by striking him a severe blow on the face with his fist, whereby his left lower eyelid was severely cut to the effusion of blood, and to the hurt and injury of his person: And the said David Findlay has been previously convicted of the crime of assault in your Honours' Court at Paisley on 4th October 1904.

"May it therefore please your Honours to grant warrant to cite the said David Findlay to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict him of the said crime, and to adjudge him to suffer the pains of law." High Court of Justiciary — Findlay v. Walker.

Findlay pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led, he was convicted. The conviction and sentence was in the following terms:—

"At Paisley, the 2nd day of April 1907.—The Magistrate, in respect of the evidence adduced, finds the said David Findlay guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged, and therefore fines and amerciates him in the sum of £10, payable to the Clerk of Court; and in default of immediate payment thereof, decerns and adjudges the said David Findlay to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days, unless the said sum shall be sooner paid; further, ordains the said David Findlay to find sufficient caution acted in the books of Court for good behaviour for the period of six months from and after the date of payment of said fine, or of the expiration of said period of imprisonment, under a penalty of £20, and in default of said caution being found, sentences and adjudges the said David Findlay to be imprisoned for the further space of thirty days from the date of the payment of said fine or the expiration of the term of imprisonment for non-payment thereof, and thereafter to be set at liberty; and for that purpose grants warrant to officers of law to convey the said David Findlay to the prison of Glasgow, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law."

Findlay presented a Bill of Suspension, in which he stated:—

"4. The said complaint was brought under only the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, and not under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892. Under the said Summary Jurisdiction and Criminal Procedure Acts, and at common law, the said sentence was excessive, and ultra vires. The presiding magistrate was not entitled to fine the complainer in a greater sum than £5, nor was he entitled to ordain the complainer to find caution for his good behaviour, as above mentioned. The said conviction and sentence is accordingly irregular, incompetent, and invalid. The complainer had no notice of nor was he aware of the terms of section 490 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892.

"5. Further, and in any event, the complainer is innocent of the crime charged, and the blow struck by him was justifiable, and was struck in self-defence. In convicting and sentencing the complainer as aforesaid, the presiding magistrate disregarded the evidence and acted nimiously, oppressively, and illegally."

The Complainer pleaded—

"The said conviction and sentence being nimious and oppressive, and being incompetent and illegal, ought to be suspended, with expenses, in respect—

"(1) That there was absolutely no evidence justifying the conviction;

"(2) That the sentence was unwarranted both at common law and under the Summary

High Court of Justiciary

Findlay v. Walker.

Jurisdiction Acts libelled, and that no notice was given of sect. 490 of the said Burgh Police Act; and

"(3) That the penalty imposed was in excess of that authorised by the statutes under the provisions of which the complaint proceeded."

The Burgh Prosecutor lodged answers in which he stated:—

"4. The statutes mentioned are referred to. Explained that the Court was constituted, and the presiding Magistrate acted under the powers conferred by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892. Although the complainer had been previously convicted of assault, and the offence of which he was found guilty was an aggravated one, the presiding Magistrate did not wish to send the complainer to prison, but he expressed the opinion that an exemplary sentence was, in the circumstances, necessary. The said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, and in particular sect. 490 thereof, under which said Magistrate acted, authorises the penalties imposed. Quoad ultra denied.

"5. Denied."

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), enacts:—

"Sect. 29. Where by any Act of Parliament a power is or shall be given to any sheriff, justices or justice or magistrate in the exercise of jurisdiction as a judge of police to take cognisance of offences punishable by fine or imprisonment, without any declaration being expressed or implied by the powers of such judge of police in relation to the punishment of such offences, it shall be lawful for such sheriff, justices or justice or magistrate, convicting for an offence of which he or they may lawfully take cognisance, to sentence the person convicted to pay a penalty not exceeding five pounds, or, in the discretion of the judge, to sentence him to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding sixty days from the date of imprisonment, and also to adjudge him to find caution to keep the peace for six months under a further penalty of ten pounds; and in default of such caution being found, to be imprisoned for a further period not exceeding thirty days."

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55) enacts:—

Sect. 490. "The magistrate may either sentence the accused on conviction for common law crimes or offences to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding two months, or he may impose a fine not exceeding ten pounds, and failing payment thereof award imprisonment not exceeding the respective periods after specified; and in lieu of or in addition to either of these modes of punishment, he may order the accused to find security for good behaviour for any period not exceeding six months and under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; and failing the finding of such security he may award imprisonment or additional imprisonment not exceeding the respective periods after specified, but in no case shall the total imprisonment exceed sixty days except as hereinafter provided."

Sect. 516. "If it should be found convenient in any prosecution under this Act or any special statute, any of the provisions or forms of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or the provisions or forms of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887 may be used."

Argued for the Complainer: The prosecutor here had elected, as he competently might—(Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, sect. 516)—to proceed under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act 1887, and not under the Burgh Police Act 1892. The Burgh Police Act 1892 was not mentioned in the complaint; consequently it was incompetent for the magistrate to impose a penalty of £10, although such a penalty would have been competent had the complaint been a complaint under the Act of 1892. As it was, the sentence was ultra vires, £5 being the maximum penalty competent under sect. 29 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1864 (Reid v. Miller, 13th July 1889, 7 S.L.T. 120, 3 Adam 29).

Argued for the Respondent: The offence here charged was a common law offence. That being so, it was unnecessary that the complaint should specify the penalties. Nor was it necessary that the Burgh Police Act of 1892 should be specified in the complaint, for that was the general Police Act upon which the whole jurisdiction of the magistrate depended. Reid v. Miller was a case of a statutory offence.

The Court refused the bill.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This suspension is brought (1) on a ground which this Court cannot possibly entertain, viz., that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction. But (2) it is brought on the ground that the sentence was not warranted by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts on which the complaint bore to proceed. It is not denied by the accused that the sentence actually imposed—a fine of £10, followed by an order to find security for good behaviour for a period of six months—was fully warranted by sect. 490 of the Burgh Police Act in the case of a conviction, as this was, for a crime at common law. But it is said that the Burgh Police Act was not mentioned in the complaint, and that the only statutes which were mentioned in the heading of the complaint were the Summary Jurisdiction Acts 1864 and 1881 and the Criminal Procedure Act 1887. Moreover, it is said that the accused had no notice, nor was he aware, of the terms of sect. 490 of the Act of 1892. I think it did not matter whether he had notice of it or not, and that he was bound to know the law as to the punishment which could be inflicted, although, of course, that could never apply to any section that creates a statutory offence, as to which distinct notice must always be given in the body of the complaint so that an accused person may know what he is being charged with. But a mere enlargement of the magistrate's powers with regard to sentence for a common-law crime seems to me to be attended with no such consequences, and therefore I am of opinion that this suspension should be refused.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that this suspension ought to be refused.

The principal, and indeed practically the only, ground on which the conviction under review is attacked is, that while the complaint on which it proceeds bears to be brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, the sentence pronounced exceeds the maximum sentence of thirty days' imprisonment or £5 of a fine which under the 29th section of the Act of 1864 police judges have power to pronounce. But it is answered that, by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, sect. 490, the powers of police judges in this matter were enlarged to the effect of enabling them to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding two months or a fine not exceeding ten pounds.

The matter simply stands thus, that the provisions in sect. 29 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1864 are altered as regards police magistrates by sect. 490 of the Burgh Police Act of 1862, and of course the provisions of the later statute must prevail. Then by sect. 516 of the Burgh Police Act 1892, it is provided as follows: "If it should be found convenient in any prosecution under this Act or any special statute, any of the provisions or forms of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or of the provisions or forms of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, may be used."

I think that the fact that the prosecutor has taken advantage of this section and made use of the forms and provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts in the present complaint cannot reasonably be held to re-impose upon the police magistrate disposing of the complaint in the burgh police court the limitations in the matter of sentences which was imposed by sect. 29 of the Act of 1864, but removed by sect. 490 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. There is, in my opinion, no obligation on a prosecutor in the case of a common law offence to libel the Act or Acts of Parliament under which the judge is authorised to pronounce any particular sentence.

I am therefore of opinion that the police magistrate in the present case was competent to pronounce the sentence he did, and that the suspension ought to be refused.

Marriage Contract—Construction—Two Antenuptial Contracts, One in Scots, One in French Form—Divorce of Husband—Obligation to Pay Annuity to Wife on Death—Whether Obligation Prestable.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 774; Vol. XIV. p. 772.)

The facts of the case appear from the previous reports. The defender appealed to the House of Lords. The pursuer presented a cross appeal.

The House dismissed the defender's appeal with costs, and dismissed the cross appeal without costs, and without prejudice to the effect of the Scots marriage settlement.

The Lord Chancellor.—There is no decision in the Second Division as to the extent to which these lands are bound by the Scotch marriage settlement. Accordingly your Lordships have not been troubled with argument upon that subject, and the point so far as this House is concerned is open.

The question in this case is as to whether or not there was a personal obligation to pay the £1500 a year referred to in the marriage settlements. It was a marriage between a Scotsman and a French lady, and there were marriage settlements. One of them was in Scots form although executed in Paris, and the other was in French form. Both of them are admittedly binding. If they conflicted the one with the other in the sense of either contradicting the other it would be necessary for your Lordships to consider a different question. They do not conflict, and both of them apply.

The Scots contract gives a certain property in land, which in a conventional way may be described as a security, whatever the particular legal character of it may be. The French document does create a personal obligation to pay this sum of £1500 a year. There is really no dispute that it is so; but in effect two points when they are analysed are raised by the Dean of Faculty—one of them is that it was not so designed by the parties. I cannot pass behind the words used in order to penetrate to some imaginary design which may lurk beneath them. I think myself that it was designed, because the object of the French contract was in my view to create a duty which should be enforceable in France, whereas the Scots contract relating to landed property in Scotland would not be so easily handled by a French Court.

House of Lords.

Hope Vere v. Hope Vere.

The Lord Chancellor.

The second point which was in substance argued was this—that in some way the effect of the French contract must be controlled by reference to the Scots deed. I do not think that is so. Both of them being consistent must be read according to their natural meaning. In my opinion, without entering upon a criticism of the language used, the words in the preamble of the French contract do not affect this question, and I think this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Ashbourne.—I concur.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree.

Lord Robertson.—It is not surprising that difficulties should arise when two contracts relating to the same marriage are executed, the one according to Scots law and the other according to French law. But, as my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has said, even supposing there were a contradiction between the two deeds, it would be the duty of the Court which has to give effect to the rights of the parties, to find a solution of that difficulty. I am happy, however, to think in the present case that question does not arise.

I will take first of all (for reasons which I shall presently mention) the French contract, and I am bound to say, as the net result of the argument, I think it is perfectly clear that the French contract imposes a personal obligation upon the bridegroom. But it does more; and this I think has received scarcely sufficient enforcement in the argument. It not only imposes a personal obligation, but it also relegates the infeftment to the position of a security, because it uses that very term in describing it; and the theory of the French deed (to put it in a word) is that there is a personal obligation for this annuity, and a security granted by virtue of the Scots marriage contract.

Then when we turn to the Scots deed I must own that I was at first gravely impressed by the difficulty which arises from this fact, that the Scots contract is a complete settlement, or purports to be a complete settlement, of the rights of the parties. It has all the usual words of style, which are not immaterial, but on the contrary serve to exhaust, as it were, the rights of the two parties who are to be joined in marriage. I thought that presented a very serious difficulty, but the pressure of that is to my mind very greatly relieved by the introduction of these words: "In contemplation of which marriage, and in consideration also of the provisions made in a marriage settlement in the French form which has been or is about to be entered into between the parties hereto." Now that seems to me to let in the French provisions in their full and ample effect; and accordingly it remains to be seen whether there is anything in the remainder of the Scots deed which sets up an antinomy, as it were, between the two schemes of the settlement. I think that the solution is to be found here. The Dean of Faculty has most properly pointed out that the infeftment is a real right to secure so much of the rent of the property. It is not expressed as a security, but then the question is not what is the expression of the right, but what it serves for in relation to the other contract, the French marriage contract, which the Scots marriage contract recognises and founds upon. The solution of the case seems, therefore, to me to be this, that while in form and in technical accuracy of language the infeftment is not given as a security, yet it operates as a security when we are dealing with the rights which are settled by the combined action of the French and Scots marriage contracts.

Lord Atkinson.—I concur.

Lord Collins.—I also concur.

The Lord Chancellor.—There is the question of the cross appeal, and before your Lordships come to a decision I think it would be well to suggest that the cross appeal should be dismissed without costs, but with a statement that it be without prejudice to the effect of the Scots marriage settlement.—24*th July* 1907.

Appeal against an Interlocutor of the Second Division (The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Kyllachy, Stormonth-Darling and Low), reversing an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 401; Vol. XIV. p. 284, and 8 F. 1147.)

The facts of the case appear from the previous reports.

The Complainers the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd. appealed to the House of Lords.

The House dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Chancellor.—The question here is—Ought the respondents to be restrained in substance from using the style and name of the "Dunlop Motor Company Limited" on the ground that it is misleading and enables them to acquire part of the goodwill of the appellants?

I think the pursuers in this case fail upon the facts. It is not necessary to enter into the evidence in detail. In each case it nearly always is a question of fact as it is here. The real complaint in this case was as to the use of the name "Dunlop." That name is the true name of the two brothers who got up the respondent company. I can see very little proof that anyone was misled by its use, and I can see no proof that any article was bought by anyone from the respondents in the belief that they were a branch of the appellant company. The two companies do not to any considerable extent in fact deal in the same articles, and I see no ground for thinking that the little repairing business in Kilmarnock does or can do any unlawful harm to the appellant company.

I am therefore of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lord James of Hereford.—The complainers in this case, the appellants, have by themselves or their predecessors in title carried on business using the name of Dunlop to designate the goods manufactured and sold by them, and such name was stamped on most of the goods so manufactured.

These goods were principally tyres—and the name of the appellants' company, the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, so represents. Other goods, accessories used in relation to and on and about motor cars and bicycles, were also manufactured and sold by the appellants.

Previously to the year 1904 two brothers, Robert and John Fisher Dunlop, had carried on a small business at Kilmarnock under the style of R. & J. F. Dunlop. The principal business of this firm was that of selling and repairing bicycles and tricycles.

In 1904 a small company with very limited capital was formed under the name of the Dunlop Motor Company for the purpose of selling (on commission) and repairing motors and motor cycles and parts thereof.

The business carried on by this—the respondents'—company was a small local trade in Kilmarnock, and consisted principally in the repairs of motor cars and the sale of petrol.

The complainers, the appellants, seek to prevent the respondents' company from carrying on its business under the name of the Dunlop Motor Company, on the ground that the use of such name is calculated to deceive the public into purchasing the respondents' goods in the belief that such goods are those of the appellants.

In my judgment the appellants have failed in making out this contention. They do not allege that they sell motors or any other vehicles, but they do deal in parts or accessories of such vehicles, viz., tyres, pumps, and other adjuncts, and they allege that a confusion may be caused and a belief created that the respondents' company were selling these same portions as being those of the appellants.

Now, in what does the deception consist, and who were the persons deceived?

The complainers have no claim to the exclusive use of the name Dunlop. It is a common name in Scotland. The respondents had traded as R. & J. F. Dunlop. The appellants have chosen to announce themselves as the Pneumatic Tyre Company preceded by the name Dunlop, and their case seems to be that having done so they can shut out persons named Dunlop from employing that name in connection with a company at all similar in object to the tyre company. I agree that the objects of the two companies need not be absolutely identical in order to entitle the complainers to relief, but there must be great similarity. In this case I do not think that the measure of similarity established is sufficient either in the name employed or in the nature of the trade sought to be carried on.

The complainers say we are a pneumatic tyre company. The respondents represent themselves to be a motor company. Then, as I have said, the tyre company does not sell motors. The motor company appears to do so, or at least seeks to do so. If in respect of some minor articles there might be a common production, yet the main objects of the two businesses are different.

As to these minor articles I agree with the view expressed by Lord Kyllachy, that the complainers have not proved that they have any exclusive right in connection with the sale of those articles to the use of the name Dunlop, nor have they proved that the name in question has any special reputation or value in connection with such minor articles.

Then, secondly, who are they who will be deceived by the name used by the respondents? It appears to be admitted that an ordinary business person would not be misled, but it is alleged that the unwary would. Well of course there are unwary people in this world, but I think that a man who employs his own name in carrying on his business has the right to regard the people whom he may attract as being capable of exercising and being in the habit of exercising thought; and I cannot differ from the judgment of Lord Low, in which he says:—"Anyone who took the trouble to think about the matter would see that the respondents' company was a motor company and the complainers a tyre company. I do not think that the respondents are liable to have their business practically stopped unless they change their name simply because a thoughtless person might unwarrantably jump to the conclusion that they were connected with the complainers."

Under the circumstances of the case before your Lordships I do not think that the average citizen of Kilmarnock would be deceived, and I cannot speculate upon the degree of unwariness that would induce the confusion necessary to support the appellants' claim.

It is not without full consideration of the very lucid judgment of the Lord Ordinary that I have come to the conclusion that the decision appealed from is correct, and that therefore this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Robertson—I agree in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Baroness Wesselenyi, administratrix of C. L. Mackenzie, appealed to the House of Lords.

The House, without calling on counsel for the respondents, dismissed the appeal with costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—The point in this case is a very short point, and it is this—There is a direction in the fourth codicil of this deceased gentleman to the following effect:—"I direct my trustees, after paying all debts, legacies, annuities, and life interests affecting my personal estate, to make payment to the heir for the time being entitled to succeed under the said deed of entail" of certain sums of money. The question is whether those words mean the heir who shall in fact have title by virtue of the deed, or the heir whom the deed designates as the person entitled to succeed. I agree with the decision of the Second Division that under this language you have to ask who is the person whom the deed declares to be the heir. It is a question of what the deed says, not what the deed does; and so, although it is no longer operative, it can still indicate the heir pointed to in the codicil.

In regard to the question of costs I do not perceive at your Lordships' bar any appearance on behalf of Sir Victor Mackenzie. Therefore I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs in the ordinary way.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree.

Lord Robertson.—The respondent, Sir Victor Mackenzie, is unquestionably the person entitled to this residue if the entail of Kintail still subsisted.

The proposition maintained by the appellant is really this, that the testator's intention to give this residue to Sir Victor, his lineal descendant, was subordinate to his intention to give it to an heir of entail, and that as the entailed title has gone by the board the testator has expressed no intention applicable to the situation. It seems to me that this is to erect out of words of style a structure of intention wholly non-existent. The testator was dealing with what he was making an entailed estate, and he therefore calls the persons whom he is benefiting heirs of entail. But the substance of a bequest of residue is the choice of persons; and Sir Victor is the designated person in the present case.

On the question of costs I have only to say that I can see no ground at all for granting the appellant costs out of an estate which we hold to be determined by this will as the effective instrument, his whole argument being that the will has no application to the case in hand. As to the position of Sir Victor, I entirely concur with what my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has said.

OUTER HOUSE

(Lord Salvesen.)

142. Sillars v. M'Alpine and Others.

Succession — Will — Deposit Receipt — Destination in Deposit Receipt—Passing Property—Connell's Trustees v. Connell's Trustees, 1886, 13 R. 1175, Followed.

The question in this action related to a sum of £400 contained in a deposit receipt dated 9th January 1905 with the Bank of Scotland, Lamlash, Arran, in name of the defender Alexander M'Alpine, for behoof of his two daughters.

Said deposit receipt had been exchanged for one dated 5th August 1902 in name of the pursuer's brother, Angus Sillars, herself, and her sister Mrs M'Alpine. Angus Sillars died in December 1902.

The pursuer, who was a sister-in-law of the defender, concluded for declarator that the sum of £400 contained in said deposit receipt was her property, and to have the defender ordained to endorse and deliver it to her. The defender's two daughters were called for any interest they might have; as were also the pursuer's two sisters and the pursuer herself as executrix of her deceased brother Angus Sillars. Defences were lodged for Alexander M'Alpine and his two daughters.

The opinion of the Lord Ordinary further sufficiently reports the case.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary, on the ground that the pursuer's right of property in the deposit receipt had not been established, dismissed the action, and found neither party entitled to expenses.

Lord Salvesen.—In this action the pursuer seeks a declarator that the sum of £400 contained in a deposit receipt dated 9th January 1905 in name of the defenders for behoof of his two daughters is her property; and her leading conclusion is that the defender should be decerned to endorse the said deposit receipt and deliver it to the pursuer. The only defence formulated in the pleas in law is that the sum contained in a deposit receipt dated 5th August 1902, for which the deposit receipt described in the summons was exchanged, was validly donated to the defender's two children. There is, however, no admission of the pursuer's statements in Cond. 1, which relate to her right of property in the deposit receipt in question; and as there could be no valid donation unless the pursuer was the owner of the property donated, it appears to me that the question of property is incidentally raised.

On record the pursuer's statement in Cond. 1 is that on 5th August 1902 she deposited the sum of £400 on deposit receipt in name of her brother Angus Sillars, herself, and her sister Mrs M'Alpine, and the survivor or any of them; that this sum was the sole property of the pursuer, and that the receipt was taken in the terms stated to provide for the contingency of the pursuer's death. This averment, which is the foundation of her case, is contradicted by the pursuer herself. The money was not deposited by her but by her brother Angus Sillars, with whom she was then residing, and she did not prescribe the terms in which it was taken. At the time when it was deposited the pursuer—as I read her evidence—does not affirm that the property in the money belonged to her, or that Angus Sillars might not have uplifted the money and redeposited it in any names which he chose. She endeavours now to make a case either of inter vivos or mortis causa donation; and although she was very voluble in her evidence I confess I am still quite in doubt which theory she prefers. In considering whether a transference of property took place by donation it is fair to consider the circumstances in which the claim arises; and I shall accordingly now do so.

The pursuer's father was the tenant of a small farm called Benlicken, near Pirnmill, in Arran. He died a great many years ago, but his widow and children continued to reside on the farm. There were two sons, Peter and Angus, and three daughters — the pursuer, Mrs M'Millan, and Mrs M'Alpine. The lease of the farm appears to have been taken in the name of the eldest son, Peter, and on his death in 1898 to have passed to Angus. Mrs M'Millan married about forty years and Mrs M'Alpine some twenty years ago. The pursuer remained unmarried, and continued to reside with her mother and brothers and latterly with her last surviving brother Angus, and to take an active and no doubt an efficient part in the management of the farm. On Peter's death a sum of £50 each was paid to Mrs M'Millan and Mrs M'Alpine, but the pursuer got no definite sum, although it was understood that she was to receive £100, as she had contributed more than her sisters to the money earned in the conduct of the farm.

When Angus died on 19th December 1902 there were four deposit receipts which had been taken out by him lying in his repositories. Of these, one was for £305, 4s. 1d., which was deposited with a bank in Campbeltown in his own name; two for £260 and £60 respectively were deposited in the name of Angus Sillars and the pursuer and the survivor; and the fourth, for £400, was deposited with the Bank of Scotland in the names of Angus Sillars, the pursuer, and Mrs M'Alpine and the survivor. The pursuer was appointed executrix of her brother Angus, and she gave up an inventory of his estate, in which she included only the one deposit receipt which stood in the name of Angus Sillars alone. She took possession of the deposit receipts for £260 and £60, and uplifted the contents on the footing that they were her own property; and one or two days after the death of her brother Angus (it is quite immaterial which) she handed the deposit receipt for £400 to the defender in presence of his wife. Both the pursuer and the defender agreed that the sum was not to enter the inventory of the deceased's effects; and each now claims the full property in it, the pursuer for herself and the defender on behalf of his minor daughters.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Sillars v. M'Alpine and Others.

On the admitted facts of the case it is obvious enough that the pursuer had a moral claim to a larger share than her sisters in the accumulations from the profits of the farm, which may be taken to be represented by the various sums on deposit at Angus's death. But a court of law cannot make a will for a deceased man who has not himself taken the trouble to do so; and his estate must be divided according to the rules of intestate succession quite irrespective of considerations of equity.

The pursuer herself seems to have thought that the terms of the deposit receipt were equivalent to a will in her favour. In this she was wrong, as was decided in the case of Connell's Trs., 13 R. 1175. This case does not stand alone, but followed on a series of decisions which were all to the effect that a deposit receipt can have no testamentary operation or effect. Unfortunately the misconception which appears from these cases to have been at one time common in Scotland as to the effect of a deposit receipt in name of two or more persons and the survivor seems still to linger in Arran, where deposit receipts, according to the evidence in this case, appear to be utilised, not merely as conclusive evidence of testamentary intention, but as convenient documents for transferring property, and incidentally of evading Government duties.

It follows from the decision in Connell's case that the money contained in the deposit receipt of 5th August 1902 must be presumed to have been the property of Angus Sillars the depositor, and at his death to have formed part of his executry. Of course it would still be open to the pursuer to prove that the money in the deposit receipt was donated to her; but I cannot hold that she has established this by her own evidence alone, especially in view of its vagueness and want of precision. In my opinion, therefore, the leading conclusion of the summons must be negatived.

It was strenuously urged by the pursuer's counsel that I was not entitled to reach this conclusion because the question of property was not distinctly raised between the pursuer and the only compearing defender, and that I was therefore bound to accept the pursuer's statement that the money contained in the deposit receipt was in fact her property. He directed my attention to the fact that all the next of kin of the deceased Angus Sillars are cited as defenders, and that the pursuer has even called herself as executrix of her brother. I should have been more impressed with this argument if the executry estate had been under the administration of some third person. If an independent executor having investigated the circumstances did not think fit to contest the pursuer's right of property the Court would scarcely intervene; but this question can only properly be tried between the pursuer and some one representing the executry estate, and it would be an odd result that the mouths of all parties interested should be closed because the pursuer as an individual had obtained a decree in absence against herself in her capacity of executrix. No doubt in the special circumstances a defence by the M'Millans might have been entertained; but I am at a loss to see upon what facts they could have proceeded, as all information was withheld from them by the pursuer. The deposit receipt in question was secretly transferred to the defender within a couple of days after the death of Angus Sillars; and I am satisfied that this was done so that its very existence might be concealed from the M'Millans. Moreover, the pursuer's statement on record was quite misleading and, as I believe, was intended by the pursuer to be so. There was no improbability that she might have deposited the £400 contained in the deposit receipt in question, and if so she would have been prima facie entitled to the ownership. The fact is that she did not do so, Angus Sillars having transacted all the banking business while he was alive. As, however, the proper defender on this question of property is not here to contest the claim, I do not desire to say anything further to prejudice the pursuer's rights, as it is conceivable she may have some corroborative testimony on the subject of the alleged mortis causa donation, or may otherwise establish her claim to the contents of the deposit receipt.

If I am right so far, the money contained in the deposit receipt of 1902 cannot have been validly donated to the defender. But in case a different view may be taken elsewhere I think it right to express my opinion as to the effect of the proof on the subject of donation.

[The Lord Ordinary then dealt with the evidence and expressed the opinion that assuming the property of the deposit receipt was in the pursuer, it was sufficiently proved that the pursuer made a gift of it to her nieces.]—5th June 1907.

II. Evidence — Testamentary Writing — Obligation to Leave Money by Testamentary Writing—Proof of Obligation—Proof Prout de Jure Held Incompetent and Proof Habili Modo Allowed.

The opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuer in this case avers that in July 1901 the late Alexander Ryrie proposed marriage to her, and was accepted. The marriage was arranged for the first week in October; but the intending husband became ill, and ultimately desired to be relieved of his engagement. As compensation for his breach of promise he agreed with the pursuer in the beginning of 1902 to make a settlement upon her during his lifetime of £25 a year, payable in quarterly instalments, and to leave her £1000 at his death in the event of his predeceasing her. Mr Ryrie died in November 1905, after having—according to the pursuer's averments—duly implemented that part of his obligation which referred to payment of the annuity, and she now sues his executrices for payment of the sum of £1000 which Mr Ryrie bound himself to leave her by will.

The defenders are administering the estate under a general settlement of the deceased's affairs, which contains no provision in the pursuer's favour. They admit that they are also in possession of a testamentary writing (of a later date) which bears to contain a direction by Mr Ryrie to his executors to pay the pursuer a sum of £1000 sterling, free of legacy duty; but they say that this document was never signed by the deceased; or, at all events, that it was never duly executed. The pursuer admits that she cannot found her claim upon this document; although she proposes to use it as an adminicle of evidence in proof of the contract which, she says, was entered into between her and the deceased.

The defenders plead in their first plea in law that the action is irrelevant; but this plea was not strongly pressed. In the case of Paterson, 1893, 20 R. 484, it was held that an onerous agreement between a mother and her son that the mother should execute an irrevocable settlement of her property in his favour was binding, and that the obligation undertaken by the mother was not the less to be enforced that, in its nature, it could only be implemented after her death. Accordingly, the main argument was directed to the fifth plea in law, that the pursuer's averments can only be proved by the writ of the deceased. For the pursuer it was, on the other hand, contended that the agreement alleged was entered into by way of compromise of a legal claim, and was therefore proveable prout de jure.

The pursuer cited the cases of Forbes v. Caird, 1877, 4 R. 1141, and Downie v. Black, 1885, 13 R. 271. These cases establish that there is no such rule as that innominate contracts cannot be proved except by writ; and there are other cases not cited which conclusively settle that a compromise of an action may be proved prout de jure. In Downie's case Lord Shand reaffirmed, what had been previously repeatedly laid down in the older decisions, that if the contract is of a very unusual kind, the proof must be by writ or oath of the parties. For my own part, I think that doctrine requires reconsideration. I can scarcely imagine that there is to be first an inquiry whether a particular kind of contract is unusual before the mode of proof is determined. If not, it will rest with the tribunal in each case to say whether an agreement is unusual—which is a matter of fact that can only be safely determined after evidence. No tribunal can be familiar with the customs of every class of the people in every particular industry or business; and it may well be that a particular contract, of which the judge before whom the case is tried has never heard, may yet be quite familiar to a section of the general public. The observations of Lord Deas, in the case of Forbes v. Caird, form an excellent illustration of this. In that case—commenting on the decision in Taylor v. Forbes, 1853, 24 D. 19, where it was held that an agreement by which a law agent undertook business gratuitously, reserving his right to recover costs from the opposite party in the event of success, was held to be only proveable by the writ or oath of the agent—Lord Deas remarked: "It is so unusual, and out of the ordinary course of business, for a law agent to work for nothing, that a contract to do so will only be allowed to be proved by his writ or oath" Yet it is common knowledge that litigations for persons in humble circumstances, but not on the Poor's Roll, are daily conducted in the Court of Session on this footing; and the decision in Taylor v. Forbes has since, I was told, been overruled. I am, therefore, not disposed to restrict the proof in this case, on the ground that the contract alleged was an innominate one containing unusual stipulations.

There is, however, another ground by which the same result may be reached. According to our law, a testamentary writing, to have effect, must be either holograph of the deceased or probative. This law, which is most salutary in its application, would be practically abrogated if it were possible to prove prout de jure that the deceased had come under an obligation (whether onerous or gratuitous I do not think matters) to leave his whole estate, or part of it, in favour of a particular person. In the case of Johnstone v. Goodlet, 1868, 6 M. 1067, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Patton) said: "If an agreement to leave all one's property to a particular individual were proveable prout de jure, the law as to the execution of testaments would be superseded. Writing in such a matter is requisite to express the fixed and settled determination of mind, because the lubricity of parole testimony would make it very difficult to distinguish between words of mere intention and those of engagement or obligation. They might easily be confused." I think this affords a much safer ground of judgment in favour of the defenders' contention than the doctrine as to innominate and unusual contracts; and it is obvious that it applies in terms to the contract libelled in the present case.

The defenders moved that in the event of my sustaining their fifth plea I should appoint the pursuer to lodge in process the writings upon which she founds, and then consider ab ante whether they are sufficient to allow parole proof in explanation. That is, no doubt, a competent course which has been occasionally adopted. I think, however, in this matter it is safer to follow the form of interlocutor adopted in the case of Paterson, 1897, 25 R. 144, where similar questions were raised. It will be quite competent at the proof for the defenders to object to any parole testimony being led, and if no writing has been produced which imports an obligation of the kind averred by the pursuer, the objection will be sustained.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, repels the first plea in law for the defenders; finds that the pursuer's averments can only be proved by writ or oath, and that such writ need not be holograph or tested; allows the pursuer a proof of her averments habili modo, and to the defenders a conjunct probation."—13*th July* 1907.

I. Ship—Charter-party—Hire — Hire to Cease when Ship Inefficient Through Breakdown of Machinery, etc.—Meaning of "Breakdown of Machinery"—Liability of Charterer for Coals and Other Expenses Though Hire Ceased from Inefficiency of Ship.

II. Ship — Charter-party—Hire — Payment —Loss of Time—Detention by Breakdown of Machinery—Computation of Time—Held that Hire Payable to be Calculated by Hours, Not by Days or Parts of Days.

In these actions the material facts and the contentions of the parties sufficiently appear from the two Opinions of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Salvesen.—These actions all arise out of a charter-party which was entered into between the owners of the "Bauta" and a firm of shipping agents in Leith. The charter-party is dated 26th July 1905, and was for a period of six calendar months commencing on 23rd September of that year. The sums sued for by the owners represent certain deductions which the charterers made when settling for the hire of the vessel during the time that she was actually employed. The charterers, on the other hand, maintain that they were entitled to make larger deductions than they have actually done, and in the counter-action at their instance they sue for repetition of sums paid amounting in cumulo to about £200. Some of the deductions which are in dispute represent comparatively small amounts, and these the parties have arranged extra-judicially. The controversy has accordingly been substantially narrowed to this—For what periods were the charterers exempt from payment of hire during the currency of the charter-party, in respect of certain breakdowns of machinery which occurred on three separate occasions and which for the time being prevented the working of the vessel? The clause in the charter-party which regulates this matter is Art. 12, and is expressed in the following terms: "That in the event of loss of time from a deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four running hours, the payment of hire shall cease from the time the breakdown, etc., occurs until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." On the construction of this clause as applicable to the facts in the case the controversy turns.

The evidence with regard to the first breakdown is as follows. On the 14th of November, while the "Bauta" was on a voyage to Jaffa in ballast to load a cargo of oranges there, the master, who was on deck, heard a peculiar sound which is entered by the first mate in the log-book as a violent shock in the engine-room. The captain now explains that this language does not accurately express what actually took place, and that the noise, in fact, was such that it did not attract the attention of any of the other persons who were on deck. It was, however, an unusual sound; and although the captain does not now profess to know what caused it, he at one time attributed it to the propeller having struck some wreckage, although the evidence now led for the ship suggests that it may have been one of the knocking sounds which are a common result of some temporary derangement in the machinery. The experts examined were agreed that such noises are attributable to a variety of causes: such as the slackening of bolts or the presence of water in the cylinders, or the like. As the steamer, however, was able thereafter to maintain her ordinary speed the captain did not attach so much importance to the occurrence as he was inclined to do at the time. The entries in the log shew that on the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th of November the steamer was able to make on an average about 8 knots an hour; and indeed occasionally the speed rose to 8½ and even to 9 knots under favourable conditions. At 10.40 p.m. on the 17th the vessel arrived at Jaffa, and next day she commenced to take in her cargo of oranges. In the mate's log there is no further reference to the noises in the engine-room, or to anything which could give rise to any uneasiness.

In the engineer's log, which was kept by the first engineer—the witness Henriksen—the entry with regard to the same matter is in the following terms: "At 8 p.m. a strange noise was heard in the engine-room—the steam pressure was then 140 lbs. As the fires were being cleaned at the time, the place whence the sound came could not be located. As the steam pressure rose rapidly the sound disappeared and the engines were kept working under full steam pressure." There are no remarks with reference to the 15th, 16th, or 17th of November; but on the 18th of November the engineer notes: "On arrival at Jaffa, the strange sound aforenamed was again heard, but during the manœuvring nothing was heard." The engineer, however, deponed that when the pressure got low he had heard a knocking sound, the cause of which he was unable to explain, from time to time during the period between the 14th of November and the arrival of the ship at Jaffa.

At Jaffa the engineer made as thorough an examination of the engines as was possible under the circumstances. Jaffa is an open roadstead, and accordingly steam required to be kept up on the boilers during the whole period of loading, and I think it is proved that it would have been unsafe to have tilted the vessel so as to have made a thorough examination of the propeller and propeller-shaft possible. The engineer, however, rowed round the vessel in a boat, and he also took hold of the propeller with his hand to ascertain whether it was loose. The captain also made an inspection of the ship from a boat, but did not handle the propeller or shaft. Nothing was found to be wrong with the machinery except that two bolts at the couplings, which support the propeller shaft, were found to be out of order, the one being broken and the other slack. These were put right, and it was hoped that thereby a recurrence of the knocking sound would be prevented. Up to that point I think the master and engineer did all that was reasonable; and I reject the view that they ought to have called a survey by engineers of other vessels, or to have gone to Port Said. The defect, whatever it was, was quite obscure; and there was no reason to apprehend at that time that it would interfere with the working of the vessel.

The "Bauta" left Jaffa at 7 p.m. on 20th November on a voyage to Valencia. About an hour after departure (as the engineer notes in his log) "the strange sound was again heard, somewhat more pronounced when steam went down a little, but on the steam pressure going up the sound disappeared." On the 21st the sound was again heard all through the twenty-four hours, every time the pressure went below 150 lbs., and was observed to grow worse; and the same remark is made with regard to the 22nd. On the 23rd, at 1.30 a.m., the engines were stopped to examine the pumps, to ascertain if the sound might originate there. A coupling bolt was then found to be out of order and a new one was put in. At 8.40 a.m. the engines were again started, but without any improvement. On the 24th the strange sound from the engines became more observable, but no special flaw could be detected. On the 25th, as the sound became worse, it was decided to take out the piston-rods, and at 8.30 a.m. the engines were stopped and all the three piston-rods were examined, but were found to be in order. On the 26th the vessel apparently proceeded under full speed and steady high pressure. On the 27th the thumping noise became more pronounced and sharper, and there was great vibration in the engines when the shocks occurred, and, for the first time, the engineer seems to have thought that the propeller must be loose on the shaft and that this was the cause of the persistent noise. At 8.30 on the morning of the 28th the engines were stopped in order that a new bolt might be put in the crank-shaft; and, while the ship was stopped, an examination was made of the propeller, of a similar kind to that made at Jaffa, with the result that the engineer reached the conclusion that the propeller was loose on the shaft. The engineer then apprised the master of his discovery, and it was resolved to make for the nearest port, which happened to be Bona, under slow speed, so as not to make the damage worse. This was accordingly done; and by midnight on the 30th the vessel was moored in Bona harbour. It was there ascertained that the shafting had got out of line, and that the white-metal stern-bush had been worn down to a dangerous extent. According to the experts, the gradual wearing away of the bush was sufficient to account for the knocking sound which had continued at intervals since the 14th of November. The vessel had to lie at Bona until her machinery was again in an efficient condition; and in the meantime the cargo of oranges had to be tran-shipped and forwarded by another vessel.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

The owners of the "Bauta" contend that it is only from the time that the vessel arrived at Bona until she was again efficient that no hire is due. The charterers, on the other hand, maintain that the breakdown must be held to have commenced on 14th November, and that from that time the hire ceased to be payable. In their action, however, they do not insist upon this extreme contention; and, indeed, there was no evidence whatever that the defect—assuming it to have commenced on the 14th—caused any loss of time until much later. Accordingly their main contention was that, as from the time that the vessel left Jaffa, she was not, by reason of the defects which afterwards developed so as to cause a breakdown, in full working order; and that as this caused a loss of time exceeding twenty-four running hours, the hire must be held to cease from the time the breakdown occurred.

In my opinion this construction of the clause is unsound. The words "a breakdown of machinery" must be construed in a popular and reasonable sense; and I do not think that the ordinary commercial man would say that the machinery had broken down because there was a defect in the machinery which did not interfere with the ordinary working of the ship, although an ultimate breakdown was attributable to that defect. In many cases it would be impossible—e.g., where breakdowns arise through parts of the machinery gradually wearing out—to say when the defect commenced; and it would be most unsettling to business if a construction of a common clause in a commercial contract were to be adopted which would necessarily raise endless controversies. The vessel here was able to steam at her full speed for seven days after the alleged breakdown, because I think the small progress that she made on the 24th, 25th and 26th November is sufficiently accounted for (apart from the occasional stoppage of the engines for purposes of examination), by the strong head winds and high seas which she encountered. Even on the 27th November she was able to cover practically her ordinary day's journey, and it was only after 8.30 a.m. on the 28th that the speed was greatly reduced in consequence of the discovery which was then made. If she had, in the meantime, reached Valencia I presume the charterers' argument would have been just the same; although, in point of fact, there would never have been a day during which a reasonable amount of work in their service was not done. It is not to be left out of view that the charterers themselves at first were prepared to pay, and in fact did pay, the hire up to the 25th of November, notwithstanding that they had at that time before them both of the ship's logs which contained all the evidence upon which they now rely. I also reject the shipowners' construction of the clause in question. They contended that the breakdown did not take place until the vessel arrived at Bona, and that, up to that time, it could not be said that a breakdown had occurred "preventing the working of the vessel," as she in fact proceeded to Bona under her own steam. In my opinion, in a commercial sense, the vessel broke down whenever the defect was discovered which rendered it necessary in the opinion of a prudent navigator that she should proceed to a harbour for repairs. She was not the less broken down that she was able to proceed, under her own steam at half speed, than if she had employed a tug, or had managed to reach port under sail. This view appears to be in accordance with the decision in the case of Hogarth v. Millar, Brother & Co., 1890, 18 R. (H.L.) 10, where the breakdown was held to date from the time that the high-pressure engines broke down, although the vessel was able to reach a port under her low-pressure engines. I accordingly reach the conclusion that the owners are entitled to about three days' hire, in addition to what the charterers have paid; and, of course, that involves that they are not liable to have deducted the value of the coals consumed during that period.

The next matter in controversy is the amount to be deducted for the breakdown that occurred on the 5th of February 1906, while the "Bauta" was on a voyage from Grangemouth to Cullera. The main facts are contained in Art. 7 of the joint minute of admissions for the parties. This breakdown was due to a fracture in the main steam pipe, which is admitted to be a very serious matter. This fracture was first observed at 10 a.m. on 5th February; but although the crack was 1½ inches long, the engineer seems to have at first thought that the vessel might proceed after the speed was reduced. This was accordingly done, and the pressure on the steam pipe correspondingly diminished. The crack, notwithstanding, rapidly increased, and by 10 p.m. it was found to be 5 inches in length, and the master then determined to go into Vigo to repair. The charterers propose to deduct hire, and to charge the coal consumed as from 10 a.m. until the vessel was again rendered efficient by the repair of the main steam pipe in Vigo, and I think they are right in so doing. If the crack had been a very slight one, such as a prudent engineer might reasonably anticipate would not seriously interfere with the vessel's progress until she reached her port of destination, I should not have thought that the breakdown was necessarily coincident with the first appearance of the crack. But here the crack was so serious that speed had to be at once materially reduced, and I think it was the duty of a prudent master to have at once made for Vigo, instead of continuing for twelve hours under reduced steam with consequent loss of time. The opposite view would involve that the charterers were to be responsible for delay caused by fruitless and imprudent attempts to repair the main steam pipe. The fact that the moment this defect was discovered it was recognised as so serious that the speed had to be at once reduced, differentiates it from the case with which I first dealt.

The third breakdown is connected with another crack in the steam pipe, which was observed at 12.30 a.m. of 23rd May 1906, while the "Bauta" was on a voyage from Newcastle to Almeria. The engineer, according to his log, at once started clamping the pipe, "in order to put patent metal round the pipe to stop the leakage. When this had been done, proceeded under reduced speed until midnight." As the leakage did not increase, it was decided to proceed on the voyage. It does not appear that this crack was nearly so serious as the crack which was noticed on 5th February; and so little did it interfere with the speed of the vessel that on the 24th she was able to make her ordinary speed of eight knots during several of the watches. By twelve noon, however, the engineer found that the leakage had increased, so that he had to "shut off further on the main steam valve to the main boiler until $\frac{1}{4}$ turn. Proceeded with this speed until midnight." Now I think at that point it ought to have been realised that the injury to the main steam pipe was one that required repair before the vessel could continue on her voyage; and in accordance with my previous decision I think this is the point of time from which the breakdown must be reckoned to commence. No doubt the ship made from five to six knots an hour for some twenty hours longer, with the leakage from the pipes always increasing; but the very fact that speed had to be materially reduced, shews that those in charge of her realised that she was not in the efficient condition in which it was the owners' duty to maintain her. It may be said that during this period the charterers actually derived some benefit from the distance which the vessel travelled; but, on the other hand, their liability for hire recommenced when she was rendered efficient again at Cadiz; although it involved a certain amount of steaming before she could reach the position at which she would have passed that port had a deviation not been rendered necessary by the breakdown.

I was informed that, if I made findings with regard to the three periods during which no hire falls to be paid, the parties would be able to adjust not merely the sums to be deducted in respect of these periods, but the value of the coals consumed by the ship while off hire. I shall accordingly only meantime make such findings, and leave the parties to adjust the figures.—20*th March* 1907.

The interlocutor contained findings as follows:

"Finds that the pursuers are not entitled to hire in respect of the following periods, namely, (1) from 8.30 a.m. on the 28th of November 1905 till 9 a.m. on the 1st of January 1906; (2) from 10 a.m. on 5th February 1906 till 6 p.m. on 7th February; and (3) from 12 noon on 24th May 1906 until 9.20 p.m. on 26th May 1906: And, with these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure."

After further debate the Lord Ordinary disposed of the remaining questions at issue as follows:—

Lord Salvesen.—Two questions remain to be decided. The first is whether during the periods when according to my previous judgment payment of hire ceased the coals consumed on board the "Bauta" fall to be charged against the shipowners or the charterers. The latter contended that it was inequitable that during the time when they were deriving no benefit from the ship they should nevertheless be liable for the cost of the coal used to enable the vessel to steam to a port of safety from the spot where the actual breakdown took place. In my opinion the decision of this question depends not on general considerations of equity but on the terms of the charter-party. By Art. 2 the defenders were taken bound to provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, etc., used during its currency. But for the stipulation contained in Art. 12 they would also have been liable to pay the hire, for the misfortunes of a ship under a time charter primarily affect the charterer. It does not, however, follow that because they have stipulated that the hire shall cease from the time a breakdown occurs, that the other expenses for which they are liable shall also cease to run, and the implication from the stipulation in Art. 12 points in the contrary direction. There is no express decision on this matter; but the dictum of Mr Justice Phillimore in Vogemann, 1901, 6 Com. Cas. 253, accords with my own opinion. I hold that the general obligation on the charterer to provide and pay for coals is not subject to any implied limitation during the time that the vessel is broken down.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Salvesen.

Giersten and Others (Owners of S.S. "Bauta") v. Turnbull & Co. et e contra.

The second question relates to the method of counting periods of time shorter than a day. One of the periods during which I held that the hire ceased to be payable extended over two days and eight hours; and the shipowners maintain that the succeeding period of sixteen hours must be treated as a full day. The contention is based on cases like Angier, 1884, 1. C. & E. 357, and Hough, 1879, 6 R. 961. The former case referred to a time charter which had expired, and it was held that there was no smaller unit for estimating the hire payable than a day. The latter was a case of demurrage, in which again the day was taken as the unit. So far as I am concerned the question is no longer open, because I have already found that the pursuers are not entitled to hire in respect of certain specified periods of time during which the vessel was through breakdowns inefficient for her service. Apart from this, I would reject the argument as contrary to the charter-party, the terms of which are quite explicit. The vessel must be more than twenty-four hours disabled before suspension of hire takes place, but it would be a strange thing to construe this provision as meaning in effect that only one day's hire shall be deducted whether the vessel was disabled for twenty-four hours or for forty-seven hours. Nowadays demurrage is generally calculated by hours to avoid the inconvenience of the rule established by the Courts, and I see no difficulty, except one of elementary arithmetic, in giving full effect to the literal language of the charter-party. I accordingly hold that the hire payable falls to be calculated by hours or half hours up to the point of time when each breakdown occurred and commences to run again from the moment when the vessel was efficient for her service.—13*th July* 1907.

This was an action at the instance of the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against the Caledonian Railway Company. The summons concluded (1) for declarator "that, under and in respect of sect. 12 of the Finance Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. cap. 16), the defenders, when authorised by virtue of any Act to purchase property, are bound to produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, within three months after completion of the purchase, an instrument of conveyance of the property, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property"; (2) that the defenders should be decerned and ordained "to produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the instrument of conveyance or disposition granted in favour of the defenders by Sir John Cheyne, Procurator of the Church of Scotland, and others, as trustees of the Gaelic Church of St Columba in Glasgow, dated 24th, 25th, 27th and 29th May and 3rd June 1901, whereby the said trustees conveyed and disponed to the defenders" certain subjects in Hope Street, Glasgow, which were purchased by the defenders under the powers of the Caledonian Railway (General Powers) Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. cap. ccxv.), "the said instrument of conveyance or disposition being duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of said subjects"; (3) in the event of the defenders failing to produce said instrument, conveyance or disposition, that they should be decerned and ordained "to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £223, 10s. sterling," or such other sum as should be found to be the amount of the said ad valorem duty, with interest at 5 per cent. from 3rd June 1901 till payment.

The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Johnston.—This case is brought to test the duty of railway and other public companies and bodies, under the 12th section of the Finance Act 1895 (58 Vict. cap. 16), or perhaps more properly stated, to determine what the Inland Revenue may insist on as the due compliance by such companies, etc., with that enactment.

To lead up to a consideration of the Act of 1895 it is desirable to examine the state of matters which preceded it. The object of the 12th section of that Act being ostensibly to secure the revenue in the duties, expressing it generally, upon the transfer of property authorised to be purchased by railway companies, etc., by way of a general enactment of universal application, it is understood the same object had previously been in use to be attained by special clauses, inserted at the instance of some public department, probably the Board of Trade, in all private Acts, where the necessity for such arose.

At my request the defenders, who are the Caledonian Railway Co., have lodged in process specimens of such clauses.

Their Act of 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. xii.), while it gives them compulsory power (sect. 4) to acquire lands in usual terms, expressly sanctions (sect. 33) four agreements for the acquisition of lands, "provided always that within three months from the date of completion of each of the purchases contemplated by the agreements comprised in schedules C, E, and F to this Act, the Companies shall produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a duly stamped deed of conveyance in respect of such purchase; and if the Company shall not produce such deed as aforesaid, the ad valorem stamp duty, with interest thereon at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum from the date of such completion to the date of payment, shall be recoverable from the Company, with full costs of suit, and all costs and charges attending the same."

Their Act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. cap. exciii.) (sect. 4), gives them compulsory power to acquire lands in usual terms. But sect. 39 also empowers the Company, in conjunction with the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, to purchase by agreement a certain private railway and to maintain, improve and work the same, "Provided that any such purchase shall be evidenced by a duly stamped conveyance, which shall within three months from the date of vesting" of the said private railway in their Companies be produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, mutatis mutandis as in the before-recited Act.

Then their Act of 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. cxlvi.) (sects. 40 and 41) authorises them to acquire the undertaking of the Forfar and Brechin Railway Company, on terms fixed by the Act, and sect. 42, on payment, transfers to and vests that undertaking in the Caledonian Company, as from the date of the passing of the Act, "Provided that within three months after payment of the consideration of the transfer, the Company shall produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue" a Queen's Printer's copy of the Act, duly stamped as if it were a deed of conveyance, all as provided mutatis mutandis in the first recited Act.

Now it is here to be noted in passing, that though two of these Acts at least provide for the compulsory acquisition of lands in general terms, their enactments regarding the production of a duly stamped conveyance or copy of the Act apply only to the cases of statutory vesting, or statutory confirmation and sanction of provisional agreements for purchase. And it is patent that some such provision was necessary for the protection of the revenue, because otherwise, in the case of a statutory vesting, no conveyance or transfer was necessary, and therefore nothing came into existence naturally requiring to be stamped; and in the case of lands acquired by provisional agreement scheduled to an Act, and expressly confirmed and sanctioned by it, there was always the risk that the Company would, at any rate for a period of years, if not altogether, rest content with possession on such an agreement with statutory confirmation and sanction, and take no feudal conveyance requiring to be stamped. It does not therefore appear to have been considered necessary, prior to 1895, to require production, under the same condition or penalty of conveyances of lands taken in the ordinary way by compulsory purchase, where a feudal title by conveyance would follow, as in similar voluntary transactions.

Subsequent to the passing of the Finance Act 1895 these particular clauses in protection of the revenue were dropped out of the defenders' private Acts, and I presume out of all other similar Acts. As, for instance, in the defenders' Act of 1902 (2 Ed. VII. cap. cxlvi.) where (sect. 16) compulsory powers in ordinary form are given; (sect. 17) certain prior agreements for the purchase of lands are confirmed and sanctioned; and (sect. 34) certain subordinate independent undertakings are statutorily vested in the Company, and no provision in protection of the revenue follows. Examples might be multiplied, but this example is a complete and comprehensive one.

Now the section of the General Finance Act 1895 which I have to interpret and apply (sect. 12) is as follows:—

"Where after the passing of this Act, in virtue of any Act whether passed before or after this Act, either—

(a) any property is vested by way of sale in any person; or

(b) any person is authorised to purchase property, such person shall within three months

(a) after the passing of this Act, or the date of vesting, whichever is later, or

(b) after the completion of the purchase,

as the case may be, produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue

(a) a copy of the Act printed by the Queen's Printer of Acts of Parliament, or some instrument relating to the vesting in the first case, and

(b) an instrument of conveyance of the property in the other case, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty upon a conveyance on sale of the property; and in default of such production, the duty with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum

(a) from the passing of the Act, date of vesting, or

(b) completion of the purchase, as the case may be, shall be a debt to Her Majesty from such person."

I have quoted the ipsissima verba of the Act, though the spacing and lettering is mine, to assist in its consideration.

Outer House. Lord Johnston. — Lord Advocate v. Caledonian Railway Co.

What is meant by (a), a statutory vesting by way of sale, and how the want of a formal conveyance on sale in such a case is to be supplied, is quite clear and needs no comment.

But a question of some difficulty is raised on the interpretation of the alternative expression (b), "authorised to purchase property." The Department maintains that it covers every case of purchase by a railway or other company, etc., by virtue of statutory powers, whether by agreement receiving statutory confirmation and sanction, or by exercise of compulsory powers statutorily conferred. The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that it applies only to the case of statutory confirmation and sanction of an agreement to purchase.

The defenders maintained with great force that the general provision was only the crystallising of the particular clauses in use to be inserted in private Acts, that the necessity was the same, and is the measure of the general, as it had been of the particular provisions. I did not receive any explanation from the Department of a more extended necessity or purpose, leading to a more extended interpretation. The terms of this part of the provision are no more happily chosen than are those of another part to be immediately noticed, and I feel the full force of Mr Clyde's argument. If I found it necessary for the disposal of the case to determine this question I should feel much hesitation, notwithstanding that the general expression, "authorised to purchase in virtue of any Act," is capable of covering more than merely confirmations and sanctions of provisional agreements, and might perfectly well cover acquisitions by the exercise of statutory compulsory powers. My hesitation is not diminished by the impression that the extended construction is not necessary for the protection of the revenue. There was a time in which instances occurred, and I remember of more than one in my own practice, where the railway companies in Scotland were in the earlier days of railway enterprise dilatory in taking, or the landowners in granting, conveyances of land compulsorily acquired, and both rested on possession, following on the exercise of compulsory powers and a settlement of the price. But I think that these days are past, and that railway companies and proprietors now treat compulsory purchases just like ordinary transactions, and that conveyances are taken and recorded in ordinary course.

Nor is my hesitation diminished by the difficulty of interpreting the expression "completion of the purchase." This expression is vague, and the Crown have not assisted to elucidate it. They have evidently felt the difficulty, for they have not attempted distinctly to interpret it, but have in their summons somewhat vaguely assumed that at latest it must be the date of execution of a disposition of the lands acquired. Now, according to the generally accepted doctrine, the Act which confers compulsory powers is the equivalent of an offer of the property, and the Company's notice to treat is the acceptance, and on offer and acceptance, even when the consideration has to be fixed by arbitration, a purchase is completed, past resiling on either side. But as arbitration, failing agreement to fix the consideration, must follow in compulsory purchase, and often takes months, even years, to carry to an award, before which an execution of a conveyance on sale is not possible, it is evident that the statute cannot mean to fix the date of the notice to treat as the date within three months of which an instrument of conveyance of the property duly stamped must be produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. It is not, however, easy to say what other date is intended. It must either be the arbiter's award, as I think the Crown were inclined to argue, or the execution of the conveyance. Now, once the notice to treat is given, either party can, under the Lands Clauses Act, compel arbitration proceedings resulting in the fixing of a price. And the landowner, after the award, may compel the Company to take a title (see in re Carvy Elwes Contract, L.R. (1906) 2 Ch. 143). But the Inland Revenue cannot interfere to hasten the parties. It is difficult, therefore, to see, if this is the meaning and intention of the phrase, how in such cases the assumed object of the statute is attained, if that object is the mere speedy collection of the revenue.

But assume the extended interpretation contended for by the Department, and that the completion of the purchase is, in the sense of the statute, the execution, and I think it must be added the delivery, of the conveyance, it falls now to be considered what it is that the Department demand. It is this, that conveyances on compulsory sale shall, in the matter of stamping, go through forms and ceremonies not required in the case of any other conveyances on sale.

To test the question the Department have fixed on a certain conveyance to the Caledonian Railway Co. by the trustees of the Church of Scotland, of St Columba's Gaelic Church, Glasgow, which followed on a compulsory taking and arbitration proceedings. The duty has been paid and the document has been stamped in ordinary course. But the Department says to the defenders, you must produce the conveyance again, in order that it may be examined, and entered on a register we have instituted, and be marked with a certificate we have adopted; and as a compulsitor on the Company to bring the document back to the Department, they sue for the duty already paid, with five per cent. interest from the date three months after its execution, which took place six years ago.

I thought the demand unreasonable on my own knowledge of the practice of the Department. But as I do not trust to that, I thought it proper to remit to the Depute-Keeper of the Signet to report. His report has confirmed me in thinking that whatever view may be taken of the matters I have already referred to, the Department are not justified in their demand.

If all conveyances were in use to be written on paper already stamped, then on their interpretation of the statute the Department would be entitled and bound to demand production of such documents, and I do not think the defenders would oppose the demand. But the practice is otherwise. For manifest good reasons the practice has long prevailed, for which the internal arrangements of the Department provide, of writing conveyances and all more important documents on plain paper, and then handing them in to be stamped with the proper stamp, and so giving opportunity to the party tendering the document to be stamped and the Department to come to a prima facie agreement as to the stamp to be impressed. I refer to Mr Paul's report, the details of which I need not repeat. For my purpose the gist of it is this:—A deed which it is desired to have stamped, is handed to the "deeds marker." The enquirer pencils on the left-hand top corner the amount of duty which he proposes to pay. The deeds marker examines the deed sufficiently to satisfy himself whether he can pass it for the amount so proposed. If he can do so, he initials it, and passes it on to be stamped. If he cannot, and cannot agree with the enquirer on an altered duty, he passes the deed on to the solicitor's office for consideration—not for formal adjudication, unless that is desired and an extra fee paid—but that the superior officer of the Department may consider the matter of the stamp. Whether the deed goes direct to the "stamper" or through the "check clerk" is immaterial for the present purpose. What is material is this:—In Scotland the Controller of Stamps and Taxes represents the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the "deeds marker" is an official in the Controller's department. The Commissioners cannot act personally in the matter, nor can the Controller. If the conveyance is produced to the "deeds marker" or (if he is not satisfied and submits the "deed" to the solicitor for his opinion) to the solicitor, and if the deed remains in the hands of the Inland Revenue authorities until it is stamped prima facie to their satisfaction, it appears to me that the obligation to produce it duly stamped to the Inland Revenue is reasonably complied with, for the emphasis is not on the word "duly" but on the word "produce."

Where one finds an enactment with a practical object drawn with some indefiniteness, and not altogether contemplating the customary practice alongside of which it has to be applied, I think that a reasonable application consistent with the object should be sought.

Now there is nothing in the matter of duty to differentiate conveyances to railway companies from any other conveyances. And the object of the enactment is not, I am persuaded, to enforce a compulsory adjudication of the stamp duty, as if the essence of the enactment was contained in the word "duly." For one reason, that however often the document is produced to the Commissioners, unless the stamp is formally "adjudicated" and the adjudication fee paid, the mouth of the Inland Revenue is not closed. But nevertheless the document has been as "duly stamped" as any other document which has passed through the mill of the stamp office, and the inquirer has done his duty on that behalf. The object of the enactment is to secure that the revenue from stamps is promptly collected, and if they choose, the Inland Revenue officials can secure all that in my opinion the Act intends, when the document is in their hands for stamping; and before it is given out again duly stamped, if it has not been timeously stamped they can exact interest on the duty. If they cannot trust their "deeds marker" to see to this, they have only to instruct him to pass on all such documents per aversionem to the solicitor, or to some special official, as I presume they would be passed on if the Department were warranted in insisting on the system they seek to initiate.

I have all sympathy for a public department which is in any way thwarted by members of the public in the execution of a statutory duty. But I cannot myself see, and, though I have asked for it, I have not received from the Department any satisfactory reason for their insistence in the present demand. It appears to me that in the present case, by bringing, according to recorded practice, their conveyances to the Department for stamping, and as I humbly think for "due stamping" in the sense of the statute, the defenders are putting the Department in a position to perform all their functions under the statute in a reasonable way, and that the Department is not justified in saying to them, you must take your deeds away out of this door, and you must bring them back again by that door, in order that we may keep certain registers and write certain certificates, which have no statutory warrant, and so far as I can see no statutory or other effect.

I am confirmed in this view when I consider the particular circumstances of the case and the conclusions of the summons.

Notice to treat was served on 25th November 1899. The owners intimated their claim on 8th December 1899. The oversman pronounced his award on 22nd March 1901. A conveyance was executed by the owners on 3rd June 1901. The conveyance was handed in, the duty paid, and the stamp impressed in ordinary course on 7th June 1901. The conveyance was recorded on 8th June 1901, while the action was not raised till 6th December 1906. The duty was thus paid four days after the execution of the deed, and the action not raised till five and a half years after the duty was paid.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Lord Advocate v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Now the logic of their position obliges the Department to say, there has been default, the duty and interest is due in consequence, and for that we sue. But they cannot face up to this, for they know that the duty has been paid and accepted nearly six years ago, and that they cannot recover it twice over, and have no statutory warrant for suing for interest, owing to delay in producing only, so they frame a conclusion which, however reasonable from their point of view, is not in accordance with the situation which the enactment contemplated.

I think I must therefore find that the instrument of conveyance or disposition referred to in the summons has already been produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the sense of the Finance Act 1895 (sect. 12), and therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.—10*th July* 1907.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 823; supra, p. 14.)

The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the previous reports and from the Lord Ordinary's note.

The Lord Ordinary assoilized the defenders and found no expenses due to or by either party.

Lord Johnston.—I refer in this case to my judgment of date 28th February 1907, and to that of the Second Division of the Inner House, reported 15 S.L.T. 14. When the case was formerly before me, various preliminary pleas were disposed of. But the defenders' plea to the relevancy was reserved to be discussed on the merits, and in my former judgment I intimated that the proof which appeared necessary must be a proof before answer. This, I think, was approved by the Division. When the formal interlocutor of 24th May 1907 allowing a proof was pronounced, the words "before answer" were omitted per incuriam. But both parties understood the nature of the proof and that the defenders' plea to the relevancy was reserved.

It is this plea to the relevancy which occasions me most difficulty in the case.

Taking the case of Mr Kerr's own nomination paper by itself first, Mr Hood has now been obliged to condescend upon his objections to it, and farther, to select those which, after proof led, he still maintains, and these are limited to two.

First, that the place of abode of nominator and candidate, as inserted in the nomination paper, is wanting in specification, not having "Port-Glasgow" as part of it.

Second, that in the case of one of the nominators, Peter S. Beatton, the place of abode given, viz., "Craigard," is an incorrect address.

The pursuer maintains that neither of these are good objections. But I find it necessary to consider the farther question, Suppose either or both of them are, in my opinion, bad objections, am I entitled, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, which has been sustained, to quash the election, because my opinion differs from that of the returning officer? Am I entitled, that is, to review him on the merits? That is equivalent to saying, Are these objections relevant grounds of reduction? This question is made a difficult one, chiefly by reason of the chaotic, if I may respectfully so characterise it, condition of school board election law. I confess that I do not much wonder that returning officers have difficulty in administering it, or that a court should find difficulty in reviewing their action. In order to ascertain how a school board election is regulated, one has to piece together the following: The Education Act 1872, its Schedule B; the Education Act 1878; and the Regulations and Orders of the Education Department.

The Education Act of 1872 provides (sect. 12) for the first election of school boards after the passing of the Act. The Act itself makes no provision for further elections, and does not even incorporate or give any statutory sanction to Schedule B appended to it and headed "General Rules respecting Election of Members of School Board subsequent to the first Election." It was left to the Education Act 1878, sect. 27, to remedy that omission.

The first serious difficulty is what is to be the electoral roll. Schedule B of the Act of 1872 provides (sect. 2): "The electors shall consist of all persons being of lawful age and not subject to any legal incapacity, whose names are entered on the latest valuation roll applicable to the parish or burgh, for which the Board is to be elected . . . . as owners or occupiers of lands or heritages of the annual value of not less than £4 situated within such parish or burgh, and the valuation roll or a certified copy thereof shall be conclusive evidence that the persons therein named had and continue to have the qualifications annexed to their names respectively in the said roll." Now it is apparent that the valuation roll is not the roll of voters, but only a roll out of which a roll of voters might be extracted and made up. For, first, the valuation roll is primarily a roll of heritable subjects in order of locality, and it would be practically impossible to use it as an electoral roll. In the next place, it is not confined to subjects of four pound value. And in the last place, while it contains a column for proprietor, another for tenant, and a third for occupier, and so affords the material from which a list of proprietors and occupiers, the tenant not being necessarily the occupier, could be made up, there is this serious objection to it, that no one is entered as occupier on his own return, or has any call or opportunity for having the roll corrected, so far as he is concerned, at the time of its being made up, and yet, notwithstanding that the valuation roll is not a register of voters, and is an unsatisfactory document from which to extract one, the schedule makes no provision for making up an electoral roll. But Schedule B of the Act of 1872, sect. 4, as altered by the Act of 1878, sect. 26, provides that "the triennial election of a school board for any parish or burgh shall be held at such time and in such manner and in accordance with such regulations as the Scotch Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe; and the Scotch Education Department may by order appoint or direct the appointment and make regulations as to the duties, remunerations, and expenses of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election, and make regulations respecting all other necessary things, preliminary or incidental to such election." Accordingly, such regulations have from time to time been made by the Department. But there is nothing that I can find in the current regulations of 2nd October 1905, issued by virtue of these powers, touching the making up of a roll of electors. The only reference to it is in Schedule B appended to these regulations, where with reference to parishes, though not to burghs, the returning officer is directed to provide, inter alia, a copy of the valuation roll in so far as applicable to the parish or school district. It is only in a covering circular letter to school board clerks that the Secretary to the Department informs them that under certain circumstances a separate alphabetical roll of electors may be made up, and informs them that "where a separate roll of electors has been prepared . . . . it must be deposited by the returning officer for not less than six clear days before the day of election in some convenient place or places, of which due notice shall be given, and to which any ratepayer may have reasonable access for the purposes of inspection, and in order to ascertain whether his name appears in such roll." There is not, however, the slightest provision for the rectification of the roll if objected to, though the roll itself is one which it would be by no means easy to make up correctly.

Such being the method provided for ascertaining who is an elector, the regulations of 2nd October 1905 provide (sect. 8) that, after publication of the notice of election, "but not less than fourteen clear days before the day fixed for the election, any five electors may nominate as a candidate any person being of lawful age and not subject to any legal incapacity, by sending to or delivering at the appointed place a nomination paper subscribed by such five electors as aforesaid and stating the Christian name and surname, with the place of abode and designation of each subscriber and of the candidate nominated, and the returning officer shall send forthwith notice of such nomination to each candidate."

Now by sect. 9 of the same regulations the duty of deciding as to the validity of the nomination paper is put upon the returning officer, thus: "No nomination paper shall be received after 8 p.m. of the last day upon which such paper may be received, except so far as hereinafter ordered, and no person shall be a candidate unless he has been nominated within the time and in the manner aforesaid. The returning officer shall decide whether any nomination is valid, and the returning officer's decision shall be final."

It is true that it is now settled that it was incompetent for the Department to make his decision final, yet his duty of decision as to the validity remains untouched.

The first point which I have to decide is whether after the nomination paper is lodged, if any detail is wanting or any point occurs in which it does not satisfy the returning officer (e.g., the want of the word "Port Glasgow" in the places of abode of the nominators and candidate), the returning officer would be entitled or bound to point these out in order to their being supplied or corrected. I think that the nomination paper must stand or fall as it is lodged. The nomination has to be made at, or prior to, 8 p.m. of the last nomination day. If at that point of time the nomination is invalid the candidate has not been nominated within the appointed time. An alteration of the ballot paper subsequent to its being lodged in order to cure a defect makes it a different nomination paper. Further, if the returning officer should in any way meddle in the nomination of candidates, there would be, I think, grave risk of miscarriage. He could not do so without virtually revising all papers, if he revised any. And I do not think he could well reject any after making himself party to the preparation of any or all. I should say this equally whether his intervention occurred after or before the last date for nomination. The present is a very good example of what would occur. For the intervention of the depute clerk to the school board, though he is not depute returning officer, has created a situation with which I shall have to deal in the sequel.

The next point is, On what footing is the returning officer to apply his mind to the nomination papers? The defender maintains that he is not entitled to apply his personal or local knowledge, and that as the nomination paper has to be capable of affording exact information to any one interested, it must be capable of being read with the assistance of nothing but the valuation roll. Here I think he is wrong. So far as the nominations go, primarily I think the information contained in the paper is for the returning officer, in order that he may determine who have been nominated and publish the list of candidates. Now the Departmental regulations do not admit of the details being verified by the valuation roll merely. The nominator must be an elector, and the valuation roll affords the means of ascertaining whether the nominators are electors, but it gives no assistance to determine whether their places of abode or designation are accurately stated. A man may occupy half a dozen tenements in the electoral area, and yet none of them be his place of abode. Designations are not given at all in the valuation roll, except incidentally in some cases. The returning officer must thus either apply his personal knowledge or obtain information. So far as the candidate is concerned it is different, in that he need not be an elector and that there is no restriction on his selection, except that he must be of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity. To judge on these points and also as to his proper address and designation the returning officer must draw on his own knowledge or enquire.

What amount of accuracy, then, is required? It appears to me that as there is no definite rule which can be referred to as supplying all that is necessary to be stated, it is sufficient dummodo constat de persona, and in the case of the nominator, that the persona is an elector.

This, then, leads to the question, Were the defender's objections well founded? That those he has departed from were not I am satisfied. But as to the two that remain—

First, the absence of the word "Port Glasgow" as part of the specification of the "place of abode."

In the case of the nomination I think that this was unnecessary. The information, as I have said, was primarily, if not entirely (for I am not aware that anybody else sees the nomination papers) for the returning officer. Now I think that the descriptions of these gentlemen must be read coram subjectam materiam. They were nominating for election to the School Board of Port Glasgow. The nomination paper which they signed is officially headed "Burgh of Port Glasgow," and I think that it is a reasonable inference which the returning officer was entitled and bound to draw, unless he knew to the contrary, that the place of abode, which was stated as Church Steeet, Craigard, etc., was in Port Glasgow.

But in the case of the candidate it is different. The nomination paper is for the purpose of enabling the returning officer to frame and publish the list of candidates, for the general information of the electors. I do not think that in so doing he can supplement the information of the nomination paper. Now, Mr Kerr is designed as of "Hawarden, writer." The objection to Hawarden instead of Hawarden Cottage is, I think, frivolous. But the absence of Port Glasgow is serious. Candidates may be drawn from any locality and need no local qualification. I must regard this as matter of principle. I discard, on the one hand, the fact that Mr Kerr, writer, Hawarden, was perfectly well known to the returning officer, and probably to all concerned in the election, and on the other, that there is a place, peculiarly well known to the public generally, called Hawarden elsewhere. But inasmuch as candidates may be drawn from any locality, in order that they may be identifiable, as matter of principle, the locality of their residence, as well as the name of their residence, must, in my opinion, be given adequately to specify their "place of abode."

Second, that the description of Mr Beatton's place of abode as Craigard was inaccurate. As matter of fact I think this objection was not well founded. I am satisfied on the evidence that the name "Craigard," which was first given to the tenement abutting on Barr's Brae, was extended first of all by the builder to the additional house which he built in line with it, and was afterwards publicly and generally accepted as descriptive, not of the tenement, but of this limited locality, just as much as Lilybank and many of the other names with which the returning officer was concerned, and that notwithstanding that Mr Beatton's and others of the houses subsequently received distinctive names of their own. The meaning of the name Craigard, the nature of the locality, the fact that access to the whole was got by the same flight of steps, and that the name "Craigard" was painted up in such a position as to indicate to the public that it described the whole house to which the steps gave access and not the tenement merely, all lead to this, and it is confirmed by evidence of general understanding. I think that, if the defender had been as astute to find objection to the other candidates' papers as to Mr Kerr, he might have found quite as good reason as this for rejecting most of them.

But before leaving Mr Kerr's case, it is, I think, right to consider how far I am entitled in the exercise of my jurisdiction to consider these objections on the merits. This is matter of great difficulty, from the want of any distinct election code. The Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act 1890, sect. 30, ex hypothesi gives no assistance, and I find it very difficult to formulate any rule satisfactory to my mind for the delimitation in application of the Court's jurisdiction in such cases. I think that there can be no doubt that, when an objection raises a matter of principle, as in the case of the necessity of a full address to define the nominators or the candidate, such an objection is one which the Court ought to entertain, even though their judgment may go to invalidate a whole election (cf. Sheldon v. Fletcher, 1847, L.J. 17 C.P. 34). Even so where the question touches the electoral qualification of an individual nominator. But where the issue depends on some small detail in fact and opinion, as whether an address is accurate or sufficient, I confess that I at least doubt the propriety of the Court, assuming that there was no improper bias on the part of the returning officer, entertaining such question when the result might be the overturning a popular election.

So far as regards Mr Kerr's paper. With reference to Mr Blair's, the "Port-Glasgow" objection, I need not again refer to it. The other objection is that James A. Mackenzie, clerk, Springhill, one of Mr Blair's nominators, is not to be found on the valuation roll. It appears that James Allan Mackenzie, whose abode is 8 Springhill, and who was a cashier, and is now a clerk, is entered in the valuation roll as James Mackenzie, cashier, occupant of 8 Springhill. The mistake has arisen, probably, from his signing James Mackenzie in his business and James A. Mackenzie in his private capacity. There is no doubt as to the identity of the James Mackenzie on the valuation roll and the James A. Mackenzie who signs the nomination paper. But inasmuch as the valuation roll is the only fixed point afforded in the case of a school board election, and that Mr James A. Mackenzie does not appear on that roll, I should be prepared to uphold his rejection by the returning officer as a nominator (Moorehouse, 1885, L.R. 15 Q.B.D. 273). This also is a point which I think the Court would be justified in entertaining, in review of the returning officer's decision, as it depends on the general question whether, in the matter of the name of the elector and nominator, the valuation roll is conclusive.

There remains to consider the question whether, even if there has not been corruption, there has been the same even-handed justice meted out to Messrs Kerr and Blair in this matter as to other candidates, and, if there has not, what is the effect. I set aside at once any idea of corruption, and yet I do not think that Messrs Kerr and Blair have been treated in the same way as the other candidates or some of them. I cannot help feeling that there was no desire on the part of the defender to see them on the Board, and every desire to avoid the necessity of an election. The defender who, pro hac vice, was the returning officer, is really the clerk to the School Board. He quite properly left the reception of the nomination papers to his subordinate, the depute clerk, who was not really, though many persons supposed him to be in consequence, the depute returning officer. The business of the returning officer, or of his subordinate, was to receive the nomination papers—to give access to all who demanded it to the valuation roll. But I do not think that either was justified in criticising papers, and suggesting or making corrections. It is clear to me that if Mr Hood had not had a pretty good idea that there was no particular wish to see Messrs Kerr and Blair oust any of the sitting Board, these gentlemen, when they lodged their papers, would have received a hint, as others had done, that if they wanted to satisfy one of the pronounced views of the returning officer they must add "Port-Glasgow." Justified as he was in leaving certain matters to the depute clerk, the returning officer must be responsible for his action. And though I cannot find enough in that action to upset the election, there is, I think, enough to affect the question of expenses, and I think I do justice if I give expenses to neither side.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Eadie and Others v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

MUNICIPAL ACT, 1879 (42 & 43 VICT. CAP. CXXIII.), SECT. 10.

This was a petition and complaint at the instance of certain burgesses of the city of Glasgow challenging the application by the Corporation of Glasgow of any part of the common good of the burgh towards payment of expenses incurred by the Corporation in promoting legislation for the taxation of land values. The preliminary plea was taken by the compearing respondents that the objection was not timeously taken.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the preliminary plea as to the timeousness of the objection, and ordained the respondents to produce in process a detailed account, with relative vouchers, of the item of expenditure in dispute.

Lord Johnston. — George Eadie and others, burgesses of Glasgow, in this petition presented to the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, challenge the application by the Corporation of Glasgow of any part of the common good of the burgh towards payment of expenses incurred by the Corporation in promoting legislation for the taxation of land values. The particular entry in the Abstract Statement of the Revenue and Expenditure of the Common Good of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow for the year ending 31st May 1906, No. 23 of process, to which objection is taken, is to be found on page 16 of the Abstract, and is this:

Taxation of Land Values (Suspense Account), including £1142 9s. 6d. spent during the year £2457 2 11

This entry appears under a heading of open accounts on the credit side of the abstract.

The Corporation, or rather those members who appear to defend, for a large number have disclaimed the defence, state the preliminary plea that the objection was not timeously taken, and that it is now, by virtue of sect. 10 of Sir William Rae's Act of 1822, incompetent to complain to the Court in regard to any entry in the account for the year ending 31st May 1906.

I have heard an exhaustive argument on this preliminary point, but am prepared without further delay to dispose of it against the contention of the Corporation. I think that the objection was timeously stated, and that there is nothing to prevent my entertaining the complaint on the merits.

As the contention was seriously maintained, and as the Corporation intimated that they desired an authoritative construction of the statutes bearing upon this point, which is doubtless of importance to the finance department of the city, it is right that I should explain at some length my reasons for coming to the above conclusion.

There was passed in 1900 the Act 63 & 64 Vict. cap. 49 for Consolidating and Amending the Law relating to the Election and Proceedings of Town Councils in Scotland. That Act, which was intended to be of general application, repealed a great number of previous statutes connected with these matters with a view to the codification as well as the supplementing of their provisions, and in particular it repealed the following Acts bearing upon the particular point here in question, viz.—the Act of 1822 (3 Geo. IV. cap. 91), for Regulating the Mode of Accounting for the Common Good and Revenues of the Royal Burghs of Scotland, commonly known as Sir William Rae's Act; and the Act of 1833 (2 & 3 Wm. IV. cap. 76), for Altering and Amending the Laws for the Election of Magistrates and Councils of the Royal Burghs in Scotland, commonly called the Burgh Reform Act. Having repealed these statutes, the Act of 1900, in sects. 91–99, enacted a code for regulating the accounting for the corporate property of burghs, including not only property heritable and moveable vested in the Council, but also all rates or assessments levied, and all money received and expended by or on account of the Council. One of its most important provisions (sects. 94 and 95) related to the audit of the burgh accounts and the securing the appointment of independent auditors by placing the appointment in the hands of the Secretary for Scotland. Another (sect. 96) related to the Council's approval and publication of their annual accounts with a view to their inspection by ratepayers or electors interested, and an appeal to the Sheriff of the county by any such ratepayer or elector dissatisfied with the account or any item therein was provided. But, unfortunately, the influence of the five larger burghs in Scotland interfered with the generality of its application, and enabled them to obtain in sect. 109 a virtual exemption from the general Act. That section provided that, notwithstanding anything in the Act contained, it should be in the power of the town council of any of these five larger burghs, including Glasgow, by resolution passed within twelve months of the date of the Act, to declare that any sections or subsections of the Act relating, inter alia, to "accounts and corporate property specified in such resolution, shall not be applicable to such burgh, and that in lieu thereof the corresponding sections or subsections, if any, of an Act or Acts applying to such burgh, repealed by this Act, which sections or subsections shall be specified in the resolution, shall notwithstanding such repeal remain in force or revive within the burgh."

Now two of the statutes applying to the burgh of Glasgow (as they were general statutes) repealed by the Act were the above-mentioned Sir William Rae's Act of 1822 and the Burgh Reform Act of 1833, and they contained corresponding sections relating to accounts and corporate property. Accordingly, within the statutory period, the Corporation of Glasgow resolved that inter alia sects. 91 to 97 of the Act of 1900 should not be applicable to Glasgow, and that in lieu thereof the following corresponding sections should remain in force or revive, viz., sects. 1 to 4 and 9 and 10 of Sir William Rae's Act of 1822, and sect. 32 of the Burgh Reform Act of 1833.

Accordingly, the statutory provisions with regard to the accounts of the city of Glasgow are to be found in these sections, subject to certain qualifications by the city's local Acts.

It must be borne in mind that when Sir William Rae's Act passed in 1822 the councils of Scottish Royal Burghs were close corporations, perpetuated by the system of co-option, and that, disregarding charitable mortification vested in the Corporation, the revenue was substantially derived from the common good; and further, that, although the Burgh Reform Act of 1833 restored or created the system of free election, the revenue of burghs still continued at that date to be similarly derived. But Sir William Rae's Act contemplated that there might be revenues derived from other sources, as from cess or any local tax or imposition, and provided accordingly. So also did the Burgh Reform Act of 1833, for it calls for an account, not merely of property but of revenues generally, and thus the Act of 1900 amplified to "rates or assessments levied and money received or expended by or on account of the Council." All these statutes, therefore, contemplated that the accounts they respectively required should be comprehensive. But in Glasgow separate accounts for separate funds are required by local statutes (see the Glasgow Police Act 1866, sects. 23 et seq., and the Glasgow Corporation Act 1884, sect. 44). Hence it has come to pass that the accounts of the common good of Glasgow are in use to be kept separate. And it will be found that the accounts with which we are here concerned are confined to the common good of the burgh.

That being premised, I would now draw attention to the enactments of Sir William Rae's Act of 1822. It proceeded on the preamble that it was expedient that regular accounts should be annually stated and exhibited of the Common Good of the Royal Burghs of Scotland, shewing the property and funds as well as the incumbrances affecting the same and the receipts and disbursements in every year, and that provision should be made for preventing and redressing any error or wrong that may be committed in the administration of the common good, and therefore enacted (sect. 1) that "a particular account of the common good and revenues of every royal burgh in Scotland made up to the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh shall be annually stated and deposited in the manner directed by this Act." This account was to be certified by the provost in terms of a statutory certificate.

It was then enacted (sect. 3) that "every such annual account shall be deposited in the office of the town clerk of the burgh to which it appertains within three months after the annual election of the magistrates thereof, and such account shall remain there for thirty days after the expiration of the said three months, open to the inspection of the burgesses, who may state objections thereto in writing either during that time or within two months after the expiration of the said thirty days, and be entitled to call in writing for the production of any particular vouchers." And it was then further enacted that if the objector or objectors were not satisfied "it shall and may be lawful for any three or more burgesses of such burgh within three calendar months after the expiration of said thirty days to make complaint in writing to the Barons of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland."

I must here note that the annual election of the magistrates is not a loose expression intending to refer to the election of the Council. The Act in several passages carefully distinguishes between the Council as a whole and the magistrates, and when it refers to the annual election of magistrates it means, in my opinion, the election of magistrates properly so called, by the Council. Under this statute, therefore, the maximum period for the lodging objections to the burgh accounts was three calendar months plus thirty days plus two calendar months, and for complaining to the Court of Exchequer one calendar month more. And it is admitted that the petitioners' letter of objections of 7th May 1907 and their subsequent complaint to this Court, were timeous, if the limitation of time imposed is to be found in this statute. I should have said that the Act (sect. 10) further enacted "that in the event of no complaint being made to any annual account within the time here limited, it shall not be competent thereafter to complain to such Court in regard to such account."

But these matters do not rest on this statute alone. The Burgh Reform Act of 1833 provided by sect. 32, which, as above mentioned, notwithstanding its repeal, remains in force or is revived quoad Glasgow, "that the existing magistrates and councils in all royal burghs shall on or before the 15th day of October in the present and in all future years make up a distinct state of their affairs . . . . . containing an account of all the funds, properties, and revenues in their administration, and of all their transactions in relation to such funds, properties, and revenues, since they came into office, which account shall be brought down as nearly as may be to the 15th day of October and shall be kept in the town clerk's or treasurer's office for the inspection of any of the registered electors from the said 15th day of October down to the time of election, and a full and distinct abstract of the said account, with a balance sheet containing all necessary particulars, shall be printed and published by the said magistrates on or before the 20th day of the said month of October."

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

Eadie and Others v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

This is the whole provision contained in the Act of 1833 regarding corporate property and accounts, and it is quite clear that its provisions had a totally different purpose from and did not supersede those of Sir William Rae's Act of eleven years previous. The object of that Act was to secure honest and accurate accounting, the exposure of the burgh accounts to the inspection of the burgesses, and their correction, if necessary, by the Court of Exchequer. But the object of the Burgh Reform Act of 1833 was electoral merely. In contemplation of the annual election in the month of November, it provided for the inspection of the burgh accounts, not by burgesses with a view to correction, but by registered electors, clearly because the disclosures of the burgh accounts for the past year had or might have a material bearing on the question of the election and re-election of candidates. And consequently the Act of 1833 contained no provision for objection or complaint to the Court of Exchequer or any other authority. Hence I am clearly of opinion that, though there may have been an awkward overlapping of dates, involving the statutory deposit of the same accounts on two different dates, for two different purposes, and with entirely different consequences, that is no possible reason why the important and salutary provisions of the former statute of 1822 should be held as virtually abrogated by those of the later statute of 1833.

Nor do I think that this virtual appeal is affected by the qualification introduced into the Act of 1833 by the local Glasgow Municipal Act of 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. cap. cxxiii.). This Act (sect. 10) provides that the Council may cause the state of affairs which they are required to make up annually on or before 15th October by sect. 32 of the Act of 1833, "to be made up as at the 31st day of May in each year, with the annual accounts or statements of the various other trusts under their administration, and the said 31st day of May shall be substituted for the said 15th day of October." Pausing there and reading sect. 10 of the local Act of 1879 into sect. 32 of the General Act of 1833, it only amounts to this, that the Council shall on or before 31st May in each year make up a state of their affairs brought down as near as possible to that date, which account shall be kept in the town clerk or treasurer's office from the said 31st May down to the time of the election, and an abstract shall be printed and published on or before 20th October. The result is merely to anticipate the date of closing the burgh's accounts for the year, and to subject them to the inspection of the registered electors for a very much longer period. But as in my opinion the provisions of sect. 32 of the Act of 1833, in their original form, in no way abrogated the provisions of Sir William Rae's Act of 1822, neither do they do so where qualified by sect. 10 of the local Act of 1879.

But then the last mentioned section concludes: "And no other annual state of affairs or account than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up by them." The only result, so far as I can see, of this latter provision is to remove any doubts as to whether two different accounts, one under the Act of 1822, and the other under the Act of 1833 as modified by that of 1879, were required. If before there was any doubt on this subject, for the future one account only was required to satisfy the provisions of both sets of enactments. But this does not result in the provisions for its exhibition to the registered electors, for the purposes of the Burgh Reform Act of 1833, superseding the necessity of its exhibition to the burgesses for the purposes and under the conditions of Sir William Rae's Act of 1822. I am here concerned with the purposes of the last-mentioned Act only, and for these purposes the calendar or series of dates specified in that Act still regulates procedure. And as on that hypothesis it is admitted that the objections and complaint now before me are timeous, I must repel the preliminary objections stated for the Corporation, and I think that the best step which I could take at this period of the session to advance the process is to ordain the Corporation at or prior to the first box-day in vacation to produce in process a detailed account, with relative vouchers, of the item on page 16 of their Abstract of Accounts, No. 23 of process, which is the subject of the objection and complaint.—19*th July* 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Low and Ardwall.)

148. Johnstone's Trustees v. Johnstone's Trustees.

Succession—Will—Mutual Settlement by Husband and Wife—Revocability—Gifts by Each Spouse of Liferent to Survivor and of Residue to Children of Marriage—Questions of Difficulty Whether Certain Subjects Belonged to Husband or Wife—Mutual Settlement Held Irrevocable Except by Joint Act of Spouses.

Special Case.

On 17th April 1879 George Johnstone, tailor, Dalbeattie, and Mrs Margaret Bell or Johnstone his wife, executed a mutual settlement the material clauses of which were as follows :—

I, the said George Johnstone, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of my said wife, Margaret Bell or Johnstone, in case she shall survive me, in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, All and Sundry lands and heritages, long leasehold subjects, goods and gear, debts, and sums of money, household furniture and others, and in general my whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal of what kind or nature soever, or wheresoever situated, which shall belong and be addebted to me at the time of my decease. . . . And in like manner, I, the said Margaret Bell or Johnstone, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of the said George Johnstone, in case he shall survive me, in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, All and Sundry lands and heritages, and in general my whole estste, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of what kind or nature soever or wheresoever situated which shall belong and be addebted to me at my decease. . . . And on the death of the longest liver of us the said George Johnstone and Margaret Bell or Johnstone, we hereby each agree and declare that the whole remainder of our estates, heritable and moveable, or such part thereof as may not have been sold and used by the survivor of us in virtue of the powers hereinbefore conferred upon us, shall be disposed of as follows . . . . the free residue shall be realised, and the free proceeds thereof shall be equally divided as soon as practicable among our children . . . . and the survivors and survivor of them, declaring always that the lawful issue of such of our said children who may predecease shall be entitled to their parent's share. . . . And we revoke and recal all settlements and deeds mortis causa heretofore executed by us or either of us, and we declare the same null and void, and we hereby reserve to ourselves full power to alter or revoke these presents during our joint lives.

Mr Johnstone died on 31st December 1902. Mrs Johnstone died on 24th August 1905, leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated 11th June 1900, which bore to revoke all previous mortis causa deeds executed by the testator, but to which Mr Johnstone was not a party. Mrs Johnstone also left a codicil dated 3rd July 1903.

The trustees under the mutual settlement were the first parties to this special case. The trustees under Mrs Johnstone's trust disposition and settlement were the second parties.

The estate of the spouses included a deposit receipt for £500 with the Union Bank of Scotland in name of Mrs Margaret Bell, and also certain leasehold subjects in Dalbeattie which were let on long lease to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent.

The first and second queries in the special case (which the Court found it unnecessary to answer) raised the questions whether (1) the leasehold subjects and (2) the deposit receipt belonged to Mr or to Mrs Johnstone.

The third question as amended was as follows :—

3. Was the said mutual disposition, assignation, and settlement validly revoked by the said Mrs Margaret Johnstone's trust disposition and settlement?

[2nd Div.

Johnstone's Trs. v. Johnstone's Trs.

The first parties maintained that the mutual settlement could not be revoked except by the joint act of the spouses. They cited: Kidd v. Kidds, 1863, 2 M. 227; Mudie v. Clough, 1896, 23 R. 1074; Craich's Trs. v. Mackie, 1870, 8 M. 898; Croll's Trs. v. Alexander, 1895, 22 R. 677; Robertson's Trs. v. Bond's Trs., 1900, 2 F. 1097.

The second parties maintained that the mutual settlement, apart from the liferent given to Mr Johnstone, was revocable by Mrs Johnstone, and had been revoked by the trust disposition and settlement. They cited Traquair v. Martin, 1872, 11 M. 22.

The Court answered the third question as amended in the negative, and found it unnecessary to answer the first and second questions.

Lord Low.—My Lords, the first and second questions which are put in this special case raise points of considerable difficulty, on which I should not be prepared to express an opinion without further consideration. But the third question appears to me to raise a sufficiently clear issue, and, in the view I take of it, the answer to that question will be sufficient to dispose of the special case.

The point raised by the third question is, whether the mutual disposition, assignation and settlement of 17th April 1879 was validly revoked by a settlement which Mrs Johnstone subsequently made?

Looking to the circumstances under which the mutual settlement was executed, to the facts that no antenuptial marriage contract had been entered into between the spouses, and that the whole funds possessed by them were in a position which might well have given rise to questions after their death, it was very natural that they should have come to an agreement as to the disposal of their joint estate. That, in my opinion, is what they actually did. Each spouse agreed to give the liferent of his or her estate to the other in the event of survivance. It is not disputed that that was a remuneratory arrangement which amounted to a contract. Then the spouses agreed and declared that on the death of the survivor the whole residue of their estates should be divided equally among their ten children. It was argued that that provision was purely testamentary and could be revoked by either spouse quoad his or her estate. If the gift of the residue had been to strangers it might very well have been regarded as being only testamentary, but it is different when the object of the gift was to provide for the children of the marriage. That is a matter upon which it is natural and customary that spouses should come to an agreement, and I regard the whole settlement as being a family arrangement which neither of the spouses could revoke without the consent of the other. It is further not without significance that the words of the settlement are that the parties "agree and declare" that the residue shall be divided among the whole children. Accordingly I think that we should answer the third question in the negative.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree. The point raised by the third question is whether the mutual settlement executed by Mr and Mrs Johnstone on 17th April 1879 was contractual or merely testamentary. I have no doubt that it was contractual and could not be revoked except by the joint act of the spouses during their lifetime. No such joint revocation was made. The position of the heritable and moveable estates in question at the said date was that the heritable subjects were held under a 999-year lease, and, though I do not wish to express an opinion on the matter, would appear to have been vested in the husband, while the sum to which the wife succeeded as the share of the estate of her father, fell under her husband's jus mariti, subject to his making reasonable provision for her maintenance if a claim therefor were made on her behalf, as provided for by The Conjugal Rights Amendment Act 1861, sect. 16. Now, reasonable provision was made by the mutual settlement by which, in short, the spouses settled their whole affairs inter se, each conferring some benefit on the other and both departing from their strict legal rights. That being so, it is, I think, vain to contend that the settlement could be revoked by the survivor. I therefore agree that the third question should be answered in the negative, but I think the words "quoad her property" at the end of the question should be omitted. In this view of the case it becomes unnecessary to answer the first and second questions.

SHERIFF COURT.

(Sheriff-Substitute Davidson and Sheriff Guthrie at Glasgow.)

149. Harrison v. The School Board of Glasgow.

REPARATION — NEGLIGENCE — LIABILITY OF SCHOOL BOARD FOR INJURY CAUSED TO SCHOLAR BY TEACHER—EDUCATION—DUNCAN V. FINDLATER, 1839, M'L. AND ROB. 911, DISCUSSED.

In this case a father, as tutor for his child, raised an action against the Glasgow School Board for damages, averring that his child, who was a pupil in one of their schools, had been injured through the negligence of one of the teachers in that school. The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the action was incompetent against them. The Sheriff-Substitute (Davidson) issued the following interlocutor and note:—

Glasgow, 23rd July 1907.—Having heard parties' procurators on the closed record and considered the cause, Sustains the first plea in law for the defenders; dismisses the action and decerns; etc.

Note.—This is an action in which the pursuer sues for injury done to his child through the throwing down of a pen by one of the teachers in a school under the jurisdiction of the School Board of Glasgow, and he calls the School Board as defenders. The relevancy of the averments depends on the responsibility attachable to such a body as the defenders for the negligence of a teacher appointed by them. If they were private proprietors of a school, I can have no doubt that an action would lie against them in similar circumstances; and if the injury complained of had been done to an outside party I think it would be difficult to affirm that no action could lie against them. But this is not a private school, nor is the person, injury to whom is alleged, an outside party. The School Board are a local authority set up by Parliament for carrying out the intentions of the Education Act. They are under the authority of the Board of Education, to whom they are responsible for the efficient administration of the Act. In pursuance of their statutory duty they erect schools, appoint teachers, and make provision for the education of children. After a careful perusal of the opinions expressed by the learned judges in Tozeland v. West Ham Union [1907], 1 K.B. 920, I am unable to distinguish between that case and this. Every point which was made for the defendants in Tozeland's case, and which influenced the Court in non-suiting the plaintiff, is present here. The School Board are acting purely in their ministerial capacity in the appointment of teachers and in educating scholars. They do these things under statute, but they are not supposed to insure against injury the children who come to their school, just as the guardians do not insure the paupers to whom they administer relief from injury. I take it that the decision in Tozeland's case is conclusive in regard to such an action as this; and therefore I have sustained the first plea in law for the defenders.

The pursuer having appealed, the Sheriff (Guthrie) adhered to the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor and added the following note:—

Note.—The case is difficult, and I have anxiously considered it in connection with the case cited by Sheriff Davidson and various cases relating to the responsibility of public authorities, public officers, and statutory trustees. The cases following on Duncan v. Findlater, 1839, M'L. and Rob. 911, and altering the law supposed to have been laid down there, such as Mersey Docks Trs. v. Gibbs, 1866, 1 H.L. 93, are full of difficulty notwithstanding the explanation of Lord President Inglis in Virtue v. Alloa Police Commissioners, 1873, 1 R. 285, owing to the varying and somewhat confusing grounds of judgment expressed by the different judges. But I think that in the present question there is a satisfactory reason for adhering to Sheriff Davidson's interlocutor in the principle that a public servant is not responsible for the negligence of those who are in the same employment as himself. This rule is recognised in Mr Justice Blackburn's exhaustive opinion in the Mersey Docks case, followed by the House of Lords. The public school teacher is not a servant of the School Board, though paid and liable to be dismissed by it, but both are servants of the community. This it is which accounts for the immunity of police authorities and other public officials from actions on account of the delicts or negligence of their subordinates. It is often difficult to distinguish the cases in which there is and is not liability, but this is similar to the case of a claim for fault or negligence by a police constable or a postman in the performance of his duty, where, even apart from special statutes, action lies only against him and not against his superior officer or the police authority. The rule is well expressed by Guthrie Smith on Damages (2nd ed.), p. 305, although the authorities in his note are insufficient; see also Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 1891, 18 R. 825, and Muirhead on Municipal and Police Government (2nd ed.), p. 261; Glegg on Reparation (2nd ed.), pp. 528 et seq.—9th October 1907.

Special Case.

The late James Ranken of Glenlogan and Whitehill, in the county of Ayr, died in 1848, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

The material clauses of the settlement were as follows:—

My said trustees . . . . shall divide the clear annual income of my whole estate before conveyed into ten equal shares, and that half-yearly as the same shall be realised . . . . (here followed directions for the disposal of the income) . . . . and on the failure by death of all the parties to whom I have directed a share or shares of the income of my property to be paid, I direct my trustees to convey and pay over the fee of my whole property, heritable and moveable, to the person who shall on that event taking place be heir-male of George Ranken of Whitehill, my father, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever.

The case stated:—

1. The first parties are the trustees now acting under said trust disposition and settlement.

3. The party of the second part is at present heir male of the said George Ranken of Whitehill. He is also heir at law of the testator. He is also the eldest son of the testator's nephew, George Ranken, mentioned in his trust disposition and settlement and now deceased, and as such is at present in receipt of certain shares of the income of the testator's estate. The parties of the third part are the persons by whom the liferents of the remaining shares of income are at present enjoyed.

4. The trust estate under the management of the first parties consists of two landed properties—Glenlogan and Whitehill — which are situated about fifteen miles apart. Both of these estates contain coal of considerable value. At the date of the testator's death the coal in the estate of Glenlogan was being worked, and it has continued to be worked ever since. The coal in the estate of Whitehill had not been worked or let before the testator's death. It was recently let by the first parties for a fixed rent of £200 or royalties, and the said fixed rent is now being paid to the first parties. The said coal has not yet been worked by the tenants. They are also tenants of an adjoining property, upon which they have a pit, through which they propose to work the coal in Whitehill. It is not expected, however, that they will begin to work said coal for a considerable time to come.

5. In these circumstances a question has arisen as to the disposal of the mineral rents and lordships of Whitehill. The parties of the first and second part maintain that as the minerals of Whitehill had never been worked prior to the death of the testator, and as his trust disposition and settlement contains no direction to work them, the rents and lordships payable therefor do not fall to be paid over to the parties entitled to the income. The parties of the first part maintain further that said rents and lordships being the proceeds of the corpus of the estate are in their nature capital, and fall to be retained by them with a view to being paid over to the person ultimately entitled to conveyance of the estate. The party of the second part further maintains that said shares of income derived from the rents and lordships payable in respect of the minerals of Whitehill are not disposed of by the testator in the circumstances which have occurred, and have fallen into intestacy, and that he, as heir at law of the testator, for the time being, is meantime entitled thereto. The parties of the third part maintain that said mineral rents and lordships are income of the estate, and fall to be divided and paid over to them and the second party accordingly. Separatim, they contend that so long as the coal in Whitehill remains unworked they are entitled to the fixed rent paid by the tenants in respect of the tenancy of said minerals.

Ranken's Trustees v. Ranken.

The following Questions of Law, inter alia, were submitted:—

3. Do said mineral rents and lordships form part of the corpus of the estate, and do they accordingly fall to be retained by the first parties for the purpose of being ultimately paid over to the person entitled to a conveyance of the estate?
4. Is the accumulation of said rents and lordships struck at by the Thellusson Act, and do they accordingly fall to be paid over in the meantime to the second party as possessing for the time the character of heir at law of the testator, and heir of George Ranken, entitled to conveyance of the estate?

The Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. III. cap. 98), sect. 1, provides:

No person or persons shall after the passing of this Act, by any deed or deeds, surrender or surrenders, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated .... [for any longer term than the terms set forth in the section].

By the Entail Amendment Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36), sect. 41, this provision was made applicable to heritable property in Scotland.

Argued for the First Parties: (1) Minerals were partes soli and mineral rents were truly part of the corpus of the estate (Campbell v. Campbell's Trs., 1883, 10 R. H.L. 65, affd. 9 R. 725; Gowans v. Christie, 1873, 11 M. H.L. 1, per Lord Cairns at p. 12). No doubt there was an exception in the case of minerals which had been worked during the lifetime of the testator. But there was no case of that kind here. There was no difference between a fixed rent and lordships. It was immaterial that no part of the minerals had been taken away. (2) The rents being capital, not income, there was no accumulation of income which could be struck at by the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. III. cap. 98, sect. 1, made applicable to heritable property in Scotland by 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 41).

Argued for the Second Party: The second party adopted the argument of the first parties to the effect that the rents were capital. But there was no power to work minerals in the settlement. Accordingly the rents were undisposed of, and went to the second party as heir at law (In re Scarth, 1879, L.R. 10 Ch. D. 499). (2) No coal having been taken away, there was no diminution of the capital value of the land. Accordingly, this was an accumulation struck at by the Thellusson Act, and the rents fell to be paid to the second party as the party who would have been entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of the estate if accumulation had not been directed.

Argued for the Third Parties: No coal having been taken away, it followed that the fixed rent was a return from heritable property, which did not diminish the capital value of that property. It was therefore income and not capital, and fell to be paid to the third parties (Ross's Trs. v. Nicol, 1902, 5 F. 146).

The Court answered the third question in the affirmative and the fourth question in the negative.

Lord Low.—I think this case is ruled by the decision in the case of Campbell v. Campbell's Trs. in the House of Lords. That case established the rule that where a testator leaves the income or liferent of his estate to certain persons, the income to which the beneficiaries are entitled includes the produce of any minerals which were worked during the lifetime of the testator, but does not include the produce of mines which were opened after his death. No doubt there may be a modification of this rule, if the special terms of the trust deed require it, and shew that it was the intention of the testator to include minerals that might be worked in future. But here the trust deed simply directs the trustees to divide the income among certain beneficiaries. Therefore I have no doubt that the rule laid down in Campbell's case applies, and that the rents in question do not fall within the income directed to be divided among the beneficiaries. I accordingly suggest that the third question in the case should be answered in the affirmative.

The only other question which requires an answer is the fourth, and that is whether the accumulations of the said rents and lordships is struck at by the Thellusson Act. Now I think the answer to the one question solves the other, because if we answer the third question in the affirmative, on the ground that these rents are capital and not income, it follows that they cannot be struck at by the Thellusson Act, which refers to income only. Therefore, I think that the Thellusson Act has no possible application to this case, and that the fourth question ought to be answered in the negative.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur with my brother Lord Low and have little to add. It has been argued that the rents in question do not fall under the rule laid down in the case of Campbell because the minerals are not being worked and are still in the ground, and that although the rents were to be handed over to the liferenters, the capital value of the estate would remain undiminished, as no coal has been removed. With regard to this argument I have to observe that in entering on a mineral lease the parties take into consideration the time when the working of the minerals is likely to be begun, the propinquity of such minerals to pits already opened, and so on, and the parties having these matters before them, adjust the rents and lordships and the periods when they shall become payable accordingly. But that does not alter the fact that the only consideration for which the rents are paid is coal under the soil and forming pars soli, whatever the arrangement as to the time or manner of the rents being paid or the minerals being worked. Accordingly I think that the argument to which I have adverted is ill founded, and that it should be rejected. I hold that the rents are part of the consideration given for the coal in the estate, whether it is worked immediately after the lease is signed or after the lapse of a period of years, and that therefore these rents, whenever paid, fall under the rule laid down in the case of Campbell, and must be kept in the hands of the trustees as forming part of the fee of the landed estate, and not paid over to the liferenters.

Francesco v. de Meo.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Peebles.

This was an action brought by Francesco Don Francesco, confectioner and ice-cream merchant, Peebles, against Onofrio de Meo, confectioner and ice-cream merchant there, to obtain (1) interdict against the defender carrying on business as a confectioner or ice-cream merchant in Peebles, and (2) decree for the sum of £150.

The pursuer averred:—

Cond. 3. On 13th June 1904 a verbal agreement was come to between the parties whereby the defender agreed to sell, and the pursuer agreed to purchase, the stock-in-trade, fittings, and goodwill of the [defender's] business at the price of £150 (the stock-in-trade and fittings being valued at £50, and the goodwill at £100) . . . . and in respect of said price the defender undertook not to compete with the pursuer in business in Peebles under a penalty of £150.

Cond. 4. Said verbal agreement was repeated in the presence of witnesses at a meeting between the parties in Edinburgh on 26th August 1904, and was reduced to writing and signed by the parties on that date before said witnesses. Both pursuer and defender are Italians, and the document was executed in the Italian language, and is herewith produced.

The defender averred:—

Ans. 4. Admitted that the pursuer and defender are both Italians, and that on 26th August 1904 they reduced the terms of the sale and purchase of said business to writing in their own language as after explained. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the agreement between the parties was contained in two documents each signed by them, one containing an offer or agreement by defender to sell said business to pursuer for £150 on certain conditions as regards payment of the purchase price, which was delivered to pursuer, and the other containing an acknowledgment by pursuer that he had bought said business (the signing by him of the first mentioned document being held by the parties as an acceptance by him of said offer), and agreeing to fulfil the defender's conditions under certain penalties therein expressed, if incurred, which was delivered to the defender, said two documents together forming the contract of sale between the parties and shewing exactly its terms. A copy of said last mentioned document with English translation thereof interlined in red is herewith produced and referred to. Further explained and averred that said first mentioned document did not contain the last paragraph appearing in the writing, No. 3 of process, lodged by pursuer, the accurate translation of which into English is:—"I, Onofrio De Meo, bind myself not to serve in any other ice-cream shop in Peebles, and if I do so the party is entitled to all the money paid. This space remains for anything to be put afterwards." Further also explained and averred that said writing, No. 3 of process, founded on by pursuer, is . . . . insufficiently impressed with stamp duty as a conveyance on sale of property according to the Stamp Act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. cap. 39, sect. 54).

The pursuer lodged the following translations of the documents referred to on record:—

Translation by Pursuer of Document No. 3 of Process.

The defender pleaded, inter alia:—

"1. Said writing, forming No. 3 of process, being insufficiently stamped in terms of law, pursuer ought to be called upon to implement the provision contained in the Stamp Act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. cap. 39, sect. 14) anent the production of insufficiently stamped deeds in judicial proceedings; and failing such implement the action should be dismissed with expenses."

The Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. cap. 39), sect. 59, sub-sect. 1, provides:—

"Any contract or agreement . . . . made in Scotland, with or without any clause of registration . . . . for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares or merchandise, or stock, or marketable securities, or any ship or vessel, or part interest, share, or property of or in any ship or vessel, shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty, to be paid by the purchaser, as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold."

Sect. 14 provides:—

"(1.) Upon the production of an instrument chargeable with any duty as evidence in any court of civil judicature in any part of the United Kingdom, or before any arbitrator or referee, notice shall be taken by the judge, arbitrator, or referee of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp thereon; and if the instrument is one which may legally be stamped after the execution thereof, it may, on payment to the officer of the Court whose duty it is to read the instrument, or to the arbitrator or referee, of the amount of the unpaid duty, and the penalty payable on stamping the same, and of a further sum of £1, be received in evidence, saving all just exceptions on other grounds.

"(4.) Save as aforesaid, an instrument executed in any part of the United Kingdom, or relating, wheresoever executed, to any property situate, or to any matter or thing done or to be done, in any part of the United Kingdom, shall not, except in criminal proceedings, be given in evidence, or be available for any purpose whatever, unless it is duly stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time when it was first executed."

On 27th December 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Orphoot) granted decree against the defender for the sum of £150.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Maconochie), who on 18th January 1907 dismissed the appeal and of new granted decree against the defender for the sum of £150.

The defender appealed and argued: The contract of sale was contained in the documents Nos. 3 and 6 of process. The subjects sold included the goodwill of the business—a subject which was separable from the lease of the shop. The documents ought therefore to have been impressed with an ad valorem stamp as a conveyance on sale in terms of sect. 59 (1) of the Stamp Act 1891 (Potter v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 1854, 10 Ex. 147; Benjamin Brooke & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, L.R. [1896], 2 Q.B. 556; West London Syndicate Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, L.R. [1898], 2 Q.B. 507). It was the duty of the Court to take judicial notice of the fact that the documents were insufficiently stamped (Stamp Act 1891, sect. 14 (1) and (4)).

Argued for Pursuer:—The document No 3 was an offer, and the proper place for the stamp was the acceptance No. 6. But it was not necessary to look at No. 6, because the defender admitted on record that his offer had been accepted. In any event an ad valorem stamp was not necessary, because the only subject sold was the lease of the shop. The English cases cited were distinguishable, because there the goodwill was specifically conveyed, and that was not so here.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord Ardwall.—This action arises out of the sale of an ice-cream business by the defender to the pursuer, and the pursuer asks that the defender should be ordained to pay a sum of £150 sterling, being the penalty agreed to be paid in case of the defender breaking his agreement not to carry on business in any other ice-cream shop in Peebles.

The defender states as a preliminary objection to the document founded on by the pursuer that it is not properly stamped, inasmuch as it is stamped only with a sixpenny agreement stamp and not with an ad valorem stamp as provided for by sect. 59 (1) of the Stamp Act 1891, and the section of the Stamp Act founded on as excluding the document from the cognisance of the Court is sect. 14, sub-sect. 1, of the said Stamp Act, which provides that notice shall be taken by judges "of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp" on any instrument produced as evidence. Now this is not a provision compelling judges to raise test cases or try doubtful questions regarding the stamping of instruments. I think that they are only bound to intervene to protect the revenue where there is an undoubted case of insufficient stamping or an attempted evasion of the Stamp Act. Now in my opinion there is no such case here. The document in question was stamped with a sixpenny stamp which is the proper and appropriate stamp for any ordinary agreement; but it is pleaded for the defender that this document was not only an agreement, but was an agreement for the conveyance and sale of the stock and fittings and goodwill of the shop mentioned in the document. In my opinion this is far from being clear, for the document itself sets forth, and it is matter of common ground on the record, that the agreement for the sale of the business was, as set forth in Cond. 3 and answer thereto, a verbal agreement, and was concluded on 13th June 1904, and on the same date the shop was handed over to the pursuer, the price of the business being then also fixed at £150. This being so, it appears to me that so far as the sale of the business was concerned No. 3 of process was not the instrument under which that sale took place, although it refers to and recites the sale, but was merely an agreement (1) as to the mode of payment of the price, and (2) as to the obligation on the defender not to carry on another similar business in Peebles under penalty of paying back all the money paid for the business; and it falls to be observed that it is only as evidence of the second point that the document is now produced, and for that purpose undoubtedly it is sufficiently stamped.

2nd Div. Francesco v. de Meo. Lord Ardwall.

I accordingly think that this is not a case in which there is any duty on the Court to order this document to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp either proprio motu or on the motion of one of the parties. [His Lordship then dealt with other questions as to which the case is not reported.]

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 142.)

The facts of these cases, two of which on grounds similar to the first were instituted after the date of Lord Ardwall's judgment (reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 142), with the contentions of parties, sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note and the previous report.

The Lord Ordinary (assuming, but not deciding that on the titles the defenders' lands had been thirled to the pursuer's mill) held that the right of thirlage had been extinguished by the negative prescription, and assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Johnston.—At the close of the proof in these cases, it appeared to me that the state of the title raised questions of extreme difficulty and perplexity, the solution of which, if indeed they were soluble, must still involve great expense to the parties. The pursuer has devoted much time and research to the investigation of title, and his legal experience and acumen have produced results which creates the impression in one's mind that he is the proprietor of an old barony mill, viz. that of Manuel, to which most at any rate, if not the whole of the defenders' lands were at least at one time astricted. But to carry this impression the length of judicial conclusion, it would involve an even more laborious investigation of the titles which have been produced, and expensive excerpts from these titles. It occurred to me, therefore, to suggest to the parties that it would be to their mutual interest to take the exceptional course of reversing the usual order of things, and to direct attention first to the question whether, assuming that the pursuer had a good title to a thirlage mill, and that the defenders' lands were originally embraced in the thirl, the right of thirlage still subsisted, and had not been lost by the negative prescription. To this suggestion the parties, after consideration, acceded, and accordingly a print of that part of the evidence only which bears on the question of prescription has been laid before me, and for this print I have to express my indebtedness. The present judgment will therefore be confined entirely to this subject.

But before dealing with the question of possession, it is desirable to state shortly how, as I understand the case, the question arises.

In the early history of the properties involved there are two families, more or less allied, concerned, viz. the families of Livingstone and of Crawford. But an initial difficulty arises from the fact that there were what I may term overlapping baronies, each embracing the properties involved, or some of them. There was a barony of Manuel, of which traces are found in titles of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, but neither the date of erection nor the extent is known. There was a barony of Haining erected and, so far as appears for the first time in 1612, which included the lands of Manuel. Yet the foundation of the pursuer's title of date 1609 treats the barony of Haining as already existing, for it astricts the lands and barony of Haining to the Mill of Manuel, while at a later date there appears to have been a barony of Manuel-Foulis more or less carved out of the earlier baronies, one or both. For my present purpose I do not think it necessary to follow out the history of this latter barony.

I have formed the impression that Manuel was the original name of the nucleus of the estate, which formed the subject of consecutive erections, as the barony received additions and suffered deductions; that the place of strength which undoubtedly existed was called the Haining; and that the name Haining supplanted the name Manuel as the commonly received name of the barony; and further, that the crown charter of resignation of 1612, though apparently the first, was not actually the first erection of a barony of Haining but only its extended erection in the person of John Livingstone of Baldorane (probably the modern Bedlormie).

Now this crown charter of resignation of 1612 can only have embraced the dominium directum of Manuel Mill and mill lands. For in 1603 Alexander Livingstone obtained a charter of confirmation of inter alia the lands of Manuel (i.e. Haining, together with the mill of Manuel), and in 1609 he and his wife disponed to Henry Crawford and his wife "All and Whole that our mill of Manuel, commonly called Manuel-mill with the astricted multures of all and sundry our lands and barony of Haining and other multures and sequels pertaining to the said mill used and wont, with the mill lands also belonging to the said mill." And therefore when in 1612 John Livingstone of Baldorane obtained his crown charter of erection of the barony of Haining, on the resignation among others of the same Alexander Livingstone and spouse, the mill with the astricted multures of the existing barony of Haining and the mill lands had already been alienated to the Crawfords. Consistently with this the title to the Mill of Manuel was held base of the Livingstone family, afterwards Earls of Calender and Linlithgow until the '15, when the Earl being forfeited, an entry was obtained direct from the crown under the Clan Act. I do not think that it is disputed that the pursuer by a valid progress represents the alienee of Alexander Livingstone in the before-mentioned deed of 1609.

A question, however, arises whether the barony of Haining, which that deed treats as astricted, was the same in its component parts as the barony of that name erected in 1612, and, I may add, of new erected with important additions in 1646. Though I do not find it necessary to determine this question, there is a deed in the progress which would probably resolve it in favour of the pursuer, viz., the feu-contract of 1703, between the then Earl of Linlithgow and Thomas Crawford, then proprietor of the mill and mill lands, which is really of the nature of a confirmation and redisposition, and which may be read as astricting the Earl's then lands and barony of Haining to Manuel Mill.

For the present purpose, therefore, it may be assumed that the pursuer is proprietor of the mill and mill lands of Manuel, and that by his title there are astricted to the said mill the lands and barony of Haining in the widest sense which that description can assume, reserving, if it be necessary, to consider farther whether that assumption can be judicially accepted.

In the next place, to the Livingstone or Earl of Linlithgow's Barony of Haining, the defender Forbes of Calender is the direct successor in title, through the York Building Company. But the acquisition was under important exceptions, as much of the property had been conveyed or feued out by the Livingstone family between 1603 and the acquisition of the forfeited estates of the family by the York Building Company. Of these exceptions I think it may be surmised, and accepted for the present purpose, that a considerable portion has found its way into the hands of the other two defenders the Carron Company and the Livingstone-Learmonth family. But it must be added that only in a very few isolated cases does any notice of astriction appear in the titles of the lands assumed to have composed parts of the barony and so to be astricted.

The identity of the various parcels of lands now held by the different defenders with those to be found in the enumerations in the old barony and subordinate titles is of course open to question, but having regard to the tenacity of old place-names in country districts I think there is at least a very good prima facie case in the pursuer's favour.

In approaching the proof of prescription the question therefore presents itself thus: The pursuer is the proprietor of a barony mill having on the face of his title a clause astricting, or at least acknowledging the astriction, of the lands of the barony to it, under the hand of the disponer of the mill, who was at the time infeft in the barony. The defenders may be taken as ex facie at least the holders by progress of the barony lands, or some of them, from the proprietor of the barony who disponed the mill and created or acknowledged the astriction, but there are only in exceptional cases any reference to astriction in the titles.

If these be the circumstances, then I think it follows that the thirlage was of omnia grana crescentia, and not merely of grindable corn, as the thirlage of lands implies the thirlage of the crops growing on the lands (Waughton, 1635, M. 11230; Yeaman, 1759, M. 16044). But thirlage has so far at any rate the quality of a prædial servitude, that the obligation to bring the crop of the lands to the mill may be discharged by the negative prescription. Yet in considering the proof of possession or usage it must be kept in view, first, that when there are several parcels of one tenement the obligation may be kept in force by the usage of submitting to the thirl by the occupants of one or more parcels, though the occupants of the remainder evade it. The nature of the right is anomalous. The constitution is, so to speak, prædial, the current obligation is personal and prestable from the occupant, not the owner of the prædium. Second, that usage to pay part only of the stipulated multures will presume the right to exact the whole (Waughton, supra).

But though these be general principles, the general circumstances proved must determine whether de facto anything has been exacted and paid as multure by virtue of astriction.

Now I have examined the proof with some care, and the first thing that I am struck with is, that as far back as local history can take us, neither the proprietors of the mill nor the tenants of the mill, nor the proprietors of the lands in the alleged sucken nor the tenants of those lands, ever heard of astriction or of intown multures, or of any right or claim of thirlage. This is the more remarkable that for a very considerable time, beyond the prescriptive period, the property of the mill was in the hands of Isaac and George Bayley in succession, two very experienced conveyancers. That the leases of the mill should contain no reference to thirlage is not conclusive, as the lease of the mill of a thirl would imply an assignation of the rights of the owner. But that the leases in earlier times should include the words "with the astricted multures" or equivalent terms, and that the introduction of these words should cease with the advent of the nineteenth century, is a much more pregnant circumstance, and indicates that the right of thirlage, which was then falling into desuetude, was with full knowledge and intent abandoned. While dealing with the leases there is a further matter of some importance to be noticed. It is a necessary consequence of thirlage that the suckeners are liable in mill services. The maintenance of the thirl by exaction and payment of intown multures involves the perpetuation of the obligation to these services, even though not exacted. But it throws light, I think, on the interpretation to be put on the acts of frequenting the mill, to be afterwards noticed, that no one has ever heard even a tradition of mill services being tendered, and that more than forty years ago Mr Isaac Bayley, in letting the mill to a new tenant, Peter Roberts, took him bound to maintain both the mill and its adjuncts of dam and lead in repair; and further, that when it was burnt down his son, George Bayley, rebuilt it, without calling on the suckeners for cartages or other services.

With this in view it would, I think, require a stronger proof of resorting to the mill than we have here to resist the implication that the claim of thirlage has long since been abandoned. For what does the proof come to at best? Thirlage over grana crescentia has never been exacted or suggested, within the memory of man. So long as such memory goes, all grain, not required for use on the farms, has been sold off in open market, with the knowledge and acquiescence of those in right of the thirlage mill, and no dry multures have ever been heard of. This fact is not conclusive by any means on the authority of Waughton's case, supra. But it cannot be ignored in considering the weight and complexion of what is found regarding grindable corn. Now, there has been a use of going from some farms to Manuel Mill, particularly with oats—in fact, I think the proof is almost confined to oats. But there have been three processes in use at the mill—oatmeal grinding, hashing, and bruising. Now hashing is grinding the whole or unhusked grain for cattle feeding, and so, though a grinding process, would be an exception from the suckeners' obligation. Bruising, again, is not a grinding operation at all, and, moreover, is applied to horse corn, and so is doubly excepted. There remains, therefore, the small amount of oats brought to be ground for domestic consumption on the farms. If the thirlage of omnia grana crescentia has been, so far as memory goes, reduced to this, and if this has been accomplished by the other circumstances to which I have alluded when dealing with the leases, I should require to be satisfied that even the bringing "grindable corn" to the mill has been a matter of obligation and not a matter of convenience. And this I am not. Convenience of neighbourhood, satisfaction with the work performed, friendship with the miller, counter transaction of selling grain to him—these have all been the influences in determining such parcels of grain to the mill. There has been no suspicion of obligation on either side, and in particular there has been no discriminating charge within the thirl, distinguishing intown grain from outtown grain. Nobody has heard of intown multures.

It is true that oats for meal have always been multured and not paid for in cash, but though this may be a legacy from the old days of astriction, having regard to the generality of the custom, I do not think that it is enough to preserve the flavour of astriction over the parcels of oats which have been brought to the mill to be ground into meal, so that by this one act the whole right of the thirlage over grana crescentia, for it must be brought up to that, can be held to have been preserved.

I therefore propose to sustain the defenders' plea on prescription, and to assoilzie them with expenses.—30*th September* 1907.

Expenses—Taxation—Husband and Wife—Divorce for Adultery of Husband—Finding of Expenses in Usual Form—Taxation of Expenses on Consistorial Scale.

In an action at the instance of Mrs Margaret Robertson or M'Caw against her husband, Daniel M'Caw, for divorce on the ground of adultery, the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced decree on 20th July 1907, finding the defender guilty of adultery and divorcing him from the pursuer. The interlocutor concluded: "Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report."

The Auditor having taxed the pursuer's account, the defender objected to the report "on the ground that the Auditor has taxed the account contrary to the finding of the Lord Ordinary, in respect that he has taxed it as between agent and client, and has allowed the following items" [here followed items amounting in all to £37, 0s. 8d.]. These items consisted mainly of the outlays and fees of the Edinburgh agents of the pursuer for communication with the agents of the pursuer in Glasgow, and also of the outlays and fees of the Glasgow agents for communication with the agents in Edinburgh and with English solicitors.

The defender argued that, as the interlocutor of 20th July 1907 merely found the pursuer entitled to expenses and did not direct that these expenses were given as between agent and client, the Auditor was not entitled to tax the account except as between party and party; and cited Reid v. Hope, 1825, 4 S. 198; King v. Patrick, 1845, 7 D. 536; and Mackellar v. Mackellar, 1898, 25 R. 883.

The pursuer argued that it was only where expenses were to be given on a scale which was not appropriate in ordinary cases of the same kind, that it was necessary that provision should be made, in the interlocutor awarding expenses, as to the scale on which taxation was to proceed; and cited Earl of Stair v. Countess of Stair, 1905, 13 S.L.T. 446; and Grant v. Grant, 1905, 13 S.L.T. 516. He also referred to the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act 1861, sect. 7.

The Lord Ordinary approved of the Auditor's report; repelled the objections; and found the pursuer entitled to the expenses of the discussion on the objections; and modified the same to two guineas.

Lord Mackenzie.—In this case the interlocutor disposing of the merits of the case awards expenses to the pursuer in the usual form. Since the discussion before me on the defender's note of objections to the Auditor's report, I have taken the opportunity of consulting the Auditor, and as I find that in taxing the pursuer's account he has followed the usual rule in consistorial cases, I do not see my way to give effect to the objections. I shall therefore repel the defender's objections, and as the Act of Sederunt of 6th February 1806 makes an award of the expenses of the discussion of the Auditor's report imperative, I shall find the pursuer entitled to these expenses, and modify them to two guineas.—16*th October* 1907.

These actions arose out of a collision in the Firth of Forth between the s s. "Prudhoe Castle" and the s.s. "Ruby." As the result of the collision the "Ruby" sank and six of her crew were drowned. The Lord Ordinary held that both vessels were to blame, and to this judgment the Second Division adhered. The case was remitted back to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure, and his judgment sufficiently reports the questions remaining to be decided.

Lord Salvesen.—The liability for the collision out of which this action has arisen has already been finally determined on the footing of both vessels being to blame. Parties have, so far, adjusted the damage claims; but they have been unable to agree as to the value of the "Ruby," and as to some other matters which really raise questions of law, and which will be afterwards specifically referred to.

The owners of the "Ruby" claim that, at the time she was lost, she was of a value of £7500. The leading expert witness examined on the other side puts her value at £5500. In order to arrive at the proper figure it is therefore necessary to consider the facts on which the valuations proceed.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

The Screw Collier Co. Ltd. and Others (Owners of S.S. "Prudhoe Castle") v. Weir (Owner of S.S. "Ruby"), et e contra.

The "Ruby" was an iron screw steamer of 560 tons carrying capacity. She was built in 1888, and had triple expansion engines which were situated aft. In 1898 she was purchased for a sum of £6900. In order to fit her for the trade in which she was to be employed some £400 was spent in repairs and improvements, so that she actually cost about £7300 before she was put in commission. Considerable sums of money were annually disbursed to meet ordinary upkeep. Further, in 1903 a new boiler was supplied at a cost of £1183; and the extra supply of steam which she obtained from this boiler had the effect of improving her speed to about twelve knots an hour. In 1903 she got one new winch and in 1905 a second; and, in the latter year, a sum of £306 was spent in connection with the special survey which she then passed. The vessel was well suited for the coasting trade in which she was engaged, her relatively high speed giving her an advantage as compared with most other vessels used for similar purposes. Her employment in this trade yielded a fair profit to her owner.

The method adopted by the owner himself in valuing the "Ruby" was to allow depreciation at 4 per cent. on the value at which she stood in his books, and then to add the cost of repairs executed during the year. The result of applying this method to the "Ruby" is that, although she was gradually getting older, she was all the time appreciating in value, and stood in the books as worth £8602, 13s. 8d. as at December 1905. Adopting the same method, but allowing 5 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. for depreciation, the figure works out at £8129, 13s. 9d. In my opinion this is an entirely erroneous method of arriving at the value of the ship. The cost of necessary repairs is part of the expense of running the vessel; and, except in so far as the repairs consist of renewals of important parts, does not add to the value of the ship. As the ship is gradually wearing out through age, it is obvious that some allowance for depreciation must be made even on the assumption that she is well kept up; and the witnesses for the "Prudhoe Castle" stated that the recognised allowance on this head in the case of an iron ship is 5 per cent. That allowance has the merit of being recognised by the Income Tax Commissioners; but, in the case of an old vessel, I think it may be too high. An iron vessel may well be serviceable for thirty or even forty years; but if 5 per cent. is annually written off for depreciation on the diminishing value, after twenty years she will stand in the owner's books at a break-up value although she may be trading for twenty years more. While the allowance of 5 per cent. may, therefore, overhead be fair enough, it cannot be rigidly applied to the case of every individual ship.

The valuations of the experts for the "Prudhoe Castle" must also, I think, be modified as being based entirely on selling value, and not on the value to the owners. A ship is not like a bale of goods, the exact counterpart of which can be bought in the market. Hence the market price cannot be ascertained with precision; and the prices of similar vessels, while they may be useful as shewing the state of the market, are by no means conclusive. Much also depends on the exact condition of the ship which is brought to sale, her previous history, and the circumstances under which she is sold. The two cases relied on by Mr Pinkney of the "Test," which was sold in January 1906 for £3750, and the "St Kebin," which was sold about the same time for £6000, illustrate this. The "Test" was two years younger than the "Ruby," and resembled her in speed, yet she fetched only £3750; while the "St Kebin," which was considerably slower and much older, fetched £6000. The difference may be partly explained by the "Test's" boiler being twelve years old and therefore nearly worn out, but this would account only for about £1200, leaving as much more to be accounted for in other ways that are not explained.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

The Screw Collier Co. Ltd. and Others (Owners of S.S. "Prudhoe Castle") v. Weir (Owner of S.S. "Ruby"), et e contra.

I propose, accordingly, to arrive at an estimate of the value of the "Ruby" for myself, with such assistance as the evidence on both sides affords. I start with the figure of £7300, which I think represents the actual cost in the open market to the owners—this sum including the amount that required to be spent in making the vessel fit for her service. The vessel being then ten years old, I think it sufficient to write off depreciation at 4 per cent. on the diminishing value; but as extensive renewals were made in the last two years to the extent of some £1400 in the shape of a new boiler, new winches, new propeller and new funnel, I think the cost of these must be taken into account as increasing her value as at the time of collision. On this sum I allow depreciation for two years overhead at 7½ per cent., as the parts renewed wear out much more quickly than the hull. The result is that the figure works out at roughly £6670.

In reaching this result I have fully in view that Mr Pinkney and Mr Cormack did not think that the cost of the new boiler added materially to the value of the ship. This may be so for purposes of sale, but is certainly not so to an owner who does not desire to sell.

At the time when the ship was lost and she was laden with a cargo the freight of which amounted to £50, 3s. 1d., she was within sight of her port of destination; and an expenditure of something less than £15 would have enabled her to earn this freight. It was argued for the "Prudhoe Castle" that, if interest was allowed from the date of the loss on the value of the ship, no other claims could be entertained. In my opinion that does not apply to the freight of the voyage in which she was engaged. This was expressly decided in the case of the "Amalia," 1864, 34 L.J. (Ad.) 21; and the principle was extended in the cases of the "Kate," 1899, P. 165, and the "Racine," 1906, P. 273, to the freight which might have been earned under other charter-parties which had been concluded for the vessel's subsequent employment. Here no such engagements had been made; and, therefore, I think the claim on this head must be limited to the sum of £35, 13s. 6d., being the net freight which would have been received at Grangemouth.

The owners of the "Ruby" also claim £332, 15s. as the profit which the "Ruby" would have made in the seven months following the loss, based on an average of three years' trading, on the footing that it would have taken at least seven months to build a similar steamer. I disallow this claim; but, instead of it, I allow interest at 5 per cent. from the date of the loss as part of the damages. I do so on the principle—which I think has been uniformly recognised, both in Admiralty and at common law—that 5 per cent. per annum represents the legal compensation for being wrongfully deprived of the use of money. Whatever may be said of the rate of interest otherwise, 5 per cent. is still the recognised commercial rate; and commercial men cannot borrow at less for the purposes of their business. The other sums set forth in the statement of claim (No. 162 of process) have been adjusted.

The remaining questions relate to two sums of £1155 and £166. The former represents the cumulated amount of damages paid by the owners of the "Prudhoe Castle" as compensation to the representatives of the members of the crew who lost their lives on board the "Ruby." None of the crew settled with were personally connected with the navigation of the "Ruby." The owners of the "Prudhoe Castle" claim to deduct one-half of this amount from the sum which they are otherwise liable to pay.

The question thus raised is a novel one, so far as Scotland is concerned; and the argument on which it was founded was ingenious. It was said that the sum claimed represents part of the damage which the "Prudhoe Castle" sustained in consequence of the collision, and that, under the Admiralty rule, the "Ruby" is liable for one-half of such damage. The former proposition is undoubtedly true. But for the collision—to which both ships contributed—the claims in question could not have been made; and the "Prudhoe Castle," being admittedly a joint delinquent, had no answer to the actions of the seamen's representatives. It does not follow, however, that they are entitled to relief to the extent of one-half of the cost of settling these claims. Had the owners of the "Ruby" been liable equally with those of the "Prudhoe Castle" for the loss of life, I should have had little difficulty in applying the doctrine of contribution between wrongdoers, which was outlined in the case of the Wick and Pulteneytown, 1894,

S.S. Company, 21 R. H.L. 39. If, for instance, one of the claims had been by a passenger who was injured in the collision, and the full amount of his claim had been paid by the owners of the "Prudhoe Castle," it would have been only equitable that they should be relieved of one-half by the owners of the "Ruby." The mere fact that the injured person selects one of two joint delinquents, and recovers against him, is no reason why the ultimate liability should not be made to rest equally upon both. But the owners of the "Ruby" were not liable, either at common law or in Admiralty, for any fault committed by a member of the crew through which other members lost their lives. If, then, they could not be made directly responsible to the representatives of the deceased men, I fail to see how they can be made to share the responsibility at the instance of the co-delinquent. That would, in effect, be imposing upon them a liability which the law does not countenance. The same view has been taken in England, where it has been held that the Admiralty rule of equal division of loss, where two vessels are both to blame, does not apply to claims for loss of life (The "Bernina," 1888, 13 A.C. 1; The "Circe," 1906, P. 1). It was argued that these decisions proceeded upon the limited nature of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and that they were inapplicable to Scotland. That may be so, but it is from England that we have derived the Admiralty rule with regard to the apportionment of damages; and it appears to me that we must take it with all its limitations. At common law the claim would be equally untenable; because, under this rule, the plea of contributory negligence results in neither of two parties who have been injured by the fault of both being entitled to recover against the other.

I may add that I think it would be unfortunate if any other result were reached, because the liability of a shipowner would vary according as the action was raised in Scotland or England, it being generally in the power of the pursuer to select either forum. There is, besides, high authority for saying that the maritime law of Scotland is the same as that of England, although Lord Watson's dictum to that effect is probably too absolutely stated (Currie v. M'Knight, 1896, 24 R. (H.L.) 1). I accordingly reject the claim on this head.

The other claim of £166, the adjusted value of the seamen's effects, seems to me to be ruled by the same considerations. The loss of these effects grounded a claim at the instance of the seamen, or their representatives, against the owners of the "Prudhoe Castle"; but, just as the owner of the "Ruby" was not liable for loss of life or injury to his own crew, so I cannot see how he can be liable for the loss of their belongings. Such effects are not analogous to cargo shipped by third parties for the loss of which by the negligence of the crew they are—in the absence of express contract—entitled to be indemnified by the ship-owners.

155. Williams and Others v. Philip.

I. Lunacy—Insanity—Testing Capacity—Relevancy of Averments.

II. Fraud — Will — Reduction — Issue of Facility and Circumvention—Relevancy of Averments.

III. Process — Proof or Jury Trial?—Reduction of Will.

This was an action by Edward Taunton Williams, as sole trustee and executor nominated under a trust disposition and settlement of the late Joseph Wilberforce Williams, dated 3rd September 1904, and others, the heirs in mobilibus of the said J. W. Williams, against Andrew Philip and others, in which the pursuers sought to reduce a trust disposition and settlement of the said J. W. Williams executed in favour of the said Andrew Philip and dated 23rd August 1905.

By this will of 1905 the testator (who died on 2nd September 1906) appointed the defender Philip sole executor, and conveyed to him the testator's whole estate, heritable and moveable, subject to two legacies to two charitable institutions. These institutions were called as defenders, but did not lodge defences.

The pursuers averred that in May 1905 the testator went to live in Lenzie and that some time thereafter he was introduced to Philip, who also resided there; that Philip "assiduously cultivated" the testator's acquaintance; that Philip on one occasion dissuaded the testator from taking a holiday along with the parties with whom he lived; and that Philip took him about to Glasgow and other places. It was also averred that Philip "wrote instructions to a writer in Glasgow selected by himself for the preparation of a will by the deceased in his own (Philip's) favour. The writer prepared and sent to Philip the will now under reduction, and it was laid by Philip before and signed by the deceased in Philip's house, in Philip's presence, and at Philip's instigation. The deed bears the names of two instrumentary witnesses, who were workmen engaged in Philip's house at the time, and signed their names at Philip's request before the deceased adhibited his signature. All these proceedings were carefully concealed from Mr Williams' family, and the will was kept secret by Philip and his agent till five months after Mr Williams' death."

In addition to the averments noticed in the Lord Ordinary's opinion the pursuers further averred:—

"Cond. 4. The said pretended deed did not express the true testamentary wishes of the deceased, and is reducible either on the ground that when the deceased executed it he was incapable of understanding and did not understand what it contained, or otherwise on the ground that he was weak and facile and easily imposed on, and that the defender Andrew Philip, having obtained an influence over him, fraudulently took advantage of that influence and of the weakness and facility of the deceased to impetrate the said deed in his own favour."

"Cond. 6. . . . . During this latter period of his life his mental weakness and derangement continued, though it did not assume a violent form. He was solitary in his habits. He rarely spoke to strangers, and never made friends outside the circle of his relatives and landladies. He was eccentric, changeable and suspicious, and prone to sudden outbursts of passion at the merest trifles. He was childish in his tastes and fancies. He also exhibited the symptom, common to persons in his condition, of being extremely open to flattery, and it was easy to get him to do anything by humouring him. . . . ."

"Cond. 9. The deceased was incapable of understanding, or at any rate he did not understand, the purport and effect of the deed which he was then induced to sign. . . ."

"Cond. 10. In any event, the deceased did not sign the deed of his own free will. He was, as already explained, weak and facile, and was absolutely under the influence of Philip, by whom the whole arrangements connected with the making and signing of the deed were carried out, and who used the influence which he had acquired over the deceased to inspire him with suspicion and dislike of his relatives, and to dictate or suggest to him how his property should be left, and by these means to impetrate the deed from him. The deceased subsequently, both verbally and in writing, evinced a strong dislike to Philip, whom he accused of deceiving him. In particular, on 29th November 1905 he wrote to his brother Henry:—'As for the man Philips, I try to avoid him as much as possible, as I find he is a deceitful person.'"

Issues having been ordered, the pursuers lodged two issues for the trial [which are given in the Lord Ordinary's opinion]. The defender argued that the case was not suited for jury trial but should be sent to proof, and that, in any case, the averments were not relevant to support the proposed issues.

The Lord Ordinary approved of the issues.

Lord Mackenzie.—Counsel for the defender in this case did not oppose inquiry by way of proof, but maintained, if trial by jury were insisted on, that the summons was not relevant.

Taking the latter point first I am of opinion that there is sufficient upon record to warrant both the issues proposed. The first issue is, "Whether the will bearing to be dated 23rd August 1905 is not the deed of the late Joseph Wilberforce Williams?" Now it is averred that from his early years the testator had shown manifest weakness of intellect, and had never been fit for work of any kind; that he was certified to be insane and went to an asylum for two years in 1870; that he thereafter remained in the custody of one or other of the members of his family, and especially of the pursuer, the Reverend Henry John Williams, until 1898; that during the latter period of his life (he died in 1906) his mental weakness and derangement continued, and that the agents of a certain trust refused to pay over to him income to which he was entitled, on the ground that he was incapable of granting a discharge. The will sought to be reduced was made on 23rd August 1905, and it is averred in Cond. 4 that when the deceased executed it he was incapable of understanding and did not understand what it contained. The defender's counsel pointed out that in Cond. 9 the averment ran thus:—"The deceased was incapable of understanding, or at any rate he did not understand, the purport and effect of the deed which he was then induced to sign." It was argued that the relevancy of the record must depend on the weaker alternative, and that it was not relevant to say that the testator did not understand the will. I think the averments, however, must be taken as a whole, and that there is a plain case made on record that the testator was not of sound disposing mind.

The second issue is, "Whether, on or about 23rd August 1905, the late Joseph Wilberforce Williams was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and whether the defender Andrew Philip, taking advantage of his said weakness and facility, did by fraud or circumvention obtain or procure from the said Joseph Wilberforce Williams the will bearing the said date, to the lesion of the said Joseph Wilberforce Williams?" An attempt was made to contend that the case on record was one of undue influence, and not of facility and fraud or circumvention. It is impossible, in my opinion, after the cases of M'Callum v. Graham (1894, 21 R. 824), Rooney v. Cormack (1895, 22 R. 761), and the Lord Chancellor's opinion in Weir v. Grace (1899, 2 F. (H.L.) 30), to maintain this successfully. The case of M'Kechnie v. White and Others (1906, 14 S.L.T. 140) seems to have been a special one. Upon the question whether there are sufficient averments to support the second issue, I am of opinion that there are. The averments in regard to facility appear to me to be strong. As regards fraud and circumvention the pursuers aver that the defender, after an acquaintance of three months only with the deceased, acted as the sole intermediary in the preparation of a will largely in his own favour, excluding the family of the deceased. The pursuers then go on to say that the deceased was absolutely under the defender's influence, and that he used this influence to inspire him with suspicion and dislike of his relatives, and to dictate or suggest to him how his property should be left. These averments are, I think, enough to entitle the pursuer to the second issue.

As regards the question whether there is any special cause why this case should not go to a jury, the points founded on were that the case was one of doubtful relevancy, that a jury was unsuited to try the questions of the amount of influence brought to bear by the defender on the testator, and that the averment about the defender's imprisonment was apt to prejudice his case in the eyes of a jury. I am unable to hold that there is any sufficient cause for not sending the case to a jury. The cases of Weir v. Grace (1898, 25 R. 739) and Fearn v. Cowper (1899, 1 F. 751) were of a different nature. Nor do I consider the case of M'Kechnie (supra cit.) an authority for ordering a proof in the present case.

I therefore approve of the issues proposed.—19*th October* 1907.

Objections to Auditor's Report.

The whole circumstances of this decision appear sufficiently from the Opinion of the Lord President.

The case was heard in the Single Bills, when the Lord President intimated that the Court would communicate with the Auditor. The case was subsequently advised.

The Lord President.—My Lords, this is a case in which a petition was presented for the compulsory winding up of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries 1st Div. M'Gregor v. Ballachulish Slate Quarries Ltd. — The Lord President.

Company Limited. Upon the same day as that petition was presented, a meeting was held at which an extraordinary resolution was passed by which the Company was wound up voluntarily, and a liquidator appointed, and the liquidator was directed to present a petition for the continuation of the voluntary winding up under the supervision of the Court. These two petitions, with cross answers which were lodged, came to depend before Lord Kinnear, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in Vacation, and his Lordship, after hearing parties, dismissed the compulsory winding up petition and pronounced an order in the other petition for the continuation of the voluntary winding up subject to the supervision of the Court. He also pronounced an interlocutor finding the petitioner in the petition for the compulsory winding up and the liquidator entitled to expenses out of the estate.

My Lords, that is a perfectly ordinary proceeding and the usual interlocutor, and the reason of it is of course plain enough, that even although the Court in its discretion may hold that the better form of winding up is not a compulsory winding up but a winding up under the supervision of the Court, the Court is still entitled, indeed bound in proper cases, to give the petitioner who comes into Court with a petition for compulsory winding up, his expenses, as having brought the matter into Court, the view being that the whole parties concerned have the benefit of his initial proceedings in the liquidation which is then instituted.

Now the expenses were taxed, and they were taxed by the Auditor upon the scale of agent and client, and the present question has arisen upon the objection taken by the liquidator that, inasmuch as the interlocutor does not in terms mention agent and client, the expenses ought to be taxed as between party and party. As to the general rule in ordinary actions upon this matter there can be no doubt. "Expenses," without any more being said, means taxation upon the scale of party against party, and anyone who wishes taxation on another scale must take care that it is mentioned in the interlocutor. As to that there is no doubt. But upon inquiry there seems to be as little doubt as to the rule in the present case. The finding of expenses here really means taxation as between agent and client, because there is, in the proper sense of the word, no question of party against party. The petitioner here was not found entitled to expenses because he had been in any sense successful against his only opponent the liquidator. As a matter of fact, so far from being successful he was really unsuccessful, because while he contended that the order should be for compulsory winding up, the liquidator contended, and with success, that it should be a supervision order. He was not found entitled to expenses as having been the victor in a litigation against another party. He was found entitled to expenses because it was his petition that initiated the whole matter and really formed the true basis of the liquidation, although technically it was found in this particular instance convenient to write on the other petition.

Now in this case the truth is there is no question of party against party to whom the rule is to apply. Accordingly I think the Auditor here has done according to the ordinary practice, and according to the right practice, in allowing this petitioner the expenses he has incurred so far as reasonable—that is, his expenses taxed as between agent and client.

Petitions for Winding Up Order and for Supervision Order.

On 29th July 1907 James Adam Pattullo, S.S.C., Edinburgh (hereinafter called "the petitioner"), presented a petition to have the Caithness Flagstone Company Limited (hereinafter called "the respondents"), wound up by the Court.

On 30th July 1907 an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Caithness Flagstone Company passed an extraordinary resolution that the Company should be wound up voluntarily. Mr Thomas Dingwall, C.A., Edinburgh, was appointed liquidator. On 12th August 1907 the company and the liquidator presented a petition to have the voluntary liquidation placed under the supervision of the Court.

Answers were lodged to both petitions.

At the hearing it was stated that the parties were agreed that the voluntary liquidation should be continued under the supervision of the Court, but the petitioner moved that Mr Dingwall should be superseded by a liquidator to be appointed by the Court.

The Court having held that Mr Dingwall should not be superseded, counsel for the petitioner moved that the expenses of the petition for a winding up order should form part of the expenses of the liquidation. He cited Pattisons Ltd. v. Kinnear, 1898, 1 F. 551; Drysdale & Gilmour v. Robertson, 1890, 18 R. 98; Ballachulish Slate Quarries Co. Ltd., supra, p. 397; Elsmie, 1906, 8 F. 434.

Counsel for the respondents opposed the motion.

The Court found the petitioner entitled to expenses up to 12th August, and found that these formed expenses in the winding up, and remitted the same to the Auditor to tax and to report.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 927.)

The circumstances of the cases sufficiently appear from the previous report and the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The Lord Ordinary granted decree of divorce in the action at Mr M'Ewan's instance, and absolved Mr M'Ewan from the conclusions of the action against him at Mrs M'Ewan's instance.

Lord Dundas (husband's action).—This is an action by a husband against his wife for divorce upon the ground of desertion. The parties were married on 19th December 1900; the defender left her husband's house on 28th September 1901; and they have never since lived together. The action was raised on 18th July 1906. It is thus an admitted fact that the parties have lived apart for more than four years prior to the action. The main question is whether or not the defender had reasonable cause for remaining away from her husband during that period. The case is one of the utmost importance to the parties. I have heard a long and exhaustive proof, and able arguments by counsel; some, though not, I think, all of the points of fact and law involved present considerable difficulty. I have therefore studied the case with great care and anxiety. I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to the decree which he seeks.

When the case was in the Procedure Roll, a question of law was raised as to which, on 20th March 1907, I reserved my opinion for reasons then expressed. On 13th December 1902, Mrs M'Ewan brought an action of separation and aliment against her husband, in which the Lord Ordinary (Low) on 8th December 1903 assoilzied the latter. A reclaiming note was presented, but the case went no further, in consequence of an agreement between the parties to which I shall have to refer later. The question as to which I reserved my opinion was whether or not a valid defence to this statutory action for divorce for desertion may be based upon grounds insufficient to afford the defender success in her action for separation and aliment. In the view which I hold of the present case, it is not necessary for me to decide that question, because I am of opinion, for reasons which I shall explain, that even if it be answered in the affirmative the defender has not made out any sufficient case of "reasonable cause" for absenting herself from her husband. But as the question is interesting and important, and as this case may go further, it is right that I should state my opinion upon the legal point. No defence, in my judgment, will be good as an answer to a statutory action like the present, or to an action of adherence at common law, which falls short of what would be sufficient to support an action of judicial separation by the absenting spouse against the other. This question was fully canvassed, though not decided, in the well-known case of Mackenzie,

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

M'Ewan v. M'Ewan, et e contra.

1893, 20 R. 636, affd. 1895, 22 R. H.L. 32. In the Court of Session a majority of the judges seem to have thought that what is "reasonable cause" within the meaning of the Act 1573, cap. 55, is a jury question for the judge or judges in each case as it arises; and that it may consist in something less than would be sufficient as a defence to an action of adherence. The latter view was, as I gather, distinctly negatived in the House of Lords, at all events by Lord Watson (22 R. at pp. 40, 41). But his Lordship seems (at p. 42) to have treated as an open question for future decision whether or not, in an action of adherence, a wife can successfully defend herself upon any other grounds than would be required in order to sustain an action at her instance for separation and aliment. I am content to express my entire concurrence in the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark in Mackenzie's case, the reasoning of which appears to me to be irresistibly sound. There is not much authority upon the point. Lord Rutherfurd Clark refers to the weighty dictum of Lord President Inglis in Chalmers, 1868, 6 M. 547, and to the direct decision in A. B. v. C. D., 1853, 16 D. 111 (the word "resist" in Lord Rutherfurd Clark's quotation from the interlocutor in A. B. v. C. D. is a misprint for "insist on"). To these one might add Fraser on the Personal and Domestic Relations (1846), p. 448 and p. 684. On the other hand, it must be noted that Lord Fraser in his later book (Husband and Wife, Vol. II. p. 873) seems to have altered his opinion; and that Lord Watson (22 R. H.L. p. 42) was "unable . . . . to regard the case of A. B. v. C. D. as an authority of weight."

[His Lordship here proceeded to examine the evidence as to the conduct of parties up to 28th September 1901, when the defender left her husband's house and never returned.]

If my views upon the evidence are, up to this point, correct, it follows, in my judgment, that the defender had not, when she left her husband's house, reasonable cause for permanently absenting herself from him contrary to his desire. The evidence, in my opinion, falls far short of anything which has been hitherto held in our law to amount to legal cruelty or saevitia. . . . If again (contrary to my opinion), something short of saevitia may do as a defence to an action like the present, it appears to me that what is here proved ought not to be held sufficient. . . .

I now come to consider the events which have happened since 28th September 1901, and I do so in the light of what, according to my view, had occurred previously. On 4th November 1901 Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote to the pursuer the letter to which I have already referred, alleging "a long and systematic course of cruelty carried on" by him towards his wife and asking him to agree to a voluntary separation. The pursuer handed this letter to his agent, who replied to it on the 8th, stating that he was making enquiries into the matter. Mr Robson's enquiry was careful and methodical, and occupied a considerable time. On 4th March 1902 he replied to Drummond & Reid, denying absolutely the charges of cruelty, or that any ground for separation existed, and stating that the pursuer desired that, as soon as the defender was sufficiently recovered from her recent confinement, she should return to her home, along with the child. On 7th March Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote that "Mrs M'Ewan remains of the same mind as when she instructed us to write the letter of 4th November last to Mr M'Ewan, and . . . . cannot agree to the proposal you make that she should return to live with Mr M'Ewan." This is a very clear declinature to adhere, and the pursuer dates the commencement of his wife's desertion of him from this time, though he pleads alternatively a day in July 1902. I do not think that the effect of the letter in this aspect is materially diminished by the fact that Mrs M'Ewan was admittedly too weak and ill on 7th March to have been able to rejoin her husband. That was not the "proposal" which had been made, in which her return was made expressly conditioned upon her being sufficiently recovered to allow of her being removed with safety; and Messrs Drummond & Reid's rejection of the "proposal" is absolute, and not based upon the state of her health at the time. The child, it appears, was born at Dalmeny on 27th February 1902. . . . On 21st June an important letter was written by the pursuer's agents to Messrs Drummond & Reid, in which he expressed the pursuer's continued desire that his wife should return and live with him, and his willingness—immediately on learning that Mrs M'Ewan agreed to come back—to make a home for her as soon as possible, and meanwhile to arrange for their living together in suitable apartments. Prior to this, on 11th June, the pursuer had written to his wife in affectionate terms, the sincerity of which I do not in the least doubt. The reply he got was from Mr Jones, the defender's father, on 16th June, written in the third person, and briefly informing him that his wife had gone to Glasgow to consult a specialist, and would probably be there for some time. This announcement produced a letter from Mr Robson to Mr Jones of 21st June, which speaks for itself. On 8th July Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote to Mr Robson asking for "a definite reply to the matters referred to in our letters. (1) A voluntary separation; (2) custody of the child; and (3) aliment for Mrs M'Ewan and her child." This letter was crossed in the post by a letter from Mr Robson to the defender's agents repeating his client's desire that his wife should return, and adding "as he has not only offered, but has urged this, and is willing thus to maintain and provide for her, he declines to furnish her with separate aliment." The pursuer takes 8th July 1902 as the date at which, at the latest, the defender's desertion must be held to have commenced. On 12th August the pursuer and his wife had a personal meeting, and on the 16th he wrote her an affectionate letter. Again, on 7th October, a meeting took place at the defender's request, at which, as appears from a letter by the pursuer's agents dated on the 8th, "Mrs M'Ewan stated that she was prepared, as soon as she was stronger and sufficiently recovered, to return to live with her husband and try to be happy together." On 3rd November the defender called upon Mr Robson, who gives a distinct account of the interview. On the 6th Mr Robson wrote to the defender, informing her that the pursuer had taken a house in Warrender Park Crescent, which she had recently seen with him, and would have it put in order and furnished without delay, so that she might return to and resume living with him; and asking her to meet the pursuer on an early day in order to select papers and colours for the rooms. The letter concludes: "I am also instructed to say that, as you have already been informed, he wishes that neither your sister nor any member of your family should visit at or come to the house." It was the fact that the pursuer had expressed this wish, which I do not think was, in the circumstances, unwise or unreasonable, at all events as regarded the immediate future. The defender's reply, written on 7th November, is a very important letter, as bearing upon a legal point argued by her counsel, to be afterwards referred to. She says: "I agree to the taking of the flat in Warrender Park Crescent. With regard to painting, furnishing, etc., will Mr M'Ewan be good enough to please himself, as, in the circumstances, it is a matter in which I have no interest. I have made up my mind that however Mr M'Ewan acts, or whatever he says, I will try living with him for the sake of my helpless little boy. I wish another meeting, which Messrs Drummond & Reid will arrange for me." The meeting desired by the defender was arranged for, and took place on the 19th. But, before that event, a most regrettable change of circumstances had arisen. A sharp disagreement had occurred between the defender and her sister on the one part and the nurse, whose duty it was to bring the baby daily to their lodgings, on the other part. The ladies allege that Nurse Archibald had been intolerably rude to them, and had even slapped Miss Jones's face. The meeting on 19th November, from which the pursuer, under his agents' advice, absented himself, and at which Mr and Miss Jones were present, was wholly taken up with this dispute. Mr Robson's letter of 21st November describes the situation, and announces that the pursuer declined, "in the interests of the child," to comply with the defender's request that Nurse Archibald should be dismissed; and on 24th November Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote that the defender "cannot go to the house in Warrender Park Crescent if the present nurse is to be retained. She is quite decided as to this." On the 27th Mr Robson wrote, adhering to the position which the pursuer, under his advice, had taken up upon this matter of the nurse. The negotiations between the parties for a permanent reconciliation broke down; and in December the wife's action for separation was raised. It cannot, I think, be denied that this rupture was a most unfortunate occurrence. The circumstances attending it have given me much anxiety. I confess that in my judgment the pursuer would have acted with more propriety if he had yielded to his wife's wishes, and got a new nurse for the child. It is not, to my mind, clear upon which side lay the justice of the dispute as to the conduct of Nurse Archibald. The evidence is conflicting. But in any case I think it is matter for regret that the pursuer did not yield upon the point. It is, however, a very different affair to conclude that, in not so yielding, he was guilty either of cruelty in the legal sense, or of such conduct as could justify his wife in refusing to come back to him. I cannot adopt that conclusion. A number of reliable witnesses speak to the nurse's excellent treatment of the child; it is, to my mind, doubtful whether she had been guilty of insolence towards the defender and her sister; the matter was prima facie one upon which the pursuer was entitled to judge; and I am convinced that his resolution —mistaken as I conceive it to have been—was arrived at conscientiously upon the advice of his agent, who was also his uncle, upon whom he relied implicitly, and not from any intention of wounding his wife, or being cruel to her. The judgment of Lord Low was pronounced on 8th December 1903. The agreement which has been referred to was signed on 9th and 11th January 1904. Since that time the parties have neither written nor spoken to one another. This action was raised on 18th July 1906.

The defender's counsel argued that, even if his client must be held to have been in "malicious and obstinate defection" in April or in July 1902, the pursuer's action fails, (a) because the defender had not been in such "defection" for a full space of four years prior to 18th July 1906; and (b) because the pursuer had not, during that period, sufficiently complied with the duty incumbent upon him of endeavouring to persuade her to return. The former of these arguments included two quite separate branches. It was argued, in the first place, that the defender cannot be held to have been in desertion during the dependence of her action for separation, which, although not successful, was raised and fought out in bona fide; and that the period—about a year—over which the litigation extended, must be cut out and disregarded; the result being that the necessary space of four years has not elapsed. I know of no authority for this contention, and I think it is unsound. It seems to me to derive no support from the case of Young, 1882, 10 R. 184, which was cited, where a wife's action was thrown out as irrelevant, because it appeared that, during the last two years of the period of alleged desertion, her husband had been, and still was, in prison. As Lord Adam justly observed: "If during a part of that period the absence has been compulsory, it cannot, in my opinion, be affirmed to have been wilful." Nor does the recent English decision in Craxton, 8th May 1907, 23 Times L.R. 527, appear to me to aid the defender's argument at all. I remain of the opinion upon this point which I expressed on 20th March last. It was urged by the defender's counsel that, if this view is sound, in a case where a separation action had been so prolonged as to extend over four years, a wife might, at the end of it, be then and there divorced for desertion. I do not think this result could follow. She would always have a locus pœnitentiae to declare her willingness to adhere. On the other hand, if the defender's contention is sound, the result might, in the case figured, be that the husband would have to wait, not four but eight years for his decree.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

The second branch of the defender's argument as regards the period of four years deserves, I think, more consideration, and raises what appears to me to be a delicate point, and one not covered by authority. Her counsel urged that the running of the statutory period was effectually interrupted because, during October and the beginning of November 1902, the parties were on friendly terms with one another, and on 7th November the defender wrote the letter to Mr Robson which I quoted some time ago at length. It was urged that the parties had thus "practically come together"; and that at all events on 7th November it could not be said that the wife was "remaining in malicious obstinacy." The point has caused me more anxiety than any other in the case; but upon the whole, I think that it is not sound. It has, I am aware, been often laid down that the remedy of divorce for desertion is a very peculiar and a purely statutory one; and that care must be taken not to unduly extend its application. But I think one must regard the general mental attitude of the defender during the period as a whole, and not pay undue heed to temporary signs of softening, unfortunately abandoned, and never ripening into actual adherence. I think the defender's expression of willingness to adhere, for the sake of her child, was always under some reservation as to an improvement in her own health and strength; and even the letter of 7th November expressly conditions that a further meeting should be arranged. Most regrettably, as I have explained, the scene had materially altered before that meeting took place, and the overtures of 7th November came to nothing. If I am right in holding that the defender was in wilful non-adherence otherwise during the period in question, I cannot hold that anything that took place during this temporary brightening of the horizon was sufficient to bar the currency of the statutory period.

The defender's remaining argument was based on the pursuer's alleged failure to fulfil his duty in the way of persuading his wife to return to him. During the earlier part of the time in question no such charge could, I think, possibly be maintained against Mr M'Ewan. I have alluded to his letters and his conduct. I think he was sincerely anxious to get his wife back, and made it abundantly clear to her that he was so. But after the separation case was over, an agreement, as I have already explained, was entered into, to which Mr and Mrs M'Ewan and Mr Jones were parties. The first article of this document recorded, as matter of declaration and agreement by all parties, Mr M'Ewan's adherence to his former position as regarded his wife, and a repetition of his request and desire that she should return to him. It is true that after the agreement was signed he never again wrote to his wife. It may perhaps be regretted that he did not; and if he had been left to his own impulse, I think he probably would have done so. But he was advised by Mr Robson, and the advice was, in my judgment, legally correct, that the clause to which I have referred was a standing offer to his wife to return, and needed no further repetition. In my opinion the pursuer was not, in the circumstances which I have detailed, bound to continue requests and entreaties which it seems clear enough must, if answered at all, have been answered in the negative. The limits of a deserted husband's duty in this regard were fully canvassed in the Whole Court case of Watson, 1890, 17 R. 736, where some difference of opinion arose. I think the question must be held to be largely one of circumstances. I assent to the view of Lord Kinnear in Willey's case, 11 R. 815, which was quoted with approval by the Lord President in the case of Watson, to the effect that in order to his success it is necessary that "the deserted spouse is desirous to adhere, and takes some intelligible method of expressing that desire to the offender." I cannot doubt that the pursuer here was throughout sincerely desirous to adhere, and that the defender thoroughly understood that he was so.

For the reasons which I have now stated I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree. . . .—19*th October* 1907.

Process—Interdict—Interim Interdict—Subsistence of Interim Interdict—Held That Interim Interdict Once Granted Subsists Until it is Recalled by the Court and Does Not Fall by Implication on the Lodging of Answers in the Bill Chamber or of Notice of Appearance or Defences in the Sheriff Court—Dictum of L.J.C. Inglis in Hamilton v. Allan, 1861, 23 D. 589, Explained.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Clackmannan at Alloa.

This was a petition and complaint for breach of interdict brought by Lieutenant-Colonel Home Drummond of Blair Drummond and others, proprietors of salmon fishings in the river Forth, against Henry M'Lachlan, fisherman, Alloa.

It appeared that the petition for interdict had been presented on 18th August 1902, and that interim interdict had been granted on that date. Answers were lodged. The record was closed on 3rd October 1902. The interdict was made perpetual on 21st October 1903. In the meantime the cause had fallen asleep, no step having been taken therein between 3rd October 1902 and 7th October 1903. Accordingly the interlocutor of 21st October 1903 was inept.

On 28th November 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Dean Leslie) pronounced an interlocutor, whereby he, inter alia, found that the respondent had broken the interim interdict granted on 18th August 1902.

The respondent appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who on 9th February 1907 recalled the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor, and found that the respondent had broken the interdict granted on 21st October 1903.

The Respondent appealed and argued: The interim interdict fell at the time when answers were lodged (Hamilton v. Allan, 1861, 23 D. 589, per L.J.C. Inglis at p. 591). There was therefore no subsisting interdict at the time of the alleged breach.

Argued for the Petitioners: If the interlocutor of 21st October 1903 were invalid, the interim interdict was still in force. An interim interdict subsisted until it was recalled by the Court (Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. v. Edinburgh and District Water Trs., 1906, 8 F. 731). The dictum of L.J.C. Inglis in Hamilton v. Allan (cit.) was obiter, and was inconsistent with the practice of the Bill Chamber. It was every-day practice for the Lord Ordinary, on passing the note, to "recal" or "continue" the interim interdict. These interlocutors would be inappropriate if the interdict fell when answers were lodged.

Home Drummond and Others v. M'Lachlan.

The Court recalled the interlocutors appealed against, and found that the defender had broken the interim interdict granted on 18th August 1902.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case stands in somewhat a peculiar position, but as regards the merits I have no doubt. In using a drift net or a net as a drift net, the defender was plainly acting contrary to the interdict, whether interim or perpetual.

There remains, however, the question whether the judgment can stand notwithstanding the fact that the interlocutor which declared the interdict perpetual was pronounced in a process which had fallen asleep. At the time at which the Sheriff disposed of the case, I think he was probably right, and could not have considered the regularity of the former decree, but we are in a different position, for we have the former process before us and can see that it had gone to sleep. That being so, it is, I think, safer to revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute. But it was strongly pleaded, and with a considerable force, that there was no interim interdict any longer standing, because that had been brought to an end by the fact that the respondent had lodged answers; and in support of this the opinion of Lord President Inglis, then Lord Justice-Clerk, in Hamilton v. Allan, 23 D. 589, was referred to. Now if that case had been a clear decision to that effect, it would have had to be given effect to. But to read the opinion of Lord President Inglis in that way is to make it inconsistent with itself, and it must, moreover, be considered as having some relation to practice. There is no practice which suggests that the lodging of answers can take away the effect of a judgment of a competent Court. On the contrary, the practice is that, when interim interdict has been granted de plano, the Lord Ordinary, after answers have been lodged and parties heard, either passes the note to try the question and continues the interim interdict, or refuses the note and recals the interdict. Now, either to continue or to recal an interdict that has previously come to an end is impossible.

I see that the late Mr Antonio, who had, of course, great experience in such matters, gives in his book the procedure as "Intimation ordered and interim interdict granted. Answers lodged and parties heard. Note passed and interdict continued." The practice without doubt being so, and commending itself to common sense, it is inconceivable that an interdict can be set aside merely because answers are lodged. Accordingly I am of opinion that the interim interdict was standing at the time of the fishing in question.

I think we should recal the interlocutor of the Sheriff and revert to that of the Sheriff-

Substitute, both as to his findings in fact and in law.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the merits, the evidence appears to me to be perfectly clear, and to justify the interlocutor of the learned Sheriffs. The only matter of any difficulty in the case arises in consequence of certain dicta of the late Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Hamilton v. Allan. I cannot help thinking that the report incorrectly sets forth what the learned Lord Justice-Clerk really said. The main question in that case was as to whether an interim interdict granted in the Bill Chamber upon presentation of the note and before answers were lodged, continued in force notwithstanding that the action had been allowed to go to sleep, and it seems to have been argued on behalf of the respondent that it would be a great hardship to him to have an interim interdict hanging over his head for an altogether indefinite period; and what the Lord Justice-Clerk pointed out was, that there was really no hardship, because the position of matters was due to the fact that the respondent had not lodged answers.

His Lordship is reported as having said that the interim interdict would have been brought to an end by the lodging of answers. I think that what was meant was, that if the case was one in which it was not just that interdict should be granted, the respondent might have asked for and obtained immediate recal if he had lodged answers. I think that that must have been what was meant, because I know of no rule of law or practice whereby the lodging of answers in itself operates the recal of an interim interdict previously granted, and I am confirmed in that view by the careful explanation of the effect of interim interdicts granted in the Bill Chamber, given by the present Lord President in the case of the Clippens Oil Company. I therefore think that the interim interdict here did not fall, and I agree that the safer course will be to revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with both your Lordships. The question as to the subsistence of the interim interdict would be important if there were any doubt about the practice. But so far as my experience, both as counsel and as judge, not only in this Court but in the Sheriff Court, extends, I never heard it doubted that where an interim interdict had once been granted it subsisted until it was recalled, and that it was not recalled by implication, in consequence of answers being lodged in the Bill Chamber, or by defences, or notice of appearance being lodged in process in the Sheriff Court. I have always understood that the true doctrine was that laid down by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the first portion of his opinion in the case of Hamilton v. Allan, 23 D. p. 591. His Lordship quotes an interlocutor, which was in the ordinary form of the first deliverance in the Bill Chamber, and proceeds: "The meaning of that interlocutor is perfectly well known to every professional man. From the time when that interlocutor was pronounced and until the application is disposed of, the party is under an interdict to the extent and effect craved in the bill of suspension, and it 'lies with him to remove that interdict by lodging answers as ordered by the interlocutor." So far there is little difficulty as to the meaning of his Lordship's words, but further on in the opinion he is reported to have spoken as follows: "It is in vain to say that this is any hardship on the respondent in an application for interdict; he has it in his power to bring the interim interdict to an end whenever he chooses, by lodging answers. The interdict is then at an end, and requires to be renewed, and unless it is then renewed by another deliverance, the respondent is no longer under interdict." Now it is plain that, if the latter part of this dictum has the meaning contended for by the appellant, there is a contradiction between the two portions of the opinion. I think we must reconcile them in some reasonable way, and that the true explanation is that the Lord Justice-Clerk lays down the general rule in the first part of his opinion, and that in the latter part he points out that if the party wishes to get rid of the interim interdict, lodging answers is the proceeding which gives him a locus standi to discuss the question and to get rid of the interim interdict.

I am unable to doubt that that is what the Lord Justice-Clerk meant, and I am confirmed in this opinion by what fell from the present Lord President in the Clippens Oil Company case. He points out that the practice in the Bill Chamber as to the subsistence of interim interdicts was always the same as we now understand it, although procedure by note has been substituted for procedure by bill. Further, in an excellent work by the late Mr Antonio, Clerk of the Bills, on the practice of the Bill Chamber, it is set forth as the usual procedure that, on the note being passed, the interim interdict is continued. That implies that, at the time when the note is passed, there is a subsisting interdict, because it would be absurd and futile to issue an interlocutor continuing an interdict if the interdict had fallen the moment answers were lodged, for in that case there would be no existing interdict capable of being continued. Accordingly I have no doubt that, when interim interdict has once been granted, it subsists until it is recalled by a competent Court or judge.—19*th October* 1907.

160. Millar and Another v. Millar's Trustees and Others.

Succession—Liferent and Fee—Will—Construction — Repugnancy — Direction to Trustees to Divide Residue into Shares for Children Nominatim — Subsequent Direction to Invest Shares of Two Children and Pay Beneficiaries Alimentary Liferent Only—Circumstances in which Held that Trustees Bound to Hold Shares for Liferent only of Beneficiaries, and Beneficiaries Not Entitled to Immediate Payment of Shares.

The object of this Special Case was to obtain an interpretation of certain provisions in the testamentary settlement of the late George Winton Millar. The testator died on 31st March 1895, survived by a widow and by nine children. By trust disposition and settlement, dated 28th February 1891, the deceased conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for various purposes. The fourth purpose contained the provisions in question, which are in the following terms:—

On the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, I direct my trustees to divide the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate into nine equal shares, being one share for each of my following children, videlicet—Helen Millar or Somerville, wife of David Somerville, Scotland Street, Edinburgh; Jessie Millar, Jane Millar, Marion Winton Millar, John Millar, George Millar, William Millar, Thomson Millar, and Thomas Millar; and my trustees shall invest in their own names the shares of my said daughters, and shall pay to them during their respective lives the free annual interest or produce thereof for their liferent alimentary use, and the fee of said shares shall, on the death of my said daughters, respectively be paid or made over to their respective children, equally among them if more than one, and that on each child attaining twenty-one years of age, or, in the case of daughters, on being married, whichever event shall first happen. . . . With regard to the shares of my sons the said John Millar and George Millar, my trustees shall invest the same in their own names, and shall pay to my said two sons, or expend for their behoof, in such way, by such instalments, and at such times as my trustees in their discretion shall think best, the free annual interest or produce thereof for their liferent alimentary use respectively: But notwithstanding the foresaid provisions for the shares of my said daughters, and of my said sons John and George, being liferented by them, my trustees shall have power in their discretion to pay to each of them out of the capital of their shares a sum not exceeding four hundred pounds, if my trustees consider that such payment may be for the benefit and advancement in life (my trustees being the sole judges on this point) of my said daughters and my said two sons, or any of them. . . . And it is hereby declared that the foresaid provisions in favour of my children and their issue shall not vest in them or any of them until the death of my said wife in the event of her surviving me, and that if any child shall die either before or after me, leaving lawful issue, and without having acquired a vested interest in such provision, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares, original and accruing, which their parent would have taken by survivance, and the share of any child dying without leaving lawful issue shall be divided among the surviving children, and the lawful issue of such children as may have died leaving such issue, in equal shares, per stirpes; but any sum which may accrue to my daughters and said sons John and George, under this provision, shall be held by my trustees for their liferent use only, as above provided, with reference to their original shares.

The testator's widow died on 8th June 1906. The parties to this case were the said George Millar and the curator bonis of the said John Millar of the first and second parts respectively; and the testamentary trustees and the remaining seven children of the deceased of the third and fourth parts respectively. The first and second parties contended that the intention of the testator and the effect of the said deed was to make an absolute gift to the first party and to John Millar of a right of fee of one-ninth share of the residue of the trust estate respectively, and that the provisions of the deed were ineffectual to limit their respective interests to a right of liferent merely. They further contended that the trustees were bound to make an immediate division of the estate amongst the testator's children, and to pay over to the first parties their respective one-ninth shares. The third parties contended that they were neither bound nor entitled to pay to the first and second parties respectively more than the liferent of one-ninth share of the fee of the trust estate. The fourth parties adopted the contention of the third parties.

The following questions were submitted to the judgment of the Court:—

1. Did the first party and the said John Millar, on the death of their mother, each acquire a vested right to the extent of one-ninth share of the fee of the residue of the testator's estate, or are their respective rights limited to a liferent of one-ninth share of said fee?
2. If the first branch of the first question is answered in the affirmative, are the first party, and the second party, as curator bonis of the said John Millar, each entitled to immediate payment of one-ninth share of the fee of said residue?
3. If the first branch of the first question is answered in the negative, to whom does the fee of said shares of residue belong?

Argued for First and Second Parties.—The direction to divide was equivalent to a direction to divide and pay, and in the absence of a disposal of the fee otherwise it must be held that there was a gift of an absolute fee (Jamieson v. Lesslie's Trs., 1889, 16 R. 807; Hargrave's Trs. v. Schofield, 1900, 3 F. 14). This being so, the clause restricting the interest to one of liferent is ineffectual (Wilkie's Trs. v. Wight's Trs., 1893, 21 R. 199, following Miller's Trs., 1890, 18 R. 301).

1ST DIV.
Millar and Another v. Millar's Trustees and Others.

Argued for Second and Third Parties.—There was no gift of fee in terms, and it was clear from the subsequent provisions of the deed that the testator's intention was to give a liferent only. The rule of Miller only applied where the gift of fee was held to be absolute (Tweedale's Trs., 1905, 8 F. 264; Forest's Trs., 1904, 7 F. 142; Anderson's Trs., 1904, 7 F. 224).

The Court found that the trustees were bound to hold the shares in question for the liferent alimentary use of the first and second parties with the discretion as to payment of capital expressed in the fourth purpose of the testator's settlement, and that the first and second parties were not entitled to an immediate conveyance of said shares, and declined to answer the further questions put.

The Lord President.—Mr John Millar left a family of nine children. By his trust disposition and settlement he directed his trustees "to divide the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate into nine equal shares, being one share for each of my following children, videlicet—Helen, Jessie, Jane, Marion, John, George, William, Thomson and Thomas." He then directed the daughters' shares to be invested for their liferent alimentary use, with the fee to their children. The will continues:—"With regard to the shares of my sons the said John Millar and George Millar, my trustees shall invest the same in their own names and shall pay to my said two sons, or expend for their behoof, in such way, by such instalments and at such times as my trustees in their discretion shall think best, the free annual interest or produce thereof for their liferent alimentary use respectively: But notwithstanding the foresaid provisions for the shares of my said daughters and of my said sons John and George being liferented by them, my trustees shall have power in their discretion to pay to each of them out of the capital of their shares a sum not exceeding £400 if my trustees consider that such payment may be for the benefit and advancement in life (my trustees being the sole judges on this point) of my said daughters and my said two sons or any of them." There is then a clause providing that no share shall vest in any child until the death of the survivor of the spouses, but that the share of any child predeceasing the period of vesting leaving issue shall go to such issue, or, if there be no issue, to his surviving brothers and sisters. This clause concludes: "But any sum which may accrue to my daughters and said sons John and George under this provision shall be held by my trustees for their liferent use only, as above provided with reference to their original shares." The truster's son George and the curator of his son John are the first and second parties to this case, and they ask the trustees to denude themselves of the portions of the trust estate held on their behalf, and to pay the same to them now. This is resisted by the trustees, on account of the direction to hold these shares for these sons in liferent only. This is one of the class of case of which there are many examples in the Books and regarding which it has been said that one case cannot be taken as an authority for another. But from these decisions I think one or two general rules may be gathered which will be of assistance in determining the present case. In the first place, it is quite settled that if a testator begins by conferring an undoubted and unrestricted fee, any subsequent expressions in the deed seeming to limit the fee will be disregarded on the ground of repugnancy. Of course a testator may change his mind either in a later deed or in a later part of the same deed, but where the gift and the limitations fall to be read together, the rule of construction will be as I have indicated. There is also another rule that where an undoubted fee has been conferred on a beneficiary, trust management will not be kept up where it is unnecessary. But neither of these rules, in my opinion, applies in the present case, for here there is no direct gift of fee to these beneficiaries, nor do I think that any such gift can even be inferred from the terms of the will. I do not doubt that, if there were nothing more, the direction to divide the estate into shares, "being one share for each of my following children," might be construed into a gift of fee. But here there is something more. The direction to divide merely concerns the number of parts into which the estate is to be apportioned, and the truster then proceeds to say what is to be done with each share. He first deals with the daughters' shares, and then directs his trustees to hold the shares of his sons John and George for their liferent use only. So I do not think that this case falls under the decision in Wilkie's Trs., 21 R. 199. The matter becomes still clearer if we look at the clause dealing with lapsed shares, the reference in which to the directions regarding original shares shows that the truster did not intend these sons to have immediate payment of their portion of his estate.

I do not think that the questions of law can be answered as stated either in the affirmative or the negative, as that would involve a decision as to the fee of these shares which we are not able to come to at present, seeing that all the parties who might have an interest in the matter are not before us. I therefore think that a finding should be pronounced in accordance with the opinion which I have expressed.

Lord M'Laren.—We are only concerned in this case with two out of the nine shares into which the testator directed that his estate should be divided. As to these shares the question arises whether the interest given to the testator's sons John and George is limited to an alimentary liferent or whether it extends to the capital or fee. Now, where there is a gift of an unqualified liferent and also an unqualified gift of fee to the same beneficiary, I suppose it is not doubtful that the right of the donee is the right of a fiar, because the lesser interest expands and is merged in the fee. Again, if the gift of fee is qualified only by some contingency, and that contingency is purified, the result is the same. This is the principle of the decision in Miller's case and in the other cases consequent upon it. The principle was enunciated by the Lord President in that case where he says "that where by the operation of a testamentary instrument the fee of an estate or parts of an estate has vested in a beneficiary, the Court will always, if possible, relieve him of any trust management which is cumbrous, unnecessary or expensive." But his Lordship is careful to add: "Where there are trust purposes to be served which cannot be served without the retention of the vested estate or interest of the beneficiary in the hands of the trustees the rule cannot be applied, and the right of the beneficiary must be subordinate to the will of the testator." It has never been held that in the case of the gift of an alimentary life interest in an estate with a gift of the fee which subsequently comes to the same beneficiary, the principle of Miller will apply to the effect of excluding the operation of trust purposes intended for the beneficiary's protection.

For the purposes of this case I think it is enough to say that in quite plain terms there is a direction to the trustees to invest the shares of his sons John and George in their own names, and to pay to the two sons, or expend for their behoof, in such way, by such instalments and at such times as the trustees in their discretion should think best, the income thereof for their liferent alimentary use. I am of opinion that, whether these sons have the fee or whether the fee is in the next of kin, the trustees must meanwhile pay over the income of these shares under the testamentary directions.

I agree with your Lordship that we cannot at present say whether the fee will go to the heirs of John and George or to the testator's heirs in intestacy, for there is not an eventual gift of fee to these sons except in so far as an inference to that effect may be drawn from the subsequent provision to the effect that in certain circumstances the sons may have advances out of capital.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship that the questions in the case are not put in such a form that a direct answer in the affirmative or negative would correctly determine the rights of parties, but the decision which your Lordship proposes entirely satisfies the difficulty which had occurred to me in that respect. The first question is not properly stated any more than the third. The true question in the case is raised by the contentions of the parties as set forth in Cond. 7. "The first party and the second party contend that the intention of the truster was to confer on the first party and on the said John Millar the sole right and title to and beneficial interest in the fee of one-ninth part or share of the residue of his whole means and estate in each of them; that the provisions of the trust disposition and settlement make an absolute gift to the first party and to the said John Millar of a right to the fee of one-ninth part or share of said residue, and are ineffectual to limit their respective interests to a right of liferent merely"; and as a consequence of that contention they maintain further that the trustees "are bound immediately to divide the estate among the testator's children and to pay or convey to the first party, and to the second party as curator bonis of the said John Millar, their respective one-ninth shares."

Now, for the reasons your Lordship has stated, I am of the opinion that the first and second parties are not entitled to immediate payment of their shares. The truster has clearly directed his trustees to pay to these two sons the income of their shares for their alimentary use, and there is no direction to pay the capital. The inference to be drawn is clear enough in itself, and is strengthened when we consider the different way in which the truster directs his trustees to deal with the shares of his other sons, viz. that they are to be paid over at once. But not only is there no direction to pay over the whole shares in question here, but there is a direction to pay over, in the discretion of the trustees, a sum not exceeding £400 to each of the beneficiaries, if the trustees think fit. Now that appears to me equivalent to an express direction not to pay over more than £400, and, subject to the discretionary power to advance that amount, to hold the capital in their own hands, paying the income only to the two sons in question during their lives. For these reasons I concur with your Lordship.

Lord Pearson concurred.—16*th October* 1907.

Administration of Justice—Law Agent—Duty of Law Agent who has Ceased to Act for a Party to a Cause.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

When this case, which was on the Short Roll of the First Division, was called in Court on 23rd October, counsel for the respondent alone appeared. He stated that the agents for the respondent had received intimation from the agents for the reclaimers that they had ceased to act for the reclaimers, but that they had intimated to their former clients that the case had been put out for hearing. Counsel also stated that the agents for the respondent had applied to these agents for the reclaimers' address, but that that had been refused, and the agents for the respondent had therefore been unable to give any intimation to the reclaimers personally.

The Court continued the case for two days and directed the Clerk of Court to write to the former agents of the reclaimers and require them to appear at the Bar on that date to explain their refusal to communicate the reclaimers' address.

At the next calling the agents appeared. The Lord President informed counsel who appeared for them that the Court was satisfied with an explanation which had been sent by letter to the Clerk of Court.

The Lord President added that he wished it to be clearly understood by agents practising in the Court that in every case in which they ceased to act for a party to a cause it was their duty to furnish the agents for the opposing party with the address of their former clients, if it was known to them, in order that intimation might be made by the opposite party, so as to enable that party to move the Court to proceed if further attendance was not made. His Lordship stated that the Court would not deal with the case on the footing that the reclaimers were before them, because they were told that intimation had been given by their former agents; that the intimation must be given by the opposing party.

The Court continued the case to 30th October, and ordered the respondent to make intimation to the reclaimers that the case would be called on that date, and of the motion which they would make to the Court in the event of no appearance being made by or on behalf of the reclaimers.

When the case was again called in Court on 30th October no appearance was made for the reclaimers. Counsel appeared for the respondent and stated that intimation had been given as ordered by the Court.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

The Defenders reclaimed, and argued: The Lord Ordinary's decision was based upon the similarity of purpose of the present and the original sidings. In no case should this consideration be the basis of decision. The question did not depend upon similarity of purpose, or indeed upon physical identity, but on the nature and incidence of the obligation under which it was constructed. The original siding was constructed under a personal agreement with Sim and came to an end in every sense upon the death of Sim. The present siding was constructed upon an application made by Messrs Slater, Rodger & Co. in the ordinary course as traders. The siding was also physically different.

Argued for the Defenders: There had been no discontinuity of user, and the running powers in 1865 were independent of the party to whom the crossing was primarily granted.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President. — My Lords, by the Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act 1865 the Caledonian Railway Company took over the system called the General Terminus Railway; and as is usual in such amalgamations, various other railway companies were given rights by some of the sections of the Amalgamation Act. In particular, by sect. 15, four railway companies, who, I may say, are represented by the present pursuers, were given running powers in these terms: that they might "run over and use all or any of the stations, sidings, or branches of the last-mentioned railways constructed at the time of the commencement of this Act, or any renewals thereof." The "last mentioned railways" there referred to include, inter alia, the General Terminus Railway. The plain meaning of that seems to be that what I may call the system of the General Terminus Railway, which was handed over to the Caledonian Railway Company by the Amalgamation Act, was subjected to running powers in favour of those other railway companies. They were to be allowed to run over that system, and it was provided that if the system at any time was renewed, they were still to have the same running powers over the renewed portion. It is obvious that it would have been no concession at all if at any moment when the rails got worn out in any portion of the system, and were replaced by new rails by the Caledonian Railway Company, the running powers ceased and determined. On the other hand, the running powers, of course, were limited to the General Terminus system, and did not extend to any new creations that the Caledonian Railway Company might afterwards make.

Now, the dispute in question has arisen over a certain siding, and the history of that siding seems to be this. Originally there was a long siding going to a place called Vermont Street, and from that there was a branch siding which went to serve some works, that at that time—I am now speaking of the time which ended in 1865, the date of the Amalgamation Act—belonged to a gentleman of the name of Sim. Subsequently Vermont Street really went out of existence, being superseded by a large depôt known as the Kinning Park Depôt; and accordingly part of the siding that went to Vermont Street was entirely abandoned, and the portion that went into Sim's works was still continued, although the actual direction of the rails was a little altered. In particular, instead of being only one branch it was bifurcated and made into two branches, and these two branches were prolonged into the works themselves, Sim having been succeeded by the Birkenshaw Coal Company. That was the state of affairs in 1895. In 1901 the Birkenshaw Company left the ground, and they were eventually succeeded by Messrs Slater, Rodger, & Co., who seem to have taken possession in 1903, and who are the present possessors of the ground. During the period after the Birkenshaw people left and Slater, Rodger & Co. came in, the siding was so far altered. The Birkenshaw Company took away the rails in so far as they were within their own ground, and the siding therefore became a sort of bifurcated end which approached the ground without actually entering into it. There seemed to be a little dispute between the parties as to whether this bifurcated end was actually used for the purpose of taking goods which went into the ground, or taking anything away from the ground; but in the view I take of it it really does not make any difference.

My Lords, I think the whole question is whether there really is identity of subject. I think it is perfectly clear that the question of who the private person was who used the siding, is neither here nor there. All sorts of people would use the sidings on the General Terminus system, and the running powers were not given merely so long as these sidings were used by the same people; they were given so long as there was identity of subject. My Lords, I come to the conclusion without any difficulty that here there is in the fair meaning of the words identity of subject. I do not think that the fact, if it be a fact, that for a short period the siding was, so to speak, disused, really alters the question. The siding now is what it originally was—namely, a siding for the use of those particular works connecting with the Caledonian Railway system at that point. I do not think it has lost its proper identity at all, and accordingly I think the conclusion the Lord Ordinary has come to is right.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

Lord Kinnear.—I quite agree. I agree with the final sentence of the Lord Ordinary's opinion in which he says that the siding in question is, in his judgment, a renewal of the siding which existed at the same place and substantially in the same position in 1865.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion.—18*th October* 1907.

AT DATE OF LIQUIDATION AS DISTINGUISHED FROM PROCEEDING FOR PURPOSE OF ACQUIRING NEW SECURITY — HELD SEQUESTRATION FOR FEU-DUTY NOT STRUCK AT BY SECTION 163 OF THE COMPANIES ACT 1862, AND LEAVE TO PROCEED GRANTED — ATHOLE HYDROPATHIC CO. LTD. v. SCOTTISH PROVINCIAL ASSURANCE CO., 1886, 13 R. 818, FOLLOWED—ALLAN v. COWAN, 1892, 20 R. 36, DISTINGUISHED.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Mackenzie).

This was a Note presented by Peter Begg and others, the trustees of the late James Anderson, manufacturing chemist, Edinburgh, under sect. 87 of the Companies Act 1862, in which they prayed the Court to grant leave to proceed with an action of sequestration for feu-duty, which they had raised against James Donaldson & Co. Ltd., 157 Great Junction Street Leith.

The compearers averred:—

Upon 1st June 1907 an order was pronounced by the Court for winding up [the said] James Donaldson and Company, Limited. . . .

Upon 4th June 1907 the compearers raised an action of sequestration in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against, inter alios, the said James Donaldson and Co. Ltd. in liquidation, praying for sequestration of the whole moveables on All and Whole that area or piece of ground . . . . (here followed a description of the subjects), and the Sheriff having on 4th June 1907 granted warrant to cite and sequestrated, the petition and deliverance thereon were duly served on 5th June 1907, and the moveables were of that date inventoried by the sheriff officer.

The compearers are the superiors of the area of ground referred to, and as the liquidator declines to pay the half-year's feu-duty of £107, 10s. due at Whitsunday last, and to give security for the current year's feu-duty of £215, it is necessary, in order to give effect to the superiors' hypothec upon the moveables on the ground, to proceed with the said sequestration. . . .

The Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89) provides:

Sect. 87. "When an Order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the Company except with the leave of the Court, and subject to such terms as the Court may impose."

Sect. 163. "Where any company is being wound up by the Court, or subject to the supervision of the Court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the Company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents."

On 25th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Mackenzie) refused the prayer of the note.

The Compearers reclaimed and argued: No doubt proceedings taken for the purpose of acquiring a preference were void under sect. 163 of the Act of 1862, but that section did not bar proceedings which were taken for the purpose of making available a preference which was already in existence at the date of the liquidation (Athole Hydropathic Co. Ltd. v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co., 1886, 13 R. 818; Holmes Oil Co., 1901, 8 S.L.T. 360; In re Wanzer Ltd. [1891], 1 Ch. 305). The superior's hypothec was constituted by his infeftment (2 Bell's Com., M'Laren's edition, pp. 26, 27; Yuille v. Lawrie, 1823, 2 S. 155, N.E. 140), and was thus in existence at the date of the liquidation. Athole Hydropathic Co. Ltd. v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co. (cit.) was in point. Allan v. Cowan, 1892, 20 R. 36, was distinguishable, because the creditor in that case had only a preference in the ranking as distinguished from a preference by way of security. The superior had a security only with a higher right than the ordinary security-holder. Further sequestration for feu-duty did not fall under the word sequestration in the section (Bell's Dictionary, p. 976; Bankruptcy Acts, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. cap. 79), sects. 3, 7, 107). The difference between the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and those of the Companies Act was explained by the fact that there was no vesting of the Company's property in the liquidator. The fact that the action had been brought subsequent to the date of liquidation was not a good reason for refusing leave to proceed (Stevenson & Co. v. Radford & Bright Ltd., 1902, 10 S.L.T. 82).

Argued for the Respondents: The superior's hypothec did not depend wholly on infeftment, because it was not made real without sequestration (Ersk., II. 6, 56 and 62). It was therefore not in existence at the date of liquidation, and the action, being an attempt to acquire a new security, was struck at by sect. 163 of the Companies Act 1862. Athole Hydropathic Co. Ltd. v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co. (cit.) was distinguishable, because it was a case of poinding of the ground. The distinction between a preferential debt and a security was unsound; Athole Hydropathic Co. v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co. (cit.) was therefore inconsistent with Allan v. Cowan (cit.), and was wrongly decided. This conclusion was supported by the fact that whereas the Bankruptcy Act 1856, sects. 102, 118, saved the remedies of superiors and heritable creditors, there was no similar provision in the Companies Acts. It was immaterial whether sequestration for feu-duty was a "sequestration" in the sense of sect. 163, because that section struck at all diligence (In re Wanzer Ltd. (cit.), Radford & Bright Ltd. v. Stevenson & Co., 1904, 6 F. 429). In any view the action should not be allowed to proceed, because it had been commenced subsequent to the date of liquidation, in violation of sect. 87 of the 1862 Act.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, found the sequestration at the instance of the reclaimers competent and authorised them to proceed therewith.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills must be recalled. I think the only question is whether the present case is ruled by the judgment in the Athole Hydropathic case, or that in the case of Allan. I think it is conceded that there is no substantial difference between the position of the creditor here and the creditor in the Athole Hydropathic case. There the creditor was an heritable creditor infeft in the lands, who was seeking, by the diligence of poinding, to make good the security which he had over the moveables upon the land. In this case the creditor is the superior, who is seeking to make good, by the diligence of sequestration, the security which he has of the moveables upon the land for arrears of feu-duty. It seems to me that for the purposes of this question the position of these two creditors was identical, because both of them had a right of security in regard to certain moveables, and in both cases what they were attempting to do was to make that right of security effectual by attaching the moveables. In the Athole Hydropathic case it was found that such a proceeding did not fall within the meaning of the 163rd section of the Companies Act of 1862. I recognise that the question raised in that case was one of very considerable difficulty, upon which different views might very well be held. But the case was fully argued in the First Division, and the judgment that was given was a considered judgment of Lord President Inglis, of Lord Shand, and of Lord Adam—a tribunal of unquestionably high authority—and the view which they took has been held to rule the law ever since its date some twenty years ago.

It is said, however, that the more recent decision of the same Division, in the case of Allan, really is not consistent with the view which was taken in the Athole Hydropathic case. As it happened, I was the Lord Ordinary in the case of Allan, and it seemed to me that it was ruled by the case of the Athole Hydropathic. But a different view was taken, and, I am now satisfied, was rightly taken, by the First Division, because the creditor in the case of Allan was the Collector of the County Assessments, and he founded upon a statutory provision to the effect that the debt for the assessments should be a preferable debt. I think that I was perhaps misled, to some extent, by the way the case had been put in the Athole Hydropathic case when it was said that the creditor was only seeking to make effectual a preference which he already had. But, as I have indicated, when that case is examined, the ground of judgment was that he was seeking to make effectual, not a preference in the sense of having a preferable debt, but a preference in the sense of having a security for his debt. Now in the case of Allan the creditor had no security for his debt whatever. He had merely a statutory declaration that, in the event of bankruptcy, his debt should be dealt with as a preferable debt. I am therefore satisfied that the First Division were quite right in holding that the case of Allan was not ruled by the previous case of the Athole Hydropathic.

I therefore think that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be recalled, and leave granted to the superior to proceed with the sequestration notwithstanding the liquidation of the debtors.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I entirely agree. I think that this case is precisely ruled by the judgment twenty years ago of the First Division in the Athole Hydropathic case.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that no two cases could be nearer to one another than the Athole case and this case. I think the one is practically the same as the other. And as regards the case of Allan, it distinguishes very clearly between such a case as we have at present and the case with which the Court were then dealing. It does so absolutely, and the decision in Allan's case in no way affects the decision of the First Division in the case of the Athole Hydropathic.

Mr Constable stated a very ingenious argument to the effect that if the decision to be given in this case was to be in accordance with the case of the Athole Hydropathic, certain logical consequences would follow in other cases. I do not know whether that is so or not, nor do I think it necessarily follows. But if it be true that certain logical consequences would follow, that is a matter for the legislature to deal with, and not for this Court. Therefore, although the argument of Mr Constable was very ingenious, we cannot go behind the case of the Athole Hydropathic.—26*th October* 1907.

II. Expenses—Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907—Appeal under Judicature Act 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sect. 40—Expenses in Sheriff Court—Pursuer Found Entitled to Half Only of his Expenses in Both Courts — Judge's Certificate.

The circumstances of this case are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Lord Mackenzie.—This action was brought in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, and was appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act to the Court of Session for jury trial. It is an action of damages for personal injuries, in which the pursuer recovered by the verdict of the jury a sum of £40. A motion was made on the pursuer's behalf to apply the verdict and find him entitled to full expenses. This was opposed by the defenders, on the ground that sect. 8 of the Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907 applies, and that the pursuer is only entitled to one-half of the taxed amount, unless a larger proportion, not exceeding two-thirds, is certified for.

Counsel for the pursuer argued that the Act of Sederunt did not apply, as it did not come into operation until after the action was raised. This is plainly a bad objection. The action was brought on 20th April, and the date of the Act of Sederunt is 20th March 1907. No doubt the Act had thereafter to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, but it was only if either House resolved "that the whole or any part of such Act of Sederunt ought not to continue in force" that the whole or such part was to cease to be binding, from the date of the resolution. If there was no such resolution (which was the case here), then the Act continued in force from its date.

I should have been of opinion, even if the action had been brought before 20th March 1907, that the Act of Sederunt, dealing as it does with procedure, is retrospective in its effect.

It was further maintained that the Act of Sederunt did not apply to the expenses in the Sheriff Court. Sect. 8 provides: "Where the pursuer in any action of damages in the Court of Session, not being an action for defamation or for libel, or an action which is competent only in the Court of Session, recovers by the verdict of a jury £5, or any sum above £5 but less than £50, he shall not be entitled to charge more than one-half of the taxed amount of his expenses" unless the judge certifies for a larger proportion not exceeding two-thirds.

I am of opinion that this applies to the whole expenses in the cause, and is not limited to the expenses in the Court of Session. It has been decided that when a cause has been appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act for trial by jury, the Court may deal with it in the same manner as if it had originated in the Court of Session (Cochrane v. Ewing, 1883, 10 R. 1279). It then is an action of damages in the Court of Session, and in the absence of any qualifications of the general expression "the taxed amount of his expenses" in sect. 8, I am of opinion that it means the whole expenses in the cause.

It was contended that this was a case in which a certificate should be granted for the larger amount, viz. two-thirds. I have considered this and referred to the notes taken at the trial. I am clearly of opinion that this is not a case in which a certificate should be granted.

Accordingly the verdict will be applied, decree given in favour of the pursuer for £40, and a finding pronounced entitling pursuer to one-half of his expenses and remitting to the Auditor.—26th October 1907.

Jurisdiction — Residence — Citation — Domiciled Scotsman Cited at Last Place of Residence in Scotland Within Forty Days of Leaving Scotland for Foreign Service — Judicature Act 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sect. 53.

This was an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage, in which the defender, inter alia, took the following pleas:—

"1. The defender, not being resident within Scotland, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session.

"2. Separatim, the defender, being neither domiciled in Scotland nor resident there, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the said Court."

The admitted facts relative to this question are set forth in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The defender argued that domicile did not of itself create jurisdiction in a petitory action, and at the time when the citation was made he was not de facto resident in Scotland. The pursuer had therefore no ground on which jurisdiction could be based, domicile not creating jurisdiction, and residence being absent. The pursuer thus relied solely upon sect. 53 of the Judicature Act 1825 (the purport of which is given in the Lord Ordinary's opinion) as creating jurisdiction; but that section related purely to citation and nothing else, and could only apply where jurisdiction had been established already.

In addition to the authorities mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's opinion the following were cited at the discussion:—Tasker v. Grieve, 1905, 8 F. 45; Clarke v. Newmarsh, 1836, 14 S. 488; Brown v. M'Callum, 1845, 7 D. 423; Sinclair v. Smith, 1860, 22 D. 1475; Macdoual v. Dalhousie, 1837, 16 S. 6; Udny v. Udny, 1869, 7 M. (H.L.) 89; and Bell v. Kennedy, 1868, 6 M. (H.L.) 69.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the pleas to the jurisdiction.

Lord Guthrie.—The defender Campbell was born in Scotland, son of a domiciled Scot. On 12th January 1907 he enlisted for seven years in the Royal Scots, subject to the ordinary obligations as to service with the regiment, wherever, at home or abroad, it might be ordered. Up to the morning of 14th January he resided with his parents at Hawthorn Cottage, Penicuik. On that morning he left Hawthorn Cottage for Shorncliffe, where he arrived in the afternoon of the 15th, and where he has since resided, in the course of his duty as a soldier. On the evening of the 15th a copy of the summons in the present case was left for him at Hawthorn Cottage. On that date the defender remained, as he had always been, a domiciled Scot.

In these circumstances the defender, whose only defence on the merits goes to amount of damages, pleads that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session.

The pursuer's case is founded on domicile, coupled with citation, at the defender's ordinary place of residence in Scotland, within forty days after he had left for England. The question would have been the same had the summons been left at Hawthorn Cottage thirty-nine days, instead of one day, after the defender left for Shorncliffe.

The defender does not dispute that, provided the Court had jurisdiction over him on 15th January, the citation left at a house in which he had resided within the previous forty days was good (Joel v. Gill, 1859, 21 D. 929, p. L.J.C. Inglis, 939, middle). He denies that he was subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Court on 15th January.

In Buchan v. Grimaldi, 1905, 7 F. 917, Lord Kyllachy said at page 922:—"Apart from the ownership of heritage or arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, residence and not domicile is what in ordinary actions determines the jurisdiction. Domicile—that is to say, domicile of succession—may be important in judging of the character of a residence or in questions of continuity. But while that is so it would not, I apprehend, be possible to sue, say, for debt, in the Scotch Courts, and to cite edictally a Scotsman who had resided abroad for many years, supporting the jurisdiction upon the ground merely that having been born in Scotland he had not yet lost his domicile of origin."

These observations must be taken subject to the rule which I think is implied in sect. 53 of the Judicature Act of 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), namely, that a domiciled Scotsman who has left Scotland retaining his Scotch domicile, can be subjected to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts by citing him at his last known residence in Scotland within forty days of his leaving Scotland, provided he retains his Scots domicile at the time of citation. The rule was thus expressed by Lord M'Laren in Corstorphine v. Kasten, 1898, 1 F. 287 at page 297:—"If a domiciled Scotsman goes abroad for a short time for business or recreation, it is reasonable to assume that letters and papers left at his last known residence will be forwarded to him. Accordingly this would be a proper case for leaving the citation there. The difficulty is to find a period during which this address should continue, and that is solved by the Act of Parliament, which establishes a limited period of forty days." It does not affect the views thus expressed that the same case, correcting the decision of Lord Stormonth-Darling in the case of International Exhibition v. Bapty, 1891, 18 R. 843, shews that the rule has no application in the case of a foreigner.

Banking—Cheque—Death of Drawer Before Presentment—Cheque Operating as Assignment of Funds Available for Payment Thereof—Credit Balance in Favour of Drawer on Account Current But Other Accounts Overdrawn, Though Guaranteed and Secured, to Amount Exceeding Credit Balance—Held No Funds Available—Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (19 & 20 Vict. cap. 60), sects. 53, 73, 75.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

This action was raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow on 22nd September 1905. On 4th January 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Balfour) assoilzied the defenders, the Clydesdale Bank. The facts of the case appear from the note to this interlocutor, which is in the following terms:—

Note.—This is an action at the instance of a firm of stockbrokers against the Clydesdale Bank for payment of a cheque, dated 15th December 1904, for £1588, 8s. 7d., drawn by J. & G. Moffatt in favour of pursuers upon the Clydesdale Bank. On said date (15th December 1904) the cheque was handed by the pursuers to their bankers, the Bank of Scotland, for collection, and it was presented by the Bank of Scotland to the Clydesdale Bank on the morning of 16th December 1904, but payment was refused on the ground that Mr George Moffatt, the sole partner of J. & G. Moffatt, had died that morning. The pursuers aver that when the cheque was presented there was standing at the credit of Messrs Moffatt's ordinary working account with the defenders the sum of £3105, 10s. 6d., and there can be no doubt that, in terms of sub-sect. 2 of the 53rd section of the Bills of Exchange Act, the cheque in question operated as an assignation of the sum for which it was drawn.

The defenders, however, aver that on 16th December 1904 Messrs Moffatt were owing them the sum of £26,706, but with reference to this averment the pursuers deny that Messrs Moffatt were owing the defenders that amount, and in any case it is averred by the pursuers that, although that was so, the defenders held securities for the amount, and had placed said indebtedness to the debit of accounts in their books other than said account, at which there was the credit of £3105, 10s. 6d. By this averment I understand the pursuers to mean that there was standing at the credit of Messrs Moffat's ordinary working account, on which the said cheque is said to have been drawn (although it does not bear to be drawn on any special account), the sum of £3105, 10s. 6d., and the defenders placed the indebtedness for £26,706 to the debit of accounts in their books other than the said ordinary working account. I therefore apprehend that the pursuers base their claim upon the cheque in question being a cheque upon Messrs Moffat's ordinary working account, on which there was a credit balance of £3105, 10s. 6d., and that the defenders have no right to take into consideration the debt of £26,706 in a question with the pursuers, in respect that the defenders had placed said indebtedness to the debit of accounts in their books other than said ordinary working account.

I, however, know of no authority for holding that a bank is not entitled to take into consideration the total amount due by a customer to the bank when a cheque of that customers' is presented to them for payment. In other words, the Messrs Moffatt may have had an ordinary working account with the defenders, and they may have had other accounts in the defenders' books, and I am of opinion that the bank is entitled, when Messrs Moffatt's cheque is presented, to take into consideration the whole amount standing against Messrs Moffatt in their books. The bank would certainly have no right to mix up a personal with a trust account, but they would be entitled to take into consideration the whole accounts standing in their books against the customer, and retain the total amount against his cheques. It will not do to say that the cheque referred to in this case is on the Moffatts' ordinary working account, because, as I have already said, the cheque is not ear-marked at all, and it operates as a simple assignment of the drawer's funds in the defenders' hands, and the defenders aver that they have no free funds because Messrs Moffatt were owing them £26,706, and the mere fact of the defenders holding securities for that amount and placing the £26,706 to the debit of accounts in their books other than the working account is not a relevant consideration in this case. A customer might have several accounts with a bank, all in his own personal name, irrespective of any trust, and if that customer passed a general cheque upon his account, the bank would be entitled to hold the whole monies at his credit with the bank against the cheque. This view is well expressed in Wallace and M'Neil's book on Banking Law, at page 7: "Where several accounts are opened by one person under various headings, with the object that the sums paid into the respective accounts may be kept separate, the various accounts may be treated by the bank, so far as the relation of debtor and creditor between it and its customer is concerned, as being one to the effect that a debit balance in the one may be compensated by a credit balance in the other."

Another question arises as to the countermand of the cheque. By the 2nd sub-section of the 75th section, a cheque is countermanded by notice of the customer's death, not by the death itself, but by the notice of it. This case stands in a peculiar position on this branch of it. I cannot ascertain from the record if the defenders received special or formal notice of Moffatt's death, but I do not think that any such special notice is required. The pursuers say that payment was refused on 16th December 1904, on the ground that Moffatt had died that morning, and the defenders also say that payment was refused on the ground of Moffatt's death. Neither of them say if special notice was given to the defenders of the death, nor when it was given, but it is not disputed that Moffatt died that morning, and that the reason for the bank refusing to honour the cheque was that he had died, and for the purposes of this case it is sufficient that the defenders refused payment of the cheque on the ground that Moffatt was dead, and they must have known the fact before stating it. It is too narrow to contend that notice, formal or otherwise, was not given to the bank of the death—it was sufficient that Moffatt was dead, that this was known to the bank, and that the bank's authority was revoked.

The cases referred to were Pedder v. Mayor of Preston, 31 L.J., C.P. 291; Garnett v. M'Kewan, L.R. 8 Exchq., p. 10. The authorities were Hart on the Law of Banking, p. 194, and Wallace and M'Neil, already referred to.

By the Bills of Exchange Act it is provided as follows:—

Sect. 53. Funds in hands of drawee . . . . (2) In Scotland, where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof, the bill operates as an assignment of the sum for which it is drawn in favour of the holder from the time when the bill is presented to the drawee.

Sect. 73. Cheque defined.—A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand.

Sect. 75. Revocation of banker's authority.—The duty and authority of a banker to pay a cheque drawn on him by his customer are determined by . . . . (2) notice of customer's death.

The pursuers appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

On the 7th December 1906 the Court appointed the pursuers to make intimation of the dependence of the action to the judicial factor on the estate of the late George Moffatt, and the record was subsequently opened and answers lodged for the judicial factor. Certain additional averments were made on record, and the Court allowed a proof, to proceed before Lord Pearson. The import of the proof, so far as material, appears from the opinion of the Lord President.

Argued for the Pursuer: The bank was bound to make payment of the cheque out of the funds available on the current account, upon which account the cheque was drawn. When in the course of dealing the bank has been in the custom of honouring cheques drawn on a current account as long as there are funds available there, despite the fact that other accounts of the same customer are overdrawn, the bank is not entitled to refuse to honour cheques so drawn without notice, and third parties were entitled to rely on this rule (Cumming v. Shand, 1860; 5 Hurlstone & Norman 95; Buckingham v. London & Midland Bank, 1895, 12 T.L.R. 70). When a party holds a cheque in circle he is entitled to receive payment from the funds in bank to meet it. The authority of the banker to pay the cheque is determined by notice of the customer's death (Bills of Exchange Act, sect. 55); but when the banker had in his hands funds available for the payment thereof, it remained alive as an assignment of the sum for which it was drawn (sects. 73, 53 (2), and Carruthers v. British Linen Bank, 1883, 10 R. 923; Bryce v. Young's Trs., 1866, 4 M. 312). In this case there were such funds available in the current account. Assuming that the bank was entitled to mass the accounts there were even so funds available. The banker was not entitled to plead no funds available unless he could shew the drawer to be his debtor on an accounting and realisation of the securities.

Argued for the Judicial Factor: The cases cited in the course of dealing, referred to the case of a living customer. The rule had not been applied to the case of a customer who died before presentment (Thomas v. Howell, 1874, L.R. 18 Eq. Ca. 198). The assignment could only be held to be to funds in bank generally, and on his account generally the drawer was debtor to the bank. The existence of security or guarantee was immaterial to the drawer's relation with the bank qua debtor and creditor.

Counsel for the Clydesdale Bank adopted the argument for the judicial factor.

The Court affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

The Lord President.—The pursuers in this action are stockbrokers in Glasgow. In order to oblige a certain Mr Moffatt, now deceased—who wished a sum of money in London, and who had not himself got a bank account there—they gave Mr Moffatt a cheque upon a bank in London, and by that means put in Mr Moffatt's hands a document by which he could get the money in London. They were paid for that by taking from Mr Moffatt a cheque upon his Scottish bank, the Clydesdale Bank, with its office in Glasgow.

The pursuers, unfortunately, did not present that cheque at the moment, and before they did present the cheque Mr Moffatt had died, his death being sudden. The result of that was that naturally enough the Clydesdale Bank refused to pay the cheque when presented; and the present action is directed by the Messrs Kirkwood against the Clydesdale Bank for payment of the cheque. Now the pursuers cannot deny that, so far as the ordinary operation of the cheque was concerned, the Clydesdale Bank were perfectly within their rights, and it was according to their duty, to refuse payment of the cheque, because sect. 75 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 says perfectly clearly that "the duty and authority of a banker to pay a cheque drawn on him by his customer are determined by (1) countermand of payment, and (2) notice of the customer's death." It is not denied that at the time the cheque was presented the Clydesdale Bank had notice of the customer's death.

But the pursuers rely upon the second subsection of the 53rd section, which says:—"In Scotland where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof the bill operates as an assignment of the sum for which it was drawn from the time when the bill is presented to the drawee." The pursuers say that the Clydesdale Bank had funds in their hands belonging to Mr Moffatt, and that accordingly this cheque being an intimated assignation of these funds, they are bound to make the same forthcoming. This statement of having funds in their hands belonging to Mr Moffatt the Clydesdale Bank deny; but the state of the facts as elucidated by the proof is this. Mr Moffatt, in accordance with a common practice, kept several accounts, and, using the nomenclature that is common in Scottish banking, these accounts may be described as Current Account, Loan Account, and various Cash Accounts. Now the Current Account is, as its name indicates, an account on which the ordinary transactions from day to day are made; and there is no question that this cheque was intended to be drawn upon that Current Account. In point of fact it was drawn, not by Mr Moffatt himself, but by a gentleman connected with his firm who had right to draw upon this account, and upon no other. The state of affairs as at the death of Mr Moffatt was that in the bank's books there was on that Current Account a credit balance in favour of the customer. But there were other accounts—namely, the Loan Account and various Cash Accounts; and in all of these, as was natural, there was a debit balance against the customer. There is no question whatever that the sum of these debit balances against the customer amounted to a sum much greater than the credit balance upon the Current Account.

1ST DIV.

James Kirkwood & Sons v. Clydesdale Bank and Another.

The Lord President.

It is quite true that against these debit balances upon the Loan and Cash Accounts the bank held various securities, partly consisting of stock and shares belonging to the debtor himself, and partly consisting of guarantees by various third parties, which guarantees for the purposes of the argument may be assumed to be good guarantees—that is to say, guarantees given by persons who if called upon are equal to meet the amounts. Now the argument therefore really has come to this—In the circumstances, is the bank's answer that it has no funds of Mr Moffatt a true one or not?

My Lords, I am of opinion that it is a true one. It seems to me that the state of affairs between a banker and his customer as at any given time must be taken to be the state of affairs upon all accounts, and the state of affairs on all accounts shews perfectly clearly that the bank did not owe the customer, but the customer owed the bank money. I do not think that fact is disturbed by either of the two considerations which have been pressed upon us by the counsel for the pursuers. One consideration is the question of what security the bank holds. That is a matter of very great moment for the bank, but none the less it does not seem to me to alter the relation of debtor and creditor as between the bank and its customer. That becomes very clear if you look at the security such as is given by an outsider—by a cautioner or by a guarantor. What is caution? It is not to pay money that you owe yourself, but it is to pay money that is owed by somebody else. In other words, the very hypothesis of a cautioner being called upon is that the customer is truly in the relation to the bank of a debtor and not a creditor. As little, I think, is the fact I have mentioned affected by the rule in support of which reference was made to the English cases of Buckingham and of Cumming v. Shand. That is the rule which lays down that a banker who is in the habit of honouring his customer's cheques to the extent to which he has funds at that customer's credit upon a current account is not entitled, without notice, at any moment, to turn round and refuse to honour these cheques because, as a matter of fact, there are other loan and cash accounts, and because, as a matter of fact, if all the accounts were massed the customer would be found to be a debtor and not a creditor. That seems to be common sense; and really it is a rule without which the ordinary banking practice with customers would be impossible. Cash accounts generally and loan accounts always have from their birth a debit balance against the customer, and a customer who happened to have a loan account or a cash account as well as a current account would never be in security to work on a current account at all, because he might never know at any moment when a cheque might be dishonoured upon presentment. But that does not affect this question. The question here as upon a question of honouring a cheque is gone, because the cheque as a cheque was countermanded by death; and the whole question is what is the right which is given by the section of the statute which says that a cheque shall operate as an assignation. It seems to me quite clear that the expression, "Where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof," must mean funds as upon a true state of the accounts between the two parties concerned. As I have already pointed out, upon a true accounting between the parties concerned there were no funds in the hands of the Clydesdale Bank belonging to this gentleman at this time; and I am accordingly of opinion that the result which the Sheriff has come to is right, and his judgment ought to be affirmed.

I. WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—WORKMAN'S OPTION—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897 (60 & 61 VICT. CAP. 37), SECT. 1, SUB-SECT. 2 (B)—PARTIES DEALING ON EQUAL TERMS—ACCEPTANCE OF PAYMENTS EQUAL IN AMOUNT TO WHAT WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT WOULD HAVE ALLOWED — CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH HELD WORKMAN HAD ELECTED TO TAKE RIGHTS UNDER ACT.

II. STATUTE—PRESUMPTION THAT INTELLIGENT WORKMAN KNOWS PROVISIONS OF STATUTE CONCEIVED IN HIS FAVOUR—IGNORANTIA JURIS NEMINEM EXCUSAT—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897 (60 & 61 VICT. CAP. 37).

In this case the pursuer, who was a working mason in the defender's employment, sued his master for damages in respect of injuries sustained by him on 20th November 1906, during the demolition of a tenement which was being carried out by the defender. On 8th December 1906 the pursuer was paid 18s. by defender's son, who at the same time pointed out to him that nothing was due him for the first two weeks. The sum then paid was one-half of the pursuer's full-time wage. Thereafter the sum of 18s. was paid to pursuer weekly, but no receipts were granted. On 11th May 1907 a receipt was tendered to the pursuer for signature in the following terms:—

Received by me Alexander Mackay, from George Rosie, 52 East Crosscauseway, Edinburgh, per..... .....the sum of twenty pounds sixteen shillings and.....pence sterling, being thirty-two weeks' compensation to 13th July 1907 at the rate of thirteen shillings per week, in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 or 1900, under which Act I elect to take compensation in respect of injuries arising from an accident which occurred to me while in the course of my employment with the said George Rosie on or about the 20th day of November 1906.

The pursuer refused to sign, and raised the present action.

The defender pleaded—

"(2) The pursuer having elected to accept, and having accepted, compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, is barred from raising the present action."

Proof was allowed. The facts, in addition to those stated above and the contentions of parties, sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary sustained the defender's second plea in law, and dismissed the action.

Lord Johnston.—I do not think that it is necessary to delay giving judgment in this case. The pursuer is not a foreigner; he is not even what I may call an illiterate workman. He is a Scotsman; he is a member of one of the skilled trades of this country, and from his appearance I am justified in saying that he is one of the best representatives of that trade. On the other hand, the defender is a man really of much the same station as the pursuer. He is now an employer, but he began as a workman—so much so, that the present pursuer actually worked under him when he was merely a foreman in the employment of others. I regard them in point of education and in point of intelligence, and I say so not merely as a matter of inference, but from their appearance in the witness-box I must regard them, though one is workman and the other employer, very much as equals.

Now, the pursuer's counsel's contention practically comes to this, that there is a duty imposed upon the employer to take charge of the interests of his workmen. I cannot conceive a case in which such a rule would operate greater injustice than the present, where I find that the employer and the workman are men of similar origin, similar upbringing, similar education and, as far as I can judge, of similar capacity, only that the one, being about eighteen years older than the other, has developed into a small employer, which there is no reason the other should not also do in his turn. But there is no such rule. The employer must not take advantage of the position of his workman, must not take advantage of his ignorance and want of education, must not take advantage of the physical condition to which a serious accident has for the time reduced him. But when they meet on equal terms and at arm's length, I hold that there is no more obligation on the employer to take charge of the interests of his workmen in the matter of compensation for accident, than there is on any other contracting party to charge himself with the interests of the party with whom he is contracting.

What, then, are the circumstances here? The pursuer meets with, I assume, a serious accident. His employer acts with perfect consideration to him. I cannot conceive of any more appropriate or more considerate action on the part of an employer. He sends his son at once to see him, and, at the of the week in which the accident occurs, sends him again to make payment of, not the precise amount of wages which were due, but of a liberal allowance in lieu of the balance of wages. The actual sum paid is a matter with which I have no concern; but I have a concern with this, that, on the day on which it was paid, the defender's son said to him: "That is to cover anything that is due to you at present; you will get nothing for the next two weeks, and after that you will get half wages." Now, I am prepared to hold it as proved by irresistible implication that both parties were perfectly aware what the meaning of this was. I am not going to take it off the pursuer's hands that a Scottish workman of his position and his capacity at this time of day knows nothing about the Workmen's Compensation Act. If there be an idea abroad among workmen that they may pose as in ignorance of the statutes which have been passed to provide for their protection, it is high time that that idea was dissipated. I am prepared to hold that a British workman is bound not merely to know something about his rights, but to take proper steps to ascertain what his rights are, and that, as I have already said, when he deals with his employer on even terms and at arm's length, there is no more obligation upon the employer to take charge of his interests than there is on any other contracting party to take charge of the interests of the party with whom he is contracting.

Now, it is clear that the pursuer knew perfectly well that, in the first place, he was entitled by a statute, even if he did not know by what precise statute, to nothing for the first fortnight, and to half wages during the subsequent time of his disablement. He knew perfectly well that his employer was under obligation, imposed upon him by a statute, to make that payment; and, for the space of nearly six months he accepted and allowed his employer to continue paying him half wages, or what was understood to be half wages, although it turned out, on an accurate calculation, to be somewhat more. For a period of nearly six months half wages were paid as matter of obligation and of statutory obligation and accepted as matter of right and of statutory right, and there being no question of advantage taken, I think it is impossible to do otherwise than infer an agreement to make and accept compensation in this statutory form. I cannot accept the pursuer's contention that he is now entitled to come here and say, "I knew it was under some statute, but I did not know under what statute it was that this payment was being made; moreover, I did not take the trouble to ascertain what was the statutory condition of my accepting this payment." He is not a child, he is not a foreigner, he is not an illiterate; he is an educated workman. He was not, during those six months, on a bed of sickness or otherwise incapacitated. He was not in any sense in a position in which it could be said that the parties were not meeting on equal terms and were not acting at arm's length. To sustain the pursuer's contention would be to write out of the law of Scotland the principle that ignorantia juris neminem excusat in favour of the workman, but of the workman only, where he transacts with his employer in the matter of compensation for personal injury.

In the case of Valenti, 1907, S.C. 695, referred to, the parties were not on equal terms. There you have the employer, a large company, acting through its officials; and the workman, an Italian, knowing little or nothing of English. Even under these circumstances, had there been anything like the facts which you have got here, an agreement would, I think, have been implied. But there was only one interview and two receipts which, ex hypothesi, the man could not read, which he only authenticated by his mark, and about which no practical explanation was given to him. Again, in the case of Fowler, 1903, 5 F. 394, also referred to, you have the parties also not on equal terms, through another cause. The workman there met with an injury which so much affected one of his eyes that it ultimately had to be removed. While he was lying suffering acutely from the inflammation in the eye, before the operation, he was asked to sign one single receipt. Quite unable to read, and in a bodily condition in which it is not to be presumed that he was capable of applying his mind to what he was doing, he signed the receipt, at a place which was pointed out to him, and without explanation. In neither of those cases were the two parties dealing on equal terms, and their circumstances were quite different from those of the present case. But I think there is another point which differentiates them. In Fowler's case there was one receipt, and one receipt only. In Valenti's case there were two. But here there were about five and twenty payments spread weekly over a period of nearly six months made and accepted. It is quite true that the master through his son came to the workman and openly told him what he was bound to pay and the workman entitled to receive. The master did, in a certain sense, volunteer the payments at the start and continued to forward them for a month or six weeks; but for the next three or four months the pursuer, quite content with the situation, regularly went and applied for the payment. Mr Anderson contended that he made no claim. It seems to me that there is quite ample claim to satisfy the statute. If a man comes to the office to ask and receive the payment which had been made to him for a month or six weeks at his own house and continues to do so from about the beginning of January until May, it seems to me that that distinguishes the case from Fowler's and Valenti's cases, and brings it very much more nearly on all fours with the case of Little, 1900, 2 F. 387, where receipts were signed for six months.

I venture to say that there is no distinction in the principle here to be deduced from the fact that no receipts were actually signed. If the pursuer is justified in his contention here, I do not think he would have been foreclosed even had he signed receipts. He is paid and he receives half his wages admittedly as a matter of statutory right and obligation. Would it have made it any stronger if he had signed a receipt in which it was stated "I accept the sum which you are paying me as statutory compensation or even as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act"? I think not, because, in the knowledge of both parties, the sum was paid and was received under statute, if not specifically under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If that is so, can it be admitted that a man should come and claim and accept a payment which is due to him under statute and not be held to take it with all the statutory conditions? Is the master, because the transaction happens to be between a master and a servant—is the master bound to say, "Oh, I cannot pay you this, until I am quite sure that you know what the statute is under which we are transacting, and that you know everything that is in the statute; not merely that you are entitled to this payment—not merely that you are receiving this payment under the statute, but that you know all the conditions which will follow your receipt?" I know no law which makes such a difference between contracts, between employers and workmen, and contracts between other people. If the one party does not choose to know his rights, I am prepared to say that the same law must be meted out to him, though he is a workman, as would be meted out to anybody else were the contract other than a contract between master and workman.

What concludes the matter to my mind is this: if one party is bound, both parties are. It seems to me it would have been futile for the master in the circumstances of this case to have turned round and said, "No, I am not going to continue these payments." If the master is bound so must the employee be.

I shall therefore sustain the second plea in law for the defender and dismiss the action. But in respect that both parties fell into error in May 1907, after the payments had been going on for nearly six months, the one proposing to go back on the basis of wages, on which the agreement had been made, at his own hand and not by application under the statute to have the amount of compensation varied, and the other repudiating the agreement altogether, and are therefore mutually responsible for the litigation which has ensued, I shall find no expenses due to or by either party.—18*th October* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

This was an action brought by George Turnbull M'Kechnie, 59 Comiston Road, Edinburgh, against (1) the trustees of his deceased father, John M'Kechnie, warehouseman, 99 Princes Street, Edinburgh, and (2) Miss Jemima White, Ardgowan, Pollokshields, Glasgow, for reduction of the trust disposition and settlement of the said John M'Kechnie, dated 11th January 1904, and of a codicil thereto, dated 16th September 1904.

By the said trust disposition and settlement the testator left the bulk of his estate to the defender Miss White, and to his illegitimate son by her—C. J. D. M'Kechnie. The testator left a provision of about £2 per week to his legitimate daughter Mrs Jane M'Kechnie or M'Lelland. Quoad ultra, the provisions in favour of the testator's wife and of his legitimate family consisted of the residue of the estate, which was estimated to produce a sum of about £900. The testator's estate at the date of the settlement amounted to about £12,000, but, mainly in consequence of inter vivos gifts in favour of Miss White, the amount of the estate passing under the will was only £8500. By the said trust disposition and settlement the testator left a house, 13 Annandale Street, Edinburgh, to his brother Alexander. By the codicil of 16th September 1904 he revoked this bequest and left the house to his illegitimate son C. J. D. M'Kechnie.

The facts of the case are sufficiently set forth in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

On 2nd February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) reduced the codicil of 16th September 1904, and, quoad ultra, assoilzied the defenders.

He issued the following Opinion.

Lord Ardwall.—In this action George Turnbull M'Kechnie, who is the youngest son of the late John M'Kechnie, seeks to reduce his father's trust disposition and settlement, dated 11th January 1904, and a codicil thereto, dated 16th September 1904.

At the conclusion of the proof, counsel for the pursuer stated that it was not now maintained that Mr M'Kechnie was not of sound disposing mind at the date of the deeds, but that reduction was sought either on the ground of facility and fraud or circumvention, or of facility and undue influence.

The deceased John M'Kechnie was born in 1848, and accordingly was fifty-seven years old at the time of his death on 16th October 1905. In 1873 he married Mrs Elizabeth Turnbull or M'Kechnie, who is still alive and an inmate of the Crichton Institution for the Insane, Dumfries. Four children were born of the marriage: (1) John Dickson M'Kechnie, born in 1874; (2) Jane Templeton M'Kechnie, who is now Mrs M'Lelland, born in 1877; (3) David M'Kechnie, born in 1879, and who died unmarried in 1899; and (4) the pursuer, born in 1882, and who is now twenty-four years of age.

The testator, whom I shall designate Mr M'Kechnie, began business life in Glasgow, apparently as a salesman, in Copland & Lye's warehouse. In 1878 he and his wife removed to Edinburgh, and in 1881 Mr M'Kechnie entered into partnership with a Mr Wight in a ladies' dressmaking and drapery business. In April of 1882 the defender, Miss White, entered M'Kechnie & Wight's employment as a dressmaker. In 1884 Mr and Mrs M'Kechnie, who had previously been living apart for about a year, entered into a contract of separation, which is dated 19th August and 3rd September of that year. An attempt has been made to shew that the estrangement and separation were due to Mr M'Kechnie having at that time begun to pay attentions to Miss White, but I do not think that this is proved, and it is really no part of the case to determine who was to blame for the separation, although I think there is more evidence to the effect that Mrs M'Kechnie was a difficult person to get on with than Mr M'Kechnie was, but possibly there were faults on both sides. Mrs M'Kechnie was probably all along a person of a more or less neurotic and excitable temperament, which culminated in insanity in 1895, when she was removed to Morningside Asylum. In 1888 Mr M'Kechnie opened a shop at 99 Princes Street, Edinburgh, and dissolved partnership with Mr Wight. Miss White, who had continued head of the dressmaking department with Mr M'Kechnie, subsequently applied for and obtained the situation as manageress of the shop in Princes Street, and the subsequent prosperity of that business seems to have been largely due to her.

On 31st January 1889 a will was prepared by Mr Coutts and signed by Mr M'Kechnie. In 1891 or 1892 Mr M'Kechnie opened two new shops, one in Waverley Bridge, Edinburgh, and the other in Argyle Street, Glasgow. After Mrs M'Kechnie was removed to Morningside Asylum in 1895, Jane and George M'Kechnie resided with their father at 26 Pitt Street, Edinburgh, but in 1896 Mr M'Kechnie, who for some time previously must have been carrying on an illicit intimacy with Miss White, took up house with her at 18 Westminster Terrace, Glasgow, where they lived as husband and wife, and on 10th January 1897 C. J. D. M'Kechnie, who is often referred to throughout the evidence as "C. J.," was born at 18 Westminster Terrace, Glasgow, and for some time after that old Mrs M'Kechnie, Mr M'Kechnie's mother, resided with her son at 18 Westminster Terrace, Glasgow, and looked after the child, Miss White apparently having gone to England for some time.

In March 1898 John and George M'Kechnie, who had been living for some time in Birmingham, came to reside in Edinburgh, in compliance with their father's request, as appears from the letter No. 109 of process, addressed by Mr M'Kechnie to his son John. It appears that, following on that letter, Mr M'Kechnie took John to the Princes Street shop and introduced him there as his son and future partner, but he had only been there two days when his father wired him to come through to Glasgow, and he then told him that he had written him on the understanding that Miss White was not coming back to manage the business, but that this was a mistake, and that she had gone to 99 Princes Street, Edinburgh, that day, but offered him an equal position in the business with Miss White; but he refused that, and shortly after left, his father promising him £200 as compensation to him for having thrown up his situation in England. This incident, which undoubtedly is proved, is founded on very strongly as shewing the great influence Miss White had over Mr M'Kechnie. On the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that Mr M'Kechnie had previously, if Miss White is speaking the truth, offered her a partnership in the Princes Street business, that that business had not been doing so well during the eighteen months she was away from it, and that Mr M'Kechnie, in his own interests, was more than willing that Miss White should resume her old position in the shop, even although he did not like sending John away again after having asked him to come.

In April 1898 Mr M'Kechnie's four children all commenced to live together in Manchester with John, and Alexander M'Kechnie, Mr M'Kechnie's brother, entered his employment in the shop at 18 Argyle Street, Glasgow. In August 1900 Mr M'Kechnie purchased a house called "Craigton" at Girvan, where he and Miss White generally went for the summer after that, and in 1901 he purchased a villa—"Shawfield"—in the Pollokshields district, and he and Miss White removed to it from their Westminster Terrace house. On 9th September 1901 George M'Kechnie left Manchester and went to Peter Robinson's in London, and John M'Kechnie left Manchester and entered the shop at 18 Argyle Street, Glasgow.

In 1902 Mr M'Kechnie opened another shop at 60 St George's Road, Glasgow, and John went to manage it. In March of 1902 George entered his father's employment for the first time at 18 Argyle Street, Glasgow, and in that same month John and he visited their father at Shawfield for the first time since he had taken up house with Miss White, and at Christmas of the same year Mr M'Kechnie opened another shop at 184 Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow. On 6th March 1903 Mr M'Kechnie executed a trust disposition and settlement, which would come into operation if the deeds under reduction were set aside. On 10th May 1903 Mr M'Kechnie had a serious illness, which I shall afterwards have to refer to. On 26th August 1903 Mr M'Kechnie handed over to his son John the business at 60 St George's Road, Glasgow. On 29th August a codicil to the will of 1903 was signed, and on 28th November of 1903 Mr M'Kechnie made over the whole of the furniture in all his houses to Miss White by letter. On 11th January 1904 the trust disposition and settlement under reduction was executed, and on 29th April George M'Kechnie, who had been latterly at 18 Argyle Street, Glasgow, had high words with his father, and left his employment for the last time. On 3rd August Mr M'Kechnie executed a contract of copartnery with Miss White, giving her over as a free gift the half of the capital in the businesses as from 1st March 1904. On 16th September the codicil under reduction was executed under the circumstances which I shall afterwards have to refer to. On 20th September 1904 the pursuer went to London and got a situation with a Mr Poppy, and during his absence in London he regularly corresponded with his father. In May 1905 a villa, called "Ardgowan," was bought by Miss White, and Mr M'Kechnie and Miss White removed there from Shawfield. In September Mr M'Kechnie and his son George met several times in London. After his return from London, Mr M'Kechnie, in the beginning of October, made preparations for having a new trust disposition and settlement made out, and by Friday the 13th of October he had these pretty well completed, but he died on Monday the 16th of October. These jottings for a new will are Nos. 51 and 52 of process, and, as explained by Miss Peter, the cashier of the Edinburgh business, whom he got to assist him in making out the jottings, he had No. 52, which is all in his own handwriting, with him when he first dictated to her detailed jottings made from it. The first edition of these, so to speak, was not satisfactory to him, and he had two more copies made out before he got them adjusted to his mind. Miss Peter gave a very clear explanation of the meaning of these jottings, which I have no hesitation in accepting as correct.

These being the main events connected with this case, I shall now proceed to state shortly what I consider the result of the very voluminous proof which was led by the parties.

One or two matters may be disposed of at once. There was an attempt made to show that Mr M'Kechnie was of intemperate habits. This entirely broke down. It was proved, indeed, that he was what might be called a free drinker when he got home after business hours, but that he never took alcohol in any shape during the day, and, considering the enormous amount of physical and mental work he went through each day before his illness, I cannot say the amount of drink he took was excessive, though probably he would have been better with less. After his illness in May 1903 his medical adviser recommended him to cease from the use of alcohol altogether, and this he did, so the drink question does not seem to enter into the present case.

Then, again, it is suggested that Miss White endeavoured to keep away the members of his family from Mr M'Kechnie, and to prejudice him against them. I think this is without foundation. I am of opinion that, considering the difficult position she was in, she behaved very well to the members of Mr M'Kechnie's family, inviting them to come and see their father both at Shawfield and at Girvan, especially when he was ill. The daughter, Jane M'Kechnie, frequently stayed with them; George and John frequently visited them, so also did Alexander M'Kechnie, the deceased's brother, who was a constant visitor on Sundays.

The next point to be considered is the state of Mr M'Kechnie's health after his illness in May 1903. His illness began with a seizure one morning before he got up. He was able, however, to ring the bell and send for Miss White, who discovered that he was complaining of a severe pain in his head and a difficulty in seeing properly with one eye. This pain in his head lasted for a considerable time, and his medical man seems to have no doubt that it was caused by a slight effusion of blood upon the brain, caused by the bursting of some small blood-vessel, and that it was the pressure of this on the optic nerve that affected his eyesight. This, however, according to the doctor's opinion, was not so serious a matter as what he discovered on examination regarding the state of Mr M'Kechnie's heart, for he found that he was suffering from serious derangement of the heart's action. Possibly that may have been connected in some way with the effusion of blood on the brain; at all events, the two attacks seem to have been simultaneous, and it was the state of his heart, more than anything else apparently, that led to the doctor cautioning him against continuing to work in the way he had been doing, and ordering him to take life much more easily, as well as prohibiting the use of stimulants. It may be noticed here that the life that Mr M'Kechnie had been leading, accompanied throughout by Miss White, was one of the most exhausting description. They daily started early in the morning, either from Girvan or from Pollokshields, for Glasgow, inspecting the Argyle Street shop, and sometimes the others, went through to Edinburgh by train, were occupied there at the central business in Princes Street, with occasional visits to the other business, the whole day, returned to Glasgow at night, and thence to Pollokshields or Girvan, as the case might be. It is, I think, pretty clear that after his illness there was a great apparent loss of physical energy on the part of Mr M'Kechnie, partly due, no doubt, to the change wrought in him by his illness, but still more due to the fact that having been seriously alarmed as to the state of his heart, he took much greater care of himself, and this was, of course, accentuated by the defect in his eyesight, which seems to have troubled him more or less for a considerable time. His weakened physical condition undoubtedly would affect his disposition more or less, and might make him more amenable to pressure on the part of others, and especially of Miss White, who was constantly with him, and whose presence and assistance were invaluable to him in his impaired state of strength.

As to his mental capacity, I do not think it has been proved that that was impaired in the sense that he was less capable of understanding business of any kind, although it is possible that he may have been unable to seize ideas as rapidly as he had done before, or to carry them out as promptly and energetically. But the evidence of his architect, Mr Shearer, of his man of business, Mr Geddes, of Mr Nightingale, and of Mr Macpherson, the accountant, and other less important witnesses, I think proves that he was perfectly intelligent, and able to attend to business matters to the end of his life. But the strongest evidence upon this I consider to be the evidence of Miss Peter, which is completely borne out by the documents Nos. 51 and 52 of process, and which shews how capable he was up to within a few days of his death of making a settlement of his affairs, to meet certain main ideas which he had himself jotted down in his own hand, and wished to carry out. The conclusion I arrive at, therefore, as to his mental condition is that possibly owing to failing bodily strength and the condition of his heart he may have been less able to resist any pressure brought to bear on him by others than he was before his illness, yet I cannot say that it is proved that generally he was weak and facile in mind, although it is possible that he might be more or less facile in the hands of a person who had very strong influence over him.

This leads me to the consideration of the question as to alleged undue influence of Miss White over the testator.

Miss White, as the whole of her history in this case shews, is an exceedingly capable, clever, and managing woman, and I have little doubt that Mr M'Kechnie spoke the truth when he said, as he repeatedly did, that he owed his success in business very much to her. His business was one in which a great many young women were employed, both in the dressmaking department and in the shop, and the principal customers were ladies. In a business of that kind, accordingly, it was all-important to have a capable managing lady both to look after the employees and to interview customers. Miss White was, owing to her ability, experience, and tact, in a position of commanding influence in relation to Mr M'Kechnie as regarded his business. But besides that, she was really in the position not merely of a mistress but of a wife, and possessed the influence attached to both these positions, because while she managed his household, looked after himself, and was his companion at bed and board, just as a wife would have been, she was, as being only his mistress, in the position of being able to leave him whenever she liked, being under no legal obligation whatever to remain with him longer than she chose. I think that she only spoke the truth when she signified to two or three of the employees who speak to the matter that she could twirl Mr M'Kechnie round her little finger, and from various things that she is reported, I think truly, to have said at different times, it is apparent that she was quite conscious of the influence she had with Mr M'Kechnie, either to prevent him doing what she did not want done or to do what she did want. I attach no importance to her denials of what these witnesses say, for while she struck me as a very clever witness, I observed that when a crucial question was put to her, she several times either pretended that she did not hear it or did not understand it, while she was thinking hard all the time what answer it would be best for her case to give. In short, she conveyed to my mind the impression that she was a very clever witness, but not a very reliable one.

M'Kechnie v. M'Kechnie's Trustees.

But however strong an influence one person may possess over another, especially when holding such close personal relationship as Miss White did to Mr M'Kechnie, that will not suffice to reduce a will unless it is proved that that influence was exercised unduly in order to impetrate the will from the testator, or failing such evidence of connection between the person possessed of such influence and the preparation or execution of the deed complained of, it would require to be shewn that the will was so outrageously against the presumed intentions or clear moral duty of the testator as to make it incredible to suppose that it could have been executed except under the pressure of undue influence on the part of those who were taking the principal interest under it. Now there is not a particle of evidence to show that Miss White had anything whatever to do with the giving of the instructions for the preparation of the deed under reduction or the execution of it. The will under reduction was prepared by Mr Geddes, solicitor, Edinburgh, who is a witness in the case. It seems the will under reduction began first to be discussed about the beginning of August 1903, when the testator told Mr Geddes that he was proposing making codicils to his will, and gave him directions. Mr Geddes advised him that a new will should be drafted, as the codicils would not fit in very well. Mr Geddes seems to have thought throughout that Mr M'Kechnie was giving too much to Miss White and her child, and warned him that there might be trouble about it; but Mr M'Kechnie, who seems to have had a strong will of his own, determined to have his own way, and gave Mr Geddes the reasons for his settlement. The jottings he left with Mr Geddes were in his own handwriting, and he instructed him perfectly intelligently, and told him to send him a statement in black and white setting forth the legal rights of his widow and children, which Mr Geddes did, and it forms No. 37 of process. The draft accordingly was made out as he had instructed, and he was so anxious that it should be his settlement, that when he brought it back for engrossment he had the draft executed as a will, so that it would serve as a will till the engrossment was made out and duly signed. All this was done in Edinburgh, and outwith the presence of Miss White. The draft is No. 48 of process, and it bears out what Mr Geddes says to the effect that Mr M'Kechnie thoroughly understood the terms both of the draft and of the will, and I have no doubt he did. It was signed at Edinburgh on 11th January 1904, before Miss Peter and a dressmaker in the shop. Mr Geddes says that Miss White had nothing whatever to do with any of the deceased's testamentary writings, and certainly it is not proved that she had.

It is always of importance in a case of this sort to consider the terms of the deed itself, and if, as I have already said, the terms of such deed are in conflict either with the known or presumed intentions of the testator, or are so entirely contrary to ordinary moral obligations as to make it incredible that it should have been executed by him voluntarily, that may have the effect of opening the door for the plea of undue influence.

The first thing that is noticeable about the will under reduction is that, so far as Miss White is concerned, it does not materially differ in its provisions from the will of 1903, nor yet as regards the provisions in favour of the pursuer, although in two ways the effect of these provisions has been much altered, in the first place, because the 1904 will disposes of some heritable properties which, under the 1903 will, were left to fall into residue, and, in the next place, by the conveyance of one-half of the partnership assets after the will of 1904 was executed, by which, of course, the residue of Mr M'Kechnie's estate was largely reduced in amount.

Coming to the provisions of the will itself, undoubtedly Miss White and her child take the lion's share of the estate, but from some points of view this was not extraordinary. If we are to believe Mr Geddes and other witnesses, Mr M'Kechnie strongly insisted on the service Miss White had been to him to make the money he had made. Then undoubtedly he had been the means of placing her and her child in a disadvantageous social position, for after his death it would emerge that she had been his mistress and not his wife, as their friends and neighbours at Pollokshields and Girvan had supposed, and that the child was illegitimate. Then the child was of tender age, being only seven years old in 1904, and apparently he was much attached to it. It is therefore not extraordinary that he should leave the bulk of his estate to Miss White and their child. But his obligations to the others of his family were not forgotten. His wife was left sufficient for her support in Dumfries Asylum, considering that she was besides entitled to her terce, as he knew from Mr Geddes' note; then his son John had been left a share of the residue, and had been set up in business; besides, Mr M'Kechnie had been very much displeased and disappointed about his marriage. George was certainly not very well left, but it is to be observed with regard to him that his father did not seem to have much confidence in him, and probably thought he was not to be trusted with much money, but would do better without it. He had very foolishly, and after using some very unbecoming language to his father, left the shop in Argyle Street, where he had been placed. His own account of it given in his evidence shews that he spoke in a foolish manner, owing partly undoubtedly to his resenting the position Miss White had been put into when his mother was still alive, but still not at all justified by anything that Miss White had ever done to him. His father seems to have been considerably dissatisfied by his conduct in the shop in Edinburgh and Glasgow, by his being too severe with the shop girls at one time and too familiar at another, while his correspondence with his father from London was of the most ridiculous character, and his father seems to have resented it more or less as silly and unbecoming in a man of business, besides being not always respectful to himself as his father. Mr M'Kechnie, however, shewed no ill-will to George; on the contrary, he appears to have been kindly disposed towards him notwithstanding his faults. Then with regard to his daughter Jane, he makes a provision for her which will give her £2 a week for life, as he considered that she was not likely to be able to earn her own living for herself. He also made a provision for his brother Alexander, his sister Mary, and his other sister Mrs Johnston; and on the whole I cannot say that the will is either an irrational or absurd one, or one the terms of which, looking to the history of the family, was not consistent with what may be presumed to have been the wishes and intentions of the testator; nor is it a will which ignores his obligations to his lawful wife and family, and even his collateral relations. I need hardly say that, granting all this, I consider that it was, when taken along with the contract of copartnery and other deeds, a most unfair disposition of his property as regarded his lawful children.

While, therefore, I think there is no evidence to justify me in reducing the will on the ground that it was impetrated by undue influence on the part of Miss White, I think the matter is different with regard to the codicil under reduction. That codicil deprives Alexander M'Kechnie, the testator's brother, of the fee of the property, 13 Annandale Street, and gives it to C. J. M'Kechnie. I regard this codicil as being directly the work of Jemima White and her alone. The incident out of which the matter arose was a sufficiently absurd one. Miss White, on her way to Edinburgh one morning, had requested Alexander M'Kechnie to get a cap for her boy, and to send it by the porter to the Pollokshields train along with other parcels in the afternoon. In the bustle of business Alexander M'Kechnie forgot this commission till the porter had started with the parcels for the train. On recollecting this, he rushed out and bought a cap, and sent one of the shop girls down to the train with it, telling her to give it to Miss White. I must here notice that Miss White was known by that name in all the shops, but at Westminster Terrace and at Shawfield she was known as Mrs M'Kechnie, and was visited by a number of people, including the Free Church minister and his wife, who supposed her to be Mr M'Kechnie's wife. When the girl got to the station Mr M'Kechnie and Miss White were seated in a carriage for Pollokshields, and in the same carriage was a gentleman from Pollokshields who lived right opposite them, and who had known and visited them as Mr and Mrs M'Kechnie. The girl, when she saw them, rushed forward with the parcel, and said quite loudly, "Here's a parcel for Miss White," to whom accordingly it was handed. Mr M'Kechnie and Miss White, but I expect especially the latter, were much disconcerted, it is said, by this occurrence. Miss White says that Mr M'Kechnie was very angry at Alexander, and on getting home resolved to dismiss him from the shop, and sent her in to tell him so; that she, after getting her tea, went back to Glasgow to the shop and did not dismiss Alexander from the shop as she had been told to do, but talked a lot to him and told him how angry his brother was. Alexander says about Miss White when she came into the shop: "She told me that I had a lot of consideration for her, and she would have as much consideration for me, and would pay me back and make me suffer for it." Miss White denies this, but I believe Alexander M'Kechnie, who appeared to me to be an exceptionally candid and honest witness, and I do not believe Miss White's denial, and I further believe that it was entirely due to her influence that Mr M'Kechnie, on the 16th September 1904, made the codicil he did. I do not believe Miss White's story. I have the gravest doubts whether Mr M'Kechnie told her to dismiss Alexander, but, if he did, I think that, with her usual acuteness in business matters, she thought Alexander was very useful where he was in the Argyle Street shop, and where, I may observe, he still remains under Miss White's management, and that she thought a better way of punishing him would be to get him taken out of the will and her own son substituted. I do not think Mr M'Kechnie would have done this himself. It was much more like a woman's trick, and not what Mr M'Kechnie would have done of his own free will when he heard how innocent his brother Alexander had been in the matter, which was a pure accident so far as he was concerned. I am confirmed in this view by the fact that in the jottings which represent Mr M'Kechnie's last intentions he again makes a bequest to Alexander, though not of the same nature as formerly. It is also noticeable that Miss White knew what had been done by Mr M'Kechnie, for she told Alexander the moment he went out to the house after Mr M'Kechnie's death that he had been cut out of the codicil in consequence of the incident above referred to. On the facts, therefore, I am of opinion that Miss White, being very much enraged with Alexander M'Kechnie, though with no good reason, exercised the strong influence she had with Mr M'Kechnie in order to carry out her threat to pay Alexander back and "make him suffer for it." We have here the position which is familiar in criminal law of an evil threatened and an evil perpetrated, the person who made the threat having it in her power to accomplish the perpetration by the hand of another person. I am of opinion that in such circumstances a judge or jury is entitled to infer that the person who made the threat was the person who truly carried it out.

I accordingly propose to grant decree of reduction of the codicil, on the ground that it was impetrated by undue influence on the part of Miss White, Mr M'Kechnie being at the time facile in mind in relation to her, in consequence of the commanding influence she had obtained over him and his entire dependence upon her.

With regard to expenses, the pursuer has been successful in reducing the codicil, and although that is merely part of the directions as to the succession of the deceased, yet it could not have been obtained without evidence bearing on the whole history of the deceased and his relations to Miss White. Accordingly, I think the pursuer is entitled to some expenses, but as he has failed in reducing the deceased's will, I think these may be modified to the extent of one-half. The trustees will be entitled to take out of the trust estate the amounts strictly expended by them in defending the will, but they must not take out of the trust estate any part of Miss White's expenses, which she herself must meet out of the very ample provisions she has secured out of the deceased's estate.

The defenders reclaimed and argued: Standing the will, the pursuer was not entitled to insist in a reduction of the codicil, because he had no interest to sue (Swanson v. Manson, 1907, S.C. 426; Gilchrist v. Morrison, 1891, 18 R. 599; Duncan v. Duncan, 1892, 20 R. 200). On the merits the pursuer's case failed, both as to the will and as to the codicil. Undue influence was a good ground of reduction only where the party alleged to have impetrated the will stood in a fiduciary relation (as, for instance, that of legal or spiritual adviser) to the testator (Munro v. Strain, 1874, 1 R. 522; Harris v. Robertson, 1864, 2 M. 664; M'Callum v. Graham, 1894, 21 R. 824; Weir v. Grace, 1898, 1 F. 253). There was no such relation here (Hargreave v. Everard, 1856, 6 Ch. (Ir.), 278). There was no proof that undue influence had been exercised. As to the ground of facility and circumvention, the testator was not facile, and there was no proof of circumvention.

Argued for the Pursuer: Undue influence might be a good ground of reduction, although the person who impetrated the will did not stand in an official relation to the testator. The necessary elements were (1) that there should be in fact a relation of trust and confidence, and (2) that that trust should have been betrayed (Bell's Prin., sect. 14B.; Gray v. Binny, 1879, 7 R. 332; Harris v. Robertson (cit.); Fearn v. Cowpar, 1898, 1 F. 751; Morley v. Loughnan, [1893], 1 Ch. 736). Both elements were present here. As to the ground of facility and circumvention, it was not necessary that the testator should be generally of facile mind It was enough that he should be peculiarly susceptible to the influence of the person who impetrated the will (Clunie v. Stirling, 1854, 17 D. 15; Munro v. Strain, 1874, 1 R. 1039, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff at p. 1043). Facility in that sense, and also circumvention, were proved. As to the pursuer's interest, there was no plea on record impugning his title or interest to sue.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and assoilzied the defenders.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, we have had a very full and elaborate debate in this case. There are two questions involved. The first question is with regard to the will, and the second question is with regard to the codicil. As regards the will the Lord Ordinary has held that the pursuer has no case for reducing it, and in that opinion I entirely concur. I do not think it is necessary, because it is very much a matter of verdict, to enter into the matter at length. All I say is this, that the pursuer has failed to prove any case entitling him to a verdict upon the facts. That being so, I am for affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as regards that part of the case.

As regards the codicil, I confess I do not quite appreciate what the Lord Ordinary has done, or the reasons he has given for doing it. We have had an argument upon the law as applicable to such a case. I am not of opinion that the cases which are founded upon by the pursuer—the cases of Strain, and other cases of a similar class—have any bearing upon this case whatever. These are cases of persons who having, from an official position towards another person, some capacity for influence over him, misuse that position for the purpose of inducing him to do or abstain from doing something that he has right to do or abstain from doing in the exercise of his rights as regards his own property. The essence of the matter is that the persons in that official position, such as clergyman or doctor or lawyer, are people who have not only a duty but a right to advise and urge those with whom they have to deal, in certain directions; and it is natural and right that a person who is so dealt with should give effect to, or at least be greatly influenced by, the advice of those persons, and what is urged upon him by those persons. Therefore the person who has that influence, and ought to have it in dealing with a person who ought to be influenced by it, must take the greatest possible care that he does not outstep the bounds of his official position, and endeavour to get other things done, under that influence which he has, with which he has no right whatever to interfere. The clergyman and the doctor may have cause to strongly advise a person with whom they have to deal officially, but their advice must not be tainted by any motive not within their own province. As regards the lawyer, in a question of property the position is somewhat different from the position of a clergyman or the position of a doctor, because it may be his duty to advise his client, and even sometimes to urge his client, in a particular direction, when the client desires to make a disposal of his affairs; and if in doing so he urges anything in his own favour, or urges anything in favour of a particular individual, who gets him to do it, then of course he is in a corrupt position, in which anything that is done under his influence cannot receive effect. These cases are clear enough. Most of these cases do not turn either upon the question whether a person has capacity to make his will or not, or upon the question whether he is weak and facile. Of course, if there is anything of the nature of weakness or facility in such cases, the weakness or facility will make it much more easy to hold that a person acted under undue influence. But as regards the relatives of a man, and particularly as regards the people who are living in close relationship, practically of husband and wife, such rules do not apply. Such persons are entitled to use influence to induce the man to do what he may be expected to do himself—namely, to make provision for those whom he has placed in the position of being dependent upon him, and particularly in the case of a person who is placed in the position of being the mother of his child. In such circumstances there may be grounds for setting aside a will made by a person if, being on the face of it an absolutely unjust and wrong will, it can be proved that he had not the mind to make a will, or if it can be proved that his mind had got into a weak and facile condition, so that he was a person who could be easily imposed upon, and the person accused, taking advantage of his weakness and facility, did impose upon him and impetrated from him the deed which is complained of.

Now, that matter again is a question of fact. Two questions of fact are involved. First, was the late Mr M'Kechnie weak and facile, and easily imposed upon? If that question be answered in the affirmative, then we must consider the second question, whether advantage was taken of his condition, and whether he was imposed upon. Now, as regards the first question, giving the best consideration to the evidence which has been put before us and to the argument upon it, I am unable to say, on the jury question, that I can find that he was weak and facile, and easily imposed upon. I find no evidence of that. There is no doubt that after he had a certain illness he was weaker than he was before. His body had suffered, and to a certain extent his sight had suffered. But I think the evidence, read fairly, leads to the conclusion that he was quite as capable of making up his mind about his own affairs as he ever had been in his life. I come without any difficulty to the conclusion that he was not a man who was weak and facile, or easily imposed upon. That being so, it is unnecessary to go any further, because the first answer to that part of the issue applicable to such a case must be in the negative. But I shall assume that influence was used for the purpose of obtaining this deed. I confess I agree with the view that was taken by the solicitor, that what he was doing was going too far in the direction of providing for this woman with whom he was living, and to whom he had been attached for many years, and for the child whom she had borne to him. On the other hand, I think it was a case in which he himself was of opinion, and I assume rightly of opinion, because it is not said that later in life he had ceased to have the opinion which he had held for so long, that to a very great extent his success in life, and the fortune he had accumulated, was due to the energy and the exertion of this defender, with whom he lived. I assume also that when he was spoken to about it by the solicitor, the solicitor did impress upon him the importance of what he was doing in the way of dealing with his property. He seems to have made up his mind distinctly to do what he had expressed his desire to do before his agent urged him in the opposite direction, and he carried that out. I think in doing so he carried out his own will. It is not to be left out of view that he was not a man who rushed into these matters wildly; but that he was giving consideration to them from time to time. That is, I think, conclusively proved by the pencil jotting we have in the large print of the proof. We have ascertained from an unimpeachable witness—namely, Miss Peter—that that was a pencil jotting made to his dictation, in which he shewed a perfect knowledge of his own affairs, and was jotting down his own views as to what he meant to do. Death prevented his doing anything to complete his intentions as indicated in these jottings.

As regards the codicil, I have no doubt that that codicil was granted at a time when he was in an irritated state, perhaps not wisely, for people get very irritated sometimes about small matters. This was in itself a small matter, but most certainly very trying to the parties concerned, namely, that owing to the blunder of Alexander this mistake had been made in exposing Miss White and him at the railway station. He acted upon that, but he was evidently considering the matter later in a calmer state of mind, as is shewn by the pencil jotting, and it was because of the unfortunate circumstance that he died before giving effect to that jotting that matters are in their present state. On the whole matter I find myself unable to say that I am satisfied with the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I think he has drawn inferences which were not justified, and that therefore his interlocutor must be recalled in so far as it reduces the codicil. The only remaining question is the question of expenses, and I think the trustees should be found entitled to their expenses, but only to one set of expenses for both defenders.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree with your Lordship. This case has been very fully and carefully argued. There can be no doubt, I think, that the pursuer of the action, who was the youngest son of the testator, has, as indeed all the family had, good reason to complain of the deeds which he here challenges, because the provision which the testator made as between his legitimate family and his paramour and the child which she bore him was most disproportionate and unfair. But that, I need hardly say, is no reason for reducing a settlement. That can only follow if, in the first place, it is a case of testamentary incapacity, which is not here alleged, or if it can be brought under the category of facility and circumvention, coupled with impetration by some person who takes advantage of that facility. This case is brought alternatively on that latter head, and on the further head, which I rather think is the real ground of action, of undue influence exercised towards the testator by the person who impetrates the will. I admit that that is a third ground of reduction which has in some cases been held sufficient to warrant reduction, though I rather think no instance exists of such an issue being sent to a jury. But I agree with your Lordship that that principle has only been hitherto applied to cases either of transaction, of which Gray v. Binny, 7 R. 332, is an example, or in the much rarer case of wills where a position of trust and confidence is held by the person who impetrates the will towards the testator, and where that position of trust and confidence has been abused. The only illustrations which Mr Mair, in his exhaustive examination of the evidence and authorities, was able to give us, were cases of the well-known categories of such trust and confidence being reposed in law agents or doctors or clergymen, or some person in a position of being trusted by the testator himself—that is to say, trusted that they would not ask him to do anything inconsistent with his duty, or anything wrong in itself. I need hardly say that is not the case here. Mr Mair, with all his ingenuity, was not able to adduce a single instance of undue influence exercised by a paramour towards the man with whom she was living, and for the very good reason, I think, that she is not in the position of owing any duty towards him or, so far as I can see, towards anybody but her own child. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary where he says that Miss White did possess very considerable influence over this testator; but then, I thoroughly agree with the Lord Ordinary when he goes on to say—"However strong an influence one person may possess over another, especially when holding such close personal relationship as Miss White did to Mr M'Kechnie, that will not suffice to reduce a will unless it is proved that that influence was exercised unduly, in order to impetrate the will from the testator; or failing such evidence of connection between the person possessed of such influence and the preparation or execution of the deed complained of, it would require to be shewn that the will was so outrageously against the presumed intentions or clear moral duty of the testator as to make it incredible to suppose that it could have been executed except under the pressure of undue influence on the part of those who are taking the principal interest under it. Now there is not a particle of evidence to shew that Miss White had anything whatever to do with the giving of the instructions for the preparation of the deed under reduction or the execution of it." I quite agree with that passage. There is not a particle of evidence, literally not a particle of direct evidence, to shew that Miss White took any part in the preparation or execution of this will; and the whole evidence of the pursuer consists of inferences, which he asks us to draw from the relationship of the parties towards each other. I find myself wholly unable to draw that inference without a great deal more than there is in this proof. The influence was undoubted, but it fails altogether in the necessary requisite of being undue; that is to say, it was just what might be expected, and what the testator was bound to expect, from the relationship of the parties. It was a very strong interest, no doubt; but interest by itself is not enough in a case of undue influence, because there is no cause where it could be said that confidence has been betrayed. The actual facts being as they are, I agree with your Lordship that there is nothing to justify us in drawing the inferences which we are asked to make. I further think, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that there is no reason for making a distinction between the will and the codicil, and I do so for the reasons which your Lordship has given. I also agree with your Lordship's proposal as regards the expenses of the case.

M'Kechnie v. M'Kechnie's Trustees.

Lord Low.—I have felt this case not to be altogether free from difficulty, and I have listened most anxiously to the able argument which we heard on both sides. I am not surprised that the settlement in this case was challenged, because it is evidently a most unfair disposition of the testator's property, so far as the claims of his legitimate children were concerned; indeed so unfair as to suggest, from its very terms, either that Mr M'Kechnie, whom we know had been a shrewd man of business, and who seems to have been an affectionate parent, was not in a condition in which he was able to make his will when he executed the settlement in question, or that some outside influence had induced him, when suffering from the effects of serious illness, to do that which he would not have done if left to the guidance of his own sense of what was right and just. Therefore there was a pretty good foundation for an action such as we have here. It seems to me, however, that the only possible issue in this case is whether the will was executed when he was in a facile condition, and easily imposed upon by circumvention on the part of Miss White. I say I think that is the issue, because the question that was raised in the record, as originally framed, whether the deed was the deed of the testator or not, has not been pressed.

It was, however, argued that the pursuer did not require to go so far as to shew that the testator was facile and easily imposed upon, and that Miss White impetrated the will from him by fraud or circumvention when he was in that condition, because it was sufficient to shew that she had strong influence over him which she unduly exercised. I am of opinion that this case does not fall within that category of the law at all. I think that the doctrine of what is called undue influence is confined to cases where the relationship between the two persons is such that the natural and legitimate consequence is influence upon the one side and trust and confidence upon the other. It is quite clear that the relationship which exists between a woman and a man with whom she has lived in concubinage is not of that kind; and therefore the issue here is the issue of facility and fraud or circumvention.

No doubt after his illness Mr M'Kechnie was not the man which he had formerly been, but the evidence, read as a whole, shews very clearly that down to the last he was fully capable of taking the management of his own affairs, and of understanding matters of business, even of a complicated nature. I am quite satisfied that there was no facility in this case. If that be so, then, as your Lordship in the chair has pointed out, there is an end of the case, because if there is no facility, one part of the issue on which the case depends has not been established. Upon the whole question, I have in the end come to the conclusion, I confess without much difficulty latterly, that the pursuer has not made out his case.

In regard to the codicil I cannot think that the evidence is really different from the evidence in regard to the settlement itself, because the circumstances as regards the testator's condition are the same, and if there was no facility in the one case, there was no facility in the other. But then, if I had agreed with the Lord Ordinary that there were grounds for setting aside the codicil, which did not apply in the case of the will, I should not have thought that that entitled the pursuer to decree. When the pursuer brought his reduction of the settlement, it was, of course, quite right that he should also bring a reduction of the codicil. The two together constituted the will of the deceased. If the pursuer had been found entitled to reduce the settlement, the codicil also would necessarily have fallen, because the codicil could not stand without the settlement. If, however, it is once established that the will is not reducible, I think it is very clear that the pursuer has no interest to insist upon reduction of the codicil. If he had brought an action for the reduction of the codicil alone, I think it would have fallen to be thrown out, upon the ground that he had no interest, because he had nothing whatever to gain by setting aside the codicil. For this same reason, if the will is not to be reduced I think that the pursuer cannot insist upon reducing the codicil. On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with your Lordships.—30*th October* 1907.

This was an action of damages for personal injury by a seaman against the captain of the steamer "Dundee," on which he was injured, and R. O. & A. B. Mackay, the alleged owners of said steamer at the time. The pursuer averred that said alleged owners had their principal place of business in Hamilton, Ontario, but that they had been made subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Scotland by virtue of arrestment of their goods and effects, and particularly a ship, machinery, and appurtenances, in course of construction in the premises of Archibald M'Millan & Son Ltd., shipbuilders, Dumbarton, on 6th June 1907, conform to letters of arrestment executed on that day. The defenders R. O. & A. B. Mackay averred in answer, inter alia, that at the date in question (in or about November 1906) the said ship was jointly owned by Robert Osborne Mackay, Adam Brown Mackay, and William Southam, all of Hamilton, Ontario. They also averred that the arrestment referred to did not arrest any property of any of those who were the owners of the "Dundee" at the time of the accident to the pursuer, i.e. 8th November 1906.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

The pursuers reclaimed against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary dismissing the action.

The conclusions of the action were for declarator (1) that the pursuers had good and undoubted right and title to a certain policy; and (2) "that the defenders the said Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society are bound, on the sums contained in the said policy becoming due and payable, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or to any person or persons who may have derived right from them, in and to the said certificate or policy, contents and proceeds thereof."

Argued for the Reclaimers: As long as there was a present right in the policy vested in the pursuers, the action was competent. It fell under the class of cases of which examples were to be found in Chaplin's Trs. v. Hoile, 1890, 18 R. 27; Harveys v. Harveys' Trs., 1860, 22 D. 1310, per L.J.C. The benefit of a declarator as a form of action was that a right could be declared although no question had yet arisen in regard to its enforcement (Mansfield v. Stewart, 1846, 5 Bell's Ap. 139, per Lord Brougham at 160; Cairns' Trs. v. Cairns, 1907, S.C. 117). Counsel also referred to the Policies of Assurance Act 1867, sect. 1.

Counsel for the respondents was not called on.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—In this case I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is clearly right. The matter arises in this way. A policy of insurance was taken out with the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society in favour of a certain gentleman called Oscar Philipp. The pursuers, who are bankers in Germany, raised an action in which they called certain persons who have at different times, according to them, been in right of the policy; and they also called the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society. They asked for declarator that the pursuers have good and undoubted right and title to the extent of one-half each—for there are two pursuers—in the policy; and they put in the conclusion that the defenders, the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, are bound, on the sums contained in the said policy becoming due and payable, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or to any person or persons who may have derived right from them. They base that demand upon a statement in which they set forth a large number of transferences to different people, with a certain amount of bankruptcy proceedings as part of the story, and they say they are now the persons in right of the policy.

Now the only contradictors the pursuers can get are either the original persons to whom the policy belonged, or some of the people in the chain of transmissions which is set forth. The insurance company, of course, have no interest in the matter as to whom the policy belongs. Their interest is this, that if the policy matures and becomes a claim, then they will have to pay the proper person. If the pursuers had left out the conclusion which is directed against the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, then, of course, the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society would not, I take it, have entered appearance in the action, because no decree that would have been pronounced could possibly have bound them, there being no reference to them in the only conclusion which would then have remained. Whether the action would have gone on or not would have depended upon whether any of those who are called would have come forward, for if they did not, there would have been decree in absence against them; if they did, it would have been upon such grounds of defence as they set forth. But the insurance company would not have been here. When the pursuers put in their claim against the insurance company, they put in something which in my judgment they were not entitled to ask, because no one can tell whether the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society will ever be bound to make payment to the pursuers. No one knows who will be the claimants when the time comes for the policy to mature, or when it has been turned into a claim by means of a surrender. Therefore to entertain a declarator ab ante against the insurance company seems out of the question. A very good test of the competency is this—Could the insurance company have raised an action of multiplepoinding at this time upon such a question? Clearly they could not.

Counsel for the pursuers here have said that they would be quite content if decree was not given in terms of that conclusion. But that simply turns out their action upon another ground, because then it is perfectly clear that the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society ought not to be here at all, and they are entitled to have the action dismissed as against them.

To these observations I only add that I am perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the Lord Ordinary has expressed his opinion. I have never known, and counsel have been unable to produce to us, any action of declarator where the Court gave a declarator as to a right without there being a proper contradictor present. It seems to me that the whole argument we have listened to this morning was vitiated by an assumption as to who the contradictor in this case is. The insurance company is not the contradictor as in the question of whom the insurance policy belongs to. The contradictor must be found among the ranks of the parties to whom at various times the policy belonged, and depends upon the question of whether these various steps or links of the chain of title are or are not correct. The insurance company have no interest whatever, except simply to pay the policy, when it becomes a proper claim. Therefore, it seems to me that the whole of the cases where declarators have been obtained have really no application to the case before us. I propose to your Lordships that we adhere.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion, and I only add, that my reasons are stated very clearly by the Lord Ordinary in the last paragraph of his opinion, and I agree in all that his Lordship has said.

Lord Dundas.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and with your Lordships. I confess that I think the case a very clear one. There is no proper contradictor here, and no actual lis. As your Lordship has pointed out, it is clear that a multiplepoinding cannot at this time be competently raised, and that, I think, is a conclusive test of the situation.—26*th October* 1907.

171. Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm and Others.

Succession — Testament — Legacy — Construction — Bequest of Horses and Carriages—Circumstances in which Bequest Held to Include Motor Cars.

Special Case.

This was a Special Case presented for the opinion of the Court on a question arising on the construction of the trust disposition and settlement of the late John Denholm, The Mains, Eastwood, Renfrewshire. The parties to the special case were John Denholm's trustees, of the first part; his widow, Mrs Catherine Denholm, of the second part; and his residuary legatees, of the third part.

The facts were set forth in the special case as follows:—

1. The said John Denholm died without issue at The Mains aforesaid on 3rd January 1907, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, dated the 22nd day of October 1890, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 9th January 1907. By his trust-disposition and settlement he assigned and disponed to the first parties, for the purposes therein mentioned, his whole estate, heritable and moveable.

2. The trust purposes were (First) payment of the testator's debts and sickbed and funeral expenses; (Secondly) payment to the said James Ferguson of a legacy of £250 free of legacy-duty; (Thirdly) the trustees were directed to deliver to the testator's brother Thomas Denholm the testator's gold watch, breechloading gun, and all his body clothing, together with all articles of every description belonging to him that might be at Greenhill aforesaid at the time of his decease; (Fourthly) the trustees were directed to make over to the second party, the said Catherine Gillies or Denholm, the testator's whole other furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also his horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements; (Fifthly) the trustees were directed to make over to the second party, the said Catherine Denholm, the testator's lands and estate of Eastwoodmains, burdened with certain debts, which, however, were paid off by the testator in his lifetime; and (Lastly) with regard to the residue of his means and estate, the testator directed his trustees to divide the same into two equal portions, and to pay or convey [it to a number of legatees].

3. Mr Denholm resided at The Mains, a small residential estate near Giffnock, about five miles south of Glasgow on the Kilmarnock road. That estate adjoins and is surrounded on three sides by his estate of Eastwoodmains. He left estate amounting to about £53,000. For many years Mr Denholm kept a brougham and a wagonette and one carriage horse, and occasionally a riding horse; but about four years ago he bought a 10-h.p. Argyle open motor car, and got his coachman trained to drive it. Shortly thereafter he sold his wagonette and horses but retained his brougham, for which he occasionally got a horse on hire. About a year before his death he bought another motor car,—a 16-h.p. Argyle brougham motor-car,—and he then sold his brougham. These motor-cars were in his possession at his death, and they are valued for Government duty purposes at £75 and £450 respectively. Deceased's furniture and plenishing, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements, other than the effects bequeathed to Thomas Denholm, are valued at £474. A question has arisen as to whether the bequest in favour of the second party contained in the above recited fourth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement carries the motor cars to the second party or not, and it has therefore been agreed by all the parties to state this question for the opinion of the Court.

4. The second party contends that, on a just construction of the testator's settlement, the motor cars in question are bequeathed to her. On the other hand, the third parties contend that the said motor cars form part of the residue of the trust estate.

The Questions of Law put to the Court were:—

(1) Is the second party entitled to the said motor cars in virtue of the bequest in her favour contained in the said fourth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement? Or

(2) Do the said motor cars fall to be included in the residue of the testator's estate under the last purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement?

Counsel cited In re Platt, reported in "The Times," 20th April 1907; White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, 7th edit. pp. 808, 812; In re Gibson, 1866, L.R. 2 Eq. 669.

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the parties in this special case are, on the one hand, the trustees and the residuary legatees of the late Mr John Denholm, and on the other the truster's widow; and the question arises on the interpretation of a clause in his trust disposition and settlement. That trust disposition and settlement was dated in 1890, but Mr Denholm did not die until 1907. He thereby made over all his property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and then he proceeded to state the trust purposes.

1st Div.

Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm and Others.

The Lord President.

The first direction to his trustees was to pay a legacy to a certain gentleman, and the second was to deliver to his brother Thomas certain specific articles, which may be described as articles particularly appropriate to a man. Then he proceeded in the fourth purpose to direct his trustees "to make over to my said wife my whole other furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements." He next bequeathed to his wife the lands and estate of Eastwoodmains, and finally gave directions as to his residue.

Now, the point is whether under the bequest in this fourth purpose the wife has, or has not, right to two motor cars which were in the premises of the deceased at the time of his death. At the time of the execution of the will in 1890, the testator was not in possession of any motor cars. That was not much to be wondered at, because, although motor cars had as a matter of fact been invented in 1890, there were very few indeed of them in the United Kingdom at that time. But as time went on motor cars became common, and the deceased Mr Denholm first bought one motor car, and relinquished part of his stable establishment, and afterwards got a second motor car and gave up keeping horses altogether, so that at the time of his death he did not have any means of locomotion except motor cars, one being an open car, and the other a brougham or landaulet. The whole point is whether these motor cars fall within the expression which I have read.

Of course, this is a matter of intention, and the first observation I have to make is that one cannot read the testator's settlement without seeing that he wanted, speaking generally, his wife to have the whole moveable property that was connected with the enjoyment of his house, all except those special articles which would not have been appropriate to a lady, namely, the breechloading gun and body clothing, which he gave to his brother Thomas. That being the testator's intention, the only question which remains is whether the words he used were sufficient to give effect to that intention, and that depends upon whether the word "carriage" can be held to include motor cars. I think one is entitled to construe the word "carriages" in the will of the testator in the light of what the testator himself had done, and I think that the testator when alive showed that he had come to consider these motor cars as his carriages. The word "carriage" itself is certainly wide enough to cover any form of vehicle in which you are carried, though it has secondary significations which vary according to the context. It may be admitted that the ordinary sense of the word "carriage" is a carriage drawn by horses, but to show how its meaning varies, I may take this illustration. I do not suppose that anyone would doubt that a dog-cart would fall under the designation of "carriages," and yet there is as little doubt that if a person who kept a dog-cart and a landau or barouche sent round to his stable and said, "I want the carriage," that would be regarded as equivalent to an order to send the barouche or landau, and not the dog-cart. I accordingly think that the word "carriage" is a term sufficiently elastic to include motor cars, and that when this gentleman allowed his will to remain unaltered, knowing that he had actually replaced his horse carriages by motor carriages, he intended the bequest of his carriages to include his motor cars. I am therefore for answering the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. The first point that was taken by the residuary legatee was that the testator had no motor cars in his possession at the time of making his will, and that what he meant by the word "carriages" must be ascertained by reference to his actual possession at that date. If that were sound, it would, as a logical consequence, prevent the widow from receiving any of the other articles which were left to her in the same sentence, except on condition of shewing that they belonged to the testator at the time of making the will. But the contention appears to me to be entirely without foundation. I do not come to that conclusion upon any rule of law as to the date at which a will should be held to speak, but as mere matter of construction of the plain meaning of the words used in this particular will. We cannot construe a particular clause in a will disjoined from the rest, but we must take in the whole deed in order to see what the testator really means; and the first thing that strikes one in this settlement is that the testator clearly intends to dispose, not of the property which he had at the time, because he might have changed it considerably before his death, but of the whole real and personal property of every kind and description which should belong to him at the time of his death. That is the description, at the outset, of the property he means to dispose of. When he comes to deal with the particular kind of property with which we are concerned now, he begins, in the first place, by leaving certain things to his brother Thomas, and he says that the trustees are to deliver to his brother Thomas "my gold watch, breechloading gun, and all my body clothing, together with all articles of every description belonging to me that are at Greenhill at the time of my decease." I understand that Greenhill was the house where his brother lived. Well, then, he was to have all the articles that are at Greenhill "at the time of my decease." Then he goes on to make the provision in question for his wife. He says that she is to have all the other furniture and plenishing, including certain specified things. Now, it seems to me plain on the collocation of these two sentences that the time he had in view in both was the same time. My brother is to get all the things at the time of my death that are in Greenhill, but as for the other things my wife is to have them. What other things? The other things at the time of my death besides the articles and furniture and so on which are at Greenhill and which go to my brother. Therefore it seems to me that the only question that really requires consideration is whether the words in which he bequeaths to his widow his "carriages" are wide enough to cover the only kind of carriage which he had at the time of his death, that is, motor cars. I have no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordship that, according to the ordinary use of language, a "motor car" is a "carriage," because a "carriage" is, as your Lordship said, simply a vehicle for carrying persons.

It is perfectly true, and I entirely agree with the observation of your Lordship, that in ordinary language people very often do use the term "carriage" to describe a particular kind of vehicle, in order to distinguish it from some other kind, which nevertheless also falls within the general signification of the word "carriage," as, in the instance your Lordship stated, it is perfectly common and natural that a man should describe a barouche or a landau as a carriage in order to distinguish it from a waggonette or a dog-cart. But when he uses the term, not for the purpose of distinguishing between particular articles which may fall within the meaning of the general word, but for describing all the articles which might possibly be described by it, then it must receive its most comprehensive meaning. I have no doubt at all that it ought to receive its comprehensive meaning in this case, both because I think that is the plain meaning of the words used, and also because when you read the will, as it is right we should read the will, with reference to the statement before us as to the things possessed by the testator at the time of his death, we find that the carriage that he himself was using at the time, and the only carriage, was a motor car. That the intention of the testator was to put his widow in the same kind of enjoyment of his house and furniture and means of locomotion as he himself had enjoyed during his life, seems to me to be plain upon a fair construction of the will. I therefore agree with your Lordship's proposal as to the way in which the questions should be answered.

Lord Dundas.—I am of the same opinion. It seems clear that the testator, when he subscribed his settlement in 1890, intended to bequeath to his widow the whole accessories, both indoors and out of doors, requisite to her comfortable enjoyment of the landed estate she was to possess. In the latter category were included "my horses and carriages." Mr Denholm owned at that time a horse or horses, and also a brougham and a wagonette. But when he died in January 1907 he had parted with his horses, his brougham, and his wagonette, and had acquired in their stead two motor cars. It is, to my mind, impossible to suppose that Mr Denholm, though he altered his style of private locomotion in accordance with the march of modern times, intended to alter, and indeed to delete, the bequest to his wife of a comfortable, though not absolutely necessary, item of her enjoyment of the estate which he bequeathed to her. Nor do I think that, looking to the admitted circumstances of his establishment as regards the modes of vehicular conveyance successively employed by him, we shall in the slightest degree strain the language of his settlement if we decide, as your Lordships propose to do, that the motor cars fall within the expression of his bequest of "carriages." It seems to me, therefore, that the first question put to us should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.—29*th October* 1907.

Process—Issue—Form of Issue—Action of Damages for Death of Husband and Father—Negligence Admitted by Defenders—Quantum of Negligence Held to be a Relevant Matter for Jury's Consideration—Issue in Ordinary Form Allowed—Morton (Cooley's Factor) v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 1845, 8 D. 288, and Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Company, 1856, 18 D. 862, Followed.

This was an action of damages by a widow and children for the death of her husband and their father in a railway accident, claiming £5000 for the widow and £4000 for each of the four children. The defenders, the North British Railway Company, admitted liability for the death, but pleaded that the damages claimed were grossly excessive.

The pursuers proposed the following issue :—

"Whether, on or about the 28th day of December 1906, and at or near Elliot Junction, a station on the Dundee and Arbroath Joint Railway, the late Alexander William Black, Writer to the Signet, Member of Parliament, husband of the pursuer Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black and father of the other pursuers, received injuries to his person from which he subsequently died, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

Damages laid—

To Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black at . £5000
To Miss Ellinor Isabella Black at . 4000
To Thomas Wilson Black at . . 4000
To James Alexander Black at . . 4000
To Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black as tutrix and administratrix-in-law of John Sutherland Black at . . 4000"

The defenders argued that the quantum of defenders' admitted negligence was not a relevant consideration for the jury in assessing the damages, and proposed the following form of issue:—

"It being admitted that on or about the 28th December 1906 the late Alexander William Black, Writer to the Signet, Member of Parliament, husband of the pursuer Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black, and father of the other pursuers, received injuries to his person at or near the railway station known as Elliot Junction near Arbroath, from which he subsequently died, through the fault of the defenders.

"What is the amount of the loss, injury, and damage sustained by the pursuers?"

Damages laid [as in pursuers' issue].

The Lord Ordinary adjusted and approved of the issue in the form proposed by the pursuers.

Lord Guthrie.—I approve the form of issue proposed by the pursuers in this case, as against the form of issue proposed by the defenders.

In the case of Morton (Cooley's Factor) v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 13th December 1845, 8 D. 288, Lord Moncreiff stated that, prior to the date of that case, issues in both forms had been allowed by the Court, although it does not appear whether the question between the two forms of issues had ever been debated. But the point was carefully considered in Cooley's case, by a Court composed of the judges of the First and Second Divisions; and by a majority of five (Lord President Boyle, Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, and Lords Fullerton, Jeffrey, and Moncreiff) to three (Lords Mackenzie, Medwyn, and Cockburn), the form of issue proposed by the pursuers in this case was preferred. In considering the case of Cooley, it must be kept in view, first, that the action involved the element of assythment, which the present case does not at least bear to do; and second, that, whereas in this case the defenders merely admit "negligence," the defenders in Cooley's case admitted "culpable" negligence.

After Cooley's case the issue there approved seems to have been followed for ten years, without question, in cases of admitted liability. In 1856 the same point was again brought before the Court in Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Company, 18 D. 862. None of the judges of the First Division before whom Dobie's case came (Lord President M'Neill, and Lords Ivory, Curriehill, and Deas) sat on Cooley's case. They took the case to avizandum, and the Lord President delivered this opinion: "We have looked into the case of Morton to see whether there was any distinction between it and the present case, and whether it disposed of the question on its merits and on principle, and we find that in no feature is it distinguishable from the present case on the point now before us, which was very fully considered there. We cannot disturb that judgment, and therefore we approve of the issue for the pursuer."

Since Dobie's case, the Cooley issue has been followed (see Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, 1889, 16 R., per Lord Shand, p. 389, compared with Lord Adam, p. 390). I am informed that the point was again brought under the notice of the First Division in the recent case of M'Bride v. Loudon & Inglis (although the question was not fully debated), and an issue was approved in the same form. In these circumstances it is obviously my duty, whatever my view on the merits, to approve the pursuers' issue.

But as I heard an argument on the merits, and as the question is one of general importance (see Glegg on "Reparation" (1905), page 118, where a view favourable to the defenders is stated), it is right that I should express my opinion. During the discussion, my impression was with the defenders. I have now arrived at an opposite conclusion, and think that the decision of the majority in Cooley's case was right in principle.

The real question underlying the point now at issue between the parties, is whether the quantum of the defenders' negligence is relevant for the jury to consider in estimating damages. Had the defenders admitted simpliciter the whole averments of the pursuers as to negligence, and had the case gone to trial on the defenders' issue, the same point would have arisen for the judge's decision at the trial, when the pursuers' counsel proposed to read and found upon the defenders' admissions. In this case the defenders make a bald admission of "negligence," and deny all the pursuers' averments relating to negligence, with the result that the case might be one of a merely technical fault. Now, it must be observed that in Cooley's case the minority differed from the majority only on the question of whether the jury should be asked, in the issue, to consider and decide what was really not matter of dispute between the parties. None of the three judges, Lords Mackenzie, Medwyn, and Cockburn, denied the relevancy of the quantum of negligence (culpable negligence admittedly in that case) as an element to be considered by the jury. Lord Medwyn expressly affirmed it: "I am inclined to think that, since the defenders admit their liability, theirs is the proper form of issue. But, as I could not exclude the whole circumstances from being gone into, my opinion practically comes to the same result as if the pursuers' issue were adopted. The wealth of a defender is an element always taken into consideration. I think that the degree and amount of culpability stands in the same situation."

The defenders point out that it is inaccurate to say that the whole circumstances in a case can be relevantly laid before the jury, and they dispute Lord Medwyn's proposition and analogy —"the wealth of a defender is an element always taken into consideration. I think that the degree and amount of culpability stands in the same situation." I agree with them in this. If the defenders' wealth can be considered, then it would form proper matter for averment and enquiry, which, so far as I know, has never been allowed, and, if this view were sound, I suppose a certain great Scotch railway company would have escaped cheaper at the historic period when some of its engines were poinded, than it would do now. I equally doubt the view suggested by Lord Fullerton's question—"Could it be maintained that the solatium should be the same in an action at the instance of a son of a proprietor of £20,000 per annum and that of a person in humble life?" I should have supposed that no distinction could be drawn between the solatium in the two cases, arising from grief for the loss of a father, but that the elements referred to by Lord Fullerton would be relevant, because the patrimonial loss, arising from injured prospects of superior education and advancement in life, would be different in the two cases.

But Lord Medwyn's and Lord Fullerton's conclusions may be sound on the question of the quantum of culpability, although their analogies are false.

The relevancy, in a question of damages from personal injury, of the quantum of negligence, may be justified on either or both of two grounds, first, because gross negligence may aggravate the injury to the feelings of the injured person, or, in the case of death, to the representatives; or, second, because gross negligence may warrant damages which, although payable to the injured person or his representative, are partly penal in character, as being imposed in the public interest, to deter the defenders and others from similar disregard of public safety. The first only of these grounds is founded on in Cooley's case. It is, I imagine, a fact in human nature that grief may be aggravated and loss embittered by the knowledge that the slightest care on the part of those causing the injury would have prevented the accident. On the other hand, if the case is only by a technicality outside the category of inevitable accident, the situation is accepted with greater resignation and the mind sooner recovers calmness.

For the second ground above stated, there is authority in the law of England (see Beven on "Negligence," Vol. I. pp. 49–50). In Scotland, so far as the cases go, the element seems to have been expressly admitted only in cases where the element of malice was involved. These cases are noted in Glegg on "Reparation" (1905), p. 119. I should not suppose the Court would be inclined to extend the principle to cases where there is legal liability, without personal fault.—23rd October 1907.

173. Hillcoat v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company.

Process—Issue—Form of Issue—Action of Damages for Personal Injury—Negligence Admitted by Defenders—Opinion per Lord Johnston that Quantum of Negligence was Not a Relevant Matter for Jury's Consideration, and that Issue in Ordinary Form Should Not be Allowed.

In this action the Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel as to the adjustment of an issue for the trial of the cause, reported the case to the First Division under reference to the subjoined Note.

Lord Johnston. — This action is raised by Mrs Hillcoat against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company to recover compensation for the injury occasioned to her by an accident which occurred to one of their trains in which she was travelling, at Saltcoats Station, on 18th August 1906. The circumstances were that the train in which the pursuer was travelling was standing at Saltcoats Station when another train of the defenders' company ran into it from behind, causing a collision, in which the pursuer was injured. I do not touch upon the allegations of fault which led to, or caused, the collision, because the defenders admit the occurrence of the collision and the pursuer's consequent injury, and accept liability for the accident which caused it. They cannot accept liability without, for the purposes of the action, impliedly admitting fault for which they are responsible.

The nature of the injuries alleged are serious internal injuries, occasioned by the twisting of the pursuer's body in the collision, and shock to her nervous system.

I am called upon to adjust issues for the trial of the case. The pursuer has proposed the ordinary issue in cases of personal injury, viz.:

"Whether, on or about Saturday, 18th August 1906, at or near Saltcoats Railway Station, the pursuer, while a passenger in a train of the defenders, was injured in her person, through the fault of the defenders, to her loss, injury and damage?"

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Hillcoat v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

While, on the authorities as they at present stand, the pursuer is entitled to demand this form of issue, the propriety of granting it has been much canvassed in the profession, and the question has been brought into prominence by the recent serious accident to a North British Railway train at Elliot Junction, in the county of Forfar. There have been several actions arising out of that accident, in one of which I myself, and in another one of my brethren in the Outer House, had determined to report the point to the Inner House. But these and other actions arising out of the same accident have been settled, with the exception of that at the instance of Black and Others v. North British Railway [supra, p. 431], in which Lord Guthrie has, after mature consideration, granted the ordinary issue. That case, however, has been taken to the Inner House, and will afford an opportunity of reconsidering the question should that Court think it proper to do so.

In these circumstances I hesitate to adjust an issue, as I may well adopt one of which the Inner House may be found to disapprove by their judgment in Black's case, and at the same time I think it doubtful whether I have any right to delay adjusting an issue. I therefore report the case to the Inner House, that they may have it before them along with that of Black. I do so the more readily as Black's case is one in which the death of a father occurred, giving rise to an action at the instance of his widow and dependants, while in the present case there was nothing but a personal injury, not resulting in death, and the action is directly at the instance of the injured party. The Court will therefore have the matter before them from both points of view.

I must add that had Black's case not occurred I should have taken the course of reporting this question, because I could not take upon me to disregard a practice founded, as aftermentioned, on an Inner House decision, however much I might think that it ought to be altered. Where a matter of practice is a matter upon which parties in their dealings have come to rely and pecuniary interests are affected, though the practice may be a bad one, every Court would hesitate to disturb it. But where, as here, the practice is not one upon which any person has relied to the affection of patrimonial interest, if the practice is now seen to be wrong, I conceive that the Court will not hesitate to reconsider it, and it is in that view that I should have ventured respectfully to submit it for the reconsideration of the Inner House. I should have done so because I think the practice to be founded on unsound principle and to be liable to be unfair and dangerous in result. The question was first considered in 1845 in the case of Cooley v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 1845, 8 D. 288, where, in a consulted judgment of the two Divisions, it was determined in an action of assythment and damages by the children of a party killed in a railway accident, that though the defenders admitted the death and that it was caused by fault, negligence, or want of skill on the part of their employees and for whom they were responsible, and that there was consequent loss, injury, and damage to the pursuers, the Court found that the pursuers were entitled to put all these matters in issue, just as if there had been no admission.

The matter came again before the Court in the case of Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Company, 1856, 18 D. 862, when the First Division had come to be entirely differently constituted, and the Court found that they could not distinguish Cooley's case from the one before them, and refused to disturb that judgment. There is therefore no indication of whether they approved it in principle or not.

These two cases have regulated the practice in adjusting such issues down to the present day. But although the form of issue has remained the same I have very grave doubts whether the principle upon which the majority of the Inner House in Cooley's case determined it has been allowed, at any rate for a considerable time, to influence the presiding judge in admitting evidence and directing the jury. If I am right in this it is manifest that a false issue has been in use to be presented to juries, the continuance of which ought not to be perpetuated.

For the principle on which the issue was adopted and must now be defended there is no support but the case of Cooley already referred to. If the opinions in that case be examined it will be found that while there was manifest doubt in the minds of some of the judges, those who were clearly in favour of the issue as allowed, based their judgment entirely upon the principle that in arriving at the measure of damages the degree of negligence is a material matter for the consideration of the jury. With very great respect for the learned judges who held this opinion, I conceive that principle to be unsound when applied to cases of personal injury. It would justify the same verdict for the loss of a finger under circumstance of gross negligence, and for the loss of a hand under circumstances of very slight negligence. I think that the error in adopting it arose from allowing the somewhat scholastic distinction between culpa lata and culpa levis to intrude itself into the consideration of a class of cases to which it is inapposite. It is true that there are cases arising out of contract in which the degree of negligence affects the liability, but that is no justification for maintaining that in these or any other class of cases the degree of negligence is to affect, not the liability, but the measure of damages. In the case of injury from negligence where no question of contract is concerned, liability depends upon negligence, and where negligence is established liability follows independently of the degree of negligence, and it is not the negligence but the liability to compensate which determines the damages. In such cases Lord Cranworth's dictum in Wilson v. Brett, 1843, 11 M. and W. 113, that "gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet," holds good, and the dictum of Mr Justice Willes in Lord v. Midland Railway Company, 1867, L.R. 2 C.P. 339, that "any negligence is gross in one who undertakes a duty and fails to perform it" is equally applicable.

I think that the judgment in Cooley's case is also open to this criticism that it is inconsistent with itself. It accepts the position that the jury may not give vindictive damages, and that it is the duty of the presiding judge so to direct. If by vindictive is meant the satisfaction of the legal analogue of the natural vendetta, the statement may be justified in relation to the principle adopted. But if, as I think it must be, the expression means punitive or exemplary, I do not see how it is possible to avoid giving such damages if the jury are entitled, and if entitled, bound to take into consideration the degree of negligence.

When I say above that I think the issue has become a false issue because presiding judges, or many of them, do not subscribe and give effect to the principle which underlies it, I have the support of Lord Shand and Lord Adam in the case of Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, 1889, 16 R. 383, where Lord Shand says at p. 389: "I do not for myself say that I should recommend a jury to make the nature or extent of the Company's fault an element in determining the amount of the damages to be awarded"; and Lord Adam adds, p. 391: "No doubt the question of fault is laid before the jury, but in my experience a jury is never asked to enlarge or diminsh the amount of damages on the ground of the extent of fault on the part of the defender. That has not been, in my experience, the nature of the inquiry in actions of damages for fault or negligence."

If Lord Adam is right the customary issue is a false issue. It is liable to hamper the judge and to mislead the jury.

The issue which I should, but for the practice following on Cooley's case, have approved, is:—

"It being admitted that on or about 18th August 1906, and at or near Saltcoats Railway Station, on the line of the defenders, the pursuer, while travelling in a train belonging to the defenders, was injured in her person, through the fault of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, to her loss, injury and damage.

"What is the amount of compensation to which the pursuer is entitled in respect thereof?

"Damages laid at £1500."

If the pleas in law are examined it is found, as might be expected, that it is compensation for injury which is the subject of the action, and that what the parties have joined issue about is whether the compensation sued for is reasonable or excessive. That the degree of the defenders' negligence or fault has any legitimate bearing on that question, I am unable to see. But I can see that it may be used to have a very unfair and disastrous effect upon the verdict.

These pleas are consistent with the right and the liability that arise out of the circumstances, and I am not apprehensive that the form of issue which I would adopt would exclude any relevant matter from proof. There are (1) circumstances relating to the position of the individual party injured, as, for instance, occupation and prospects in life; (2) circumstances surrounding the accident to the individual injured. Where shock and pain suffered must always be factors in the consideration it is essential to know the circumstances surrounding the occasion of the injury to him or her; (3) circumstances surrounding the cause of the occurrence which occasions the injury. To establish liability proof on the last heads is relevant and necessary. But where liability is admitted, proof on the first two is all that is required. And it would be admissible though fault is not formally put in issue. Whereas if it is formally put in issue, I do not see how the presiding judge can either exclude or restrict proof on the last head.—29*th October* 1907.

from the conclusions of the summons. The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the previous report and the opinion of the Lord President.

Argued for Pursuer: There was no evidence of inducing; and error was only a ground of reduction if it was induced by the representations or misrepresentations of the other party to the contract (Bell's Pr., sect. 11; Stewart v. Kennedy, 1890, 17 R. H.L. 25). The deed signed was the same deed as in draft, with an alteration. The defender's carelessness was not equivalent to being induced by the pursuer. The case fell under Young v. Clydesdale Bank Ltd., 1889, 17 R. 231.

Argued for Defender: The Lord Ordinary was right. The alteration made on the draft was of so material a character that it ceased to be the same deed as it was in draft.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and gave decree for damages, which were assessed at £250.

The Lord President.—This is an action at the instance of an advertising contractor called Selkirk against Alexander Ferguson. Ferguson had come into possession of certain patents in regard to an advertising apparatus, to which was given the soubriquet of "animated posters." Ferguson conceived that the invention was one out of which money could be made, but he was not in a position to work it. He had not a connection which would enable him to secure advertisements, and he was not in a position to get up a company with the necessary capital to provide the machines and the expenses. He knew a man Slight, who was an agent of Selkirk, and through Slight he entered into negotiations with a view to seeing whether Selkirk would take up the matter. Selkirk professed himself willing to do so, so far as the advertising part was concerned, but he was not in a position to provide the money or to raise a company for the manufacture of the machines Ferguson then proceeded to approach Cohen with a view to getting up a company, but in order to shew Cohen that there would be advertisements for them, he thought it better to enter into an agreement with Selkirk dealing with the provision of advertisements. Accordingly, Selkirk and Ferguson entered into the agreement which is the basis of this claim.

Under this agreement Ferguson bound himself to pay the costs of providing the machines, and to pay a salary to Selkirk; on the other hand, Selkirk bound himself to manage the business and to use his best endeavours to procure sites for the machines and provide advertisements at a minimum price. This agreement was duly signed. I need not go further into the negotiations between Cohen and Ferguson than to say that they were eventually broken off, Cohen electing not to go on and forfeiting a sum of £100. As a matter of fact, no company has been formed, but Selkirk, alleging himself to have been all along ready and willing to do his part, sues Ferguson on the contract for damages in respect of his breach. Ferguson admits that he is not willing to go on with the contract, but he puts in a defence which is an avoidance of the contract on grounds which would infer its reduction. This is to the effect that there was a material alteration in the contract as signed from what was in the draft; that he signed it under error; that it was essential error; and I think that he is bound to say that the error was induced by the representations of the other party to the contract. He puts his ground of defence quite clearly in his fourth plea in law, where he says:—"The defender should be assoilzied, with expenses, in respect that (1) the said agreement was entered into by defender under essential error induced by pursuer; (2) said essential error was induced by fraudulent misrepresentations and concealment on the part of the pursuer; and (3) said agreement is not binding on defender, but is null and void."

As regards the law on this point I do not think there can be any doubt. The law of this class of cases was most distinctly laid down by the House of Lords in Stewart v. Kennedy, 17 R. H.L. 25, and if I may take a single sentence from Lord Watson's opinion, I should quote this passage (p. 29): "Without venturing to affirm that there can be no exceptions to the rule, I think it may be safely said that, in the case of onerous contracts reduced to writing, the erroneous belief of one of the contracting parties in regard to the nature of the obligations which he has undertaken will not be sufficient to give him the right, unless such belief has been induced by the representations, fraudulent or not, of the other party to the contract."

That, I think, disposes of the third branch of the plea in defence here, but leaves untouched the first two branches I have read. I have laid greater stress on this because I have found difficulty in the ground of judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The alteration which the defender here says was a material alteration, as to which he was in essential error, provided for Ferguson's continued liability although his interests were assigned to a company with a capital of £10,000 fully paid up. The parties had had a long meeting at which the draft was gone over, and each took away a copy to consider it. As the draft stood, Ferguson, on assigning to such a company, was to be no longer bound. Selkirk had his draft revised by his solicitor, who made the alteration. He made it in order to provide for the possible event of the company to which the interests were assigned being a bogus company. The parties had a meeting to adjust the agreement, which was of a somewhat hurried character. And there was a final meeting at which it was signed. In the view I take I do not think the discrepancies about what took place at the meeting are of any moment. The Lord Ordinary has disposed of the case, not upon the ground that any false representations were made by the other party to the contract, but on the ground that the defender signed one deed thinking he was signing another. I think his Lordship there is applying a doctrine of law in a way in which it has never been applied before. The understanding which I think has always obtained as to what is error in essentialibus in this branch of law is that it applies where a man has signed a document of some sort thinking it is another sort of document. Mr Bell in his Principles (sect. 11) gives in so many words an illustration —"as, for example, if one sign a conveyance believing it to be a bond or security or a testamentary deed"; and there is a very well-known leading case in England where a person signed a deed, being told it was a release of rents, whereas it was a release of all claims. There there was a mistake as to the document, not so here. If the matter can be treated as the Lord Ordinary has done, in every case where there has been an alteration of any materiality, it could be said that it is not the document. It is the same document with an alteration upon it. I think the Lord Ordinary has imported into his judgment something which has to do with a different class of cases from this.

I should like to say also that I cannot agree with what the Lord Ordinary says, that there cannot be two opinions as to the materiality of the alteration. I think there is room for a difference on the matter, and that it was perfectly possible for one to form an opinion that it was not material. On paper it was a decided alteration. But practically it probably was not. It was not a term of the contract which would necessarily come into operation, for the company might never be formed. And if it was formed, the security of the company with £10,000 paid up was practically ample to protect Ferguson for a liability for a salary of £10 a week for three years.

I do not think the Lord Ordinary's judgment can stand. But that leaves the case, which is quite well set forth in the defences, that the error in which the defender was as to the actual difference in the documents was induced by the misrepresentations of the other party to the contract. The pursuer cannot object to his own account of what passed being taken, and that account seems to me to negative any idea that there was any representation by the other party which led the pursuer to sign. By that account he referred the question to Slark, and he was content to abide by Slark's opinion. He knew that there were alterations. He chose to be guided by Slark's view that these were not material—a view which, as I have already pointed out, might, I think, be quite an honest one. And then, though having the opportunity of reading for himself, he did not do so. In such circumstances I think there are no grounds for reduction.

Selkirk v. Ferguson.

Lord Kinnear.—I entirely concur, and I have the less hesitation in concurring because I think that on the question of fact the Lord Ordinary has not arrived at any different conclusion from that which we have formed, and that if he had held that the true issue was whether the defender had been induced to enter into the contract which he signed by the representations of the pursuer, he would have given the same verdict as your Lordship has proposed. The view which he takes of the defender's conduct is even more unfavourable than that which your Lordship has expressed, for, after examining the whole proceedings at the meeting, he says, "It is impossible to account for or excuse the folly and neglect of Ferguson." In a later passage he refers to his "inexcusable conduct at the signing of the agreement," and on that account refuses to award him expenses in spite of his success in the action. The Lord Ordinary cannot have meant to decide that the defender's signature was obtained by the pursuer's representations, since he finds that his conduct in signing was inexcusable, and due entirely to his own folly.

Lord Kinnear.

The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, therefore, comes to rest upon the opinion in law which he expresses when he says: "However one must condemn Ferguson's conduct at this stage, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that he signed a document in terms materially differing from those of the document which he believed he was signing. It is no question of the misunderstanding of the import and effect of the document, it was error as to the document itself; and I cannot therefore hold Ferguson to be bound by his signature." I understand this to mean that the contract actually signed by Ferguson was not his deed, because he believed he was signing an instrument of a different character. Now there is authority to the effect that when a man signs one document thinking it to be another and different document, he is not bound by his signature. The early English case to which the Lord President referred—Thoroughgood's case (1552, 2 Co. Rep. 9 b.)—is an excellent illustration. There may be an element of fraud in such cases, but in the more recent decision of Foster v. Mackinnon (1869, L.R. 4 C.P. 704) the law is expounded in a sense which seems to coincide with the Lord Ordinary's view, for it is said that an instrument executed in the belief that it is one thing while in fact it is another is invalid, not only on the ground of fraud but on the ground that the mind of the signer does not accompany the signature; or, in other words, that he never intended to sign, and in contemplation of law never did sign, the contract to which his name is appended. But this is quite a different case.

1st Div.
Selkirk v. Ferguson.
Lord Kinnear.

The defender knew the contract that he was signing. He knew that alterations had been made on the draft, and that the document which he was asked to sign was the deed so altered He did not know what the alterations were, but he asked if they were material, and on being told by Mr Slark that they were not, he thereupon signed the deed. In these circumstances to say that he signed a totally different deed from the one which he thought he was signing, appears to me to be out of the question. The deed he signed was exactly the deed which he thought he was signing—to wit, a contract in the terms of the draft he had seen but with alterations the nature and importance of which he did not know, but which he was content to accept in reliance on the opinion of Mr Slark. The true issue is whether the error under which he signed was induced by the other party to the contract, and on that issue the judgment of the Court must be for the pursuer.

Lord Dundas concurred.—24th October 1907.

II. Process — Summary Procedure — Complaint—Instance — Private Prosecutor—Partridges Act 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34)—Instance Held Bad.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by way of stated case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Watson) in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries and Galloway at Stranraer, in a cause at the instance of Andrew Kenneth M'Douall of Logan, appellant, with concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, against Archibald Irvine, labourer, Drumore, respondent.

The case as stated by the Sheriff-Substitute was as follows:—

This is a cause brought in this Court on the 27th day of June 1907 under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, at the instance of the appellant, with concurrence of John Marquis Rankin, solicitor, Stranraer, procurator-fiscal of court at Stranraer, for the public interest, against the respondent, the complaint in which sets forth that the respondent did on 22nd May 1907, on the public road leading from Stranraer to Drummore, and at a part thereof in the parish of Kirkmaiden, distant about 90 yards in a northerly direction from the dwelling-house in Shore Street, Drummore, occupied by Helen Stevenson, spinster, and on the seashore ex adverso of said part of said road, kill and take a partridge in close time, that is to say between 1st February and 1st September, both in the year 1907, contrary to the Partridges Act 1799, sect. 3, whereby the respondent is liable to a penalty not exceeding £5.

When the complaint had been read the agent for the respondent stated the following objections, viz.—

1. No jurisdiction.
2. No title or interest on the part of the complainer, Andrew Kenneth M'Douall, to sue.
3. The complaint is incompetent, irrelevant, and wanting in specification.

The Sheriff-Substitute sustained the second objection stated for the respondent, and dismissed the complaint.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—Has the appellant, with concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, sufficient title to prosecute the present complaint?

Sect. 3 of the Partridges Act 1799 provides for a close time for partridges between 1st February and 1st September, and for a penalty for infringing the close time to be imposed "in the same manner, and under such and the same rules, regulations and restrictions" as in 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

Sect. 4 of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 provides as follows:—"If any person or persons transgress this Act in any of the aforesaid cases, and shall be lawfully convicted thereof . . . . every such person shall, for every partridge . . . . taken . . . . in his possession, . . . pay the sum of five pounds to the person or persons who shall inform or sue for the same: and it shall and may be lawful to and for any person or persons to sue and prosecute for, and recover, the said penalty of five pounds, . . . in any of his Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster."

The Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 does not apply to Scotland.

Sect. 1 of 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32 repeals 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

The following authority was cited at the hearing:—Duke of Bedford v. Kerr, 1893, 20 R. J.C. 65.

The Court answered the question of law in the negative.

Lord M'Laren.—In this case my opinion may be stated in a few words. The complaint charges the defender with taking partridges in close time contrary to the Partridges Act 1799, sect. 3, and claims for a penalty not exceeding £5. Now, on referring to this statute we find that it prohibits the taking of partridges within a close time there defined, and prescribes that the penalty may be recovered under the powers of an earlier statute, 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

The Partridges Act 1799 applies to Scotland, but the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 makes no provision for the recovery of penalties in the Courts of Scotland, but only provides for the recovery of penalties in the King's Courts at Westminster. The reference to 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 is therefore ineffective, so far as Scotland is concerned; at all events while the penalty is sued for by a private prosecutor; and in my opinion the Sheriff-Substitute has rightly dismissed the complaint.

The ground of judgment is want of title to sue, and in the stated case this is the only point brought under review. If the Sheriff-Substitute had found that he had no jurisdiction, I should have been disposed to affirm the judgment. But I think the preferable ground of decision is want of title; because it may be that without any special statutory title the Lord Advocate or the procurator-fiscal has a title to prosecute wherever an illegal act is penalised and no provision is made for recovery of the penalty. By sustaining the plea of want of title on the part of a private prosecutor we keep this question open. I of course give no opinion as to whether taking partridges in close time may be the subject of a prosecution or complaint under any statute other than the Partridges Act 1799.

Lord Pearson.—I agree that this prosecution must fail, and I desire to explain very briefly the grounds of my opinion. The complainer is in the position of a common informer who has obtained the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal. The complaint is laid upon what is now styled the Partridges Act 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34). That Act had for its main purpose to introduce a uniform close time for partridges in Great Britain, namely, from 1st February to 1st September. Unfortunately, in the matter of imposing and recovering the penalty, the Act referred to a statute of 1761 (2 Geo. III. cap. 19), which was a purely English statute providing for the recovery of the penalty "in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster," by any person who might inform or sue for the same. That procedure, or whatever its modern equivalent may be, would obviously be futile at the instance of a common informer complaining of a contravention of the Act within Scotland; and I have not heard any suggestion as to the source from which a private informer in Scotland can derive a title to prosecute in any Scotch Court without express statutory authority. It is otherwise with the public prosecutor, who, as a general rule, can prosecute before the Sheriff Court for penalties which a statute has imposed without expressly enacting how the penalty is to be recovered.

I would not, however, be held as expressing any opinion as to whether a prosecution in the present case under the Act 1799 would have been competent in the Sheriff Court at the instance of the procurator-fiscal himself. It may be that the express reference back to the Act of 1761 in the matter of imposing and recovering the fine excludes any implied authority to the procurator-fiscal to take proceedings under the Act of 1799 in a Scottish Court. In determining that question, which is not now before us, it would be pertinent to consider whether there is any other remedy open, and, in particular, whether the Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. cap. 54) does not apply, notwithstanding its partial repeal in 1796 by an Act which was itself repealed without any saving clause in 1799 (36 Geo. III. cap. 54; 39 Geo. III. cap. 34).

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with both your Lordships. The complaint which initiated the proceedings appealed against in the present case is founded solely upon the Partridges Act 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34), sect. 3. Inter alia, the objection was taken that the complainer had no title or interest to sue, and this objection has been sustained by the Sheriff-Substitute, and he dismissed the complaint.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute's decision is right.

The leading Scotch Act relating to close time for game is 13 Geo. III. cap. 54, and under this statute the close time for partridges was fixed to be from 1st February till 1st September. Under that Act (sect. 8) it was provided that all offences under it might be tried before two or more Justices of the Peace or the Sheriff or Sheriff-Substitute of the county, and that the prosecutions might proceed either at the instance of the fiscal of the Court at which the prosecution might be brought, or by any other person who should inform or complain.

With respect to partridges, the period of close time formerly regulated by the above statute was altered by 36 Geo. III. cap. 54, which made it unlawful to kill partridges between the 1st day of February and the 14th day of September in any year, and it provided that any person doing so in Scotland should incur the same penalties and forfeitures as by the Act of 13 Geo. III. cap. 54, and under the same rules.

Matters remained in this situation until the year 1799, when the Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 54 was repealed by the Act 39 Geo. III. cap. 34. The commencement of the season for killing partridges was then altered from the 14th to the 1st day of September, and this was declared to apply to the whole of the kingdom of Great Britain, and then the third section of the Partridges Act 1799 proceeds to say that any person transgressing the Act should be liable to the same penalty and to be recovered in the same way as is provided by the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

Extra Division.

M'Douall v. Irvine.

Lord Ardwall.

Referring now to the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, it does not appear that the penalty there prescribed is recoverable in any of the Courts in Scotland, but only in any of the Courts of Record at Westminster. This view derives support from the observations of Mr Hutchison in his work upon Justices of the Peace, Vol. II. p. 550, note c; and a case was tried in the Sheriff Court of Dumfriesshire, referred to in a treatise on the Game Laws, by John William Ness, 1813, p. 123, in which it was held that the statutory penalty of £5 could not be recovered in the Sheriff Court. It will be noticed that by the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 it is declared that "nothing therein contained shall be construed to extend to that part of Great Britain called Scotland." I think it follows from these provisions of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 that the provision to the effect that an informer may prosecute for a penalty under the Act cannot be held to apply to Scotland, because such informer is only authorised to prosecute for a penalty in the Courts at Westminster. Now without statutory authority a private informer is not in Scotland entitled to prosecute for penalties or fines; and if this is so, the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal cannot supply the defect in the instance of a complaint brought by a private informer (Duke of Bedford, 20 R. (Just.) 65).

In the present case the complainer prosecutes merely in the character of an informer, because it is not maintained that he had any other interest in the matter, the offence having been committed not on land belonging to the complainer but on the seashore.

I am accordingly of opinion that under the Act of 1799, which is the only Act we have to deal with in this case, the complainer had no title to prosecute the complaint in question, that the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal did not supply the defect in the instance, and that accordingly we should answer the question put in the stated case in the negative.—2nd November 1907.

Education—School—Voluntary School "State-aided"—Schools Sharing in Technical and Secondary Education Grants But Not in Ordinary Parliamentary Grant Under Education (Scotland) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. cap. 62), sect. 67, Are Not "State-aided" Within Meaning of Education (Scotland) Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 62), sects. 2 and 3—Education (Scotland) Act 1872 (cit. supra), sects. 1, 5, 12, and 67 — Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. cap. 59), sects. 13, 19, 45 — Local Government (Scotland) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 50) sects. 19, 22, 85—Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act 1820 (53 & 54 Vict. cap. 60), sect. 2—Education and Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. cap. 51), sects. 1, 2 (1)—Technical Instruction Amendment (Scotland) Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. cap. 63), sect. 1 (e)—Minutes of the Education Department Regulating Grant for Secondary Schools—Scottish Education Code for 1907.

In this suspension and interdict the governors of George Watson's Hospital sought to have the Parish Council of Edinburgh interdicted from assessing for poor and school rates their schools known as George Watson's College for Boys and George Watson's Ladies' College, upon the ground that they were voluntary schools within the meaning of the Education (Scotland) Act 1897, sects. 2 and 3, and therefore exempt from local taxation. The said schools are endowed schools in Edinburgh carried on under a scheme under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act 1882, approved by Her Majesty in Council on 17th November 1888. The said schools participate in grants for secondary education given under sect. 2 of the Education and Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act 1892, and sect. 2 of the Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act 1898, and also in an annual grant voted by Parliament for science and art. The Education (Scotland) Act 1897 relieves from assessment for local rates "voluntary" schools, and defines a voluntary school as a "state-aided day school not provided by a School Board."

The complainers maintained that their schools fall under this description. The respondents pleaded that throughout the Acts dealing with education in Scotland the term "state-aided" school meant a school sharing in the Parliamentary grant conferred by sect. 67 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1872, and that as the complainers' schools were not entitled to share in that grant, they were not "state-aided" within the meaning of the Education (Scotland) Act 1897.

The facts of the case, the contentions of parties, and the statutes cited, are sufficiently set forth in the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note, and held that the complainers' schools were not voluntary schools within the meaning of the Scottish Education Acts.

Lord Johnston.—The question raised under this suspension is whether the Governors of George Watson's Hospital are entitled under sect. 3 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1897 to relief from poor and school rates assessed on the subjects occupied by them as George Watson's College for Boys and George Watson's Ladies' College in Edinburgh. Though the question is raised with the Parish Council and therefore is confined to poor and school rates, the judgment will cover any other assessment or rate levied on the complainers.

In order to obtain the relief or exemption claimed the complainers must bring their schools under the definition of "voluntary schools" in the statute in question. For the provision of sect. 3 of the said Act of 1897 is this—no assessment under any general or local Act of Parliament for any county, burgh, parish or any other local purpose whatsoever, shall be assessed or levied on "any land or buildings used exclusively or mainly for the purposes of the schoolrooms, offices, or playground of a voluntary school." Now the statute has already in the preceding section stated that "the expression 'voluntary schools' means a state-aided day school not provided by a School Board." But nowhere in the statute, or indeed in any previous statute dealing with education in Scotland, has the expression "state-aided" as applied to a school been defined.

The present question resolves itself into this. Is the term "state-aided" to receive a natural or popular meaning and a liberal construction, or has it become in reference to legislation on educational matters a vox signata, with a stereotyped meaning, which does not require definition, that meaning being recipient of a Parliamentary grant as defined in the Education Act 1872.

For the determination of this question it is necessary to consider the history of legislation on the subject of education in Scotland from 1872 onwards. But before doing so it is proper to consider the Education Act of 1897 as a whole, and not merely sect. 3 above referred to.

Its object was twofold; first, to amend the provisions in the latter part of sect. 67 of the Education Act 1872, which were intended to assist a class of poor parishes. With this part of the Act I need not concern myself.

But, second, it aimed at the "aiding voluntary schools" by the payment out of monies provided by Parliament of "an aid grant equal to 3s. per child for the whole number of children in average attendance in those schools," to be distributed in accordance with conditions to be laid down by the Scottish Education Department. Now the term "voluntary schools," though well known in England, had not previously been used in Scotland, and it was therefore necessary to define it, and it was, at the end of sect. 3 (with which I am now dealing), defined as meaning "a state-aided day school not provided by a School Board." If, then, the complainers' schools are voluntary schools, they are entitled not merely to exemption from local rates under sect. 3 of the Act of 1897, but are entitled to the aid grant of 3s. per child in average attendance, provided the conditions laid down by the Department are fulfilled.

I think it is of some importance in determining what is meant by "state-aided" to note that the same class of schools as are to be exempted from local rates, are also at least contingently entitled to participate in the 3s. aid grant under the statute. For if it be made clear that a school of the class of those conducted by the complainers was not intended to participate in the 3s. aid grant it follows that it was not intended to be exempt from local rates. Now the complainers are governors of important secondary schools of the highest class, with large foundation endowments, and it is certainly not to be readily accepted that they were intended to participate in this trifling supplementary grant in aid of 3s. per scholar.

To turn, then, to the legislative history of the educational question in Scotland from 1872 onwards, it will be found that from the passing of the Act of 1872 to the present day state aid in the narrower sense was given once for all in 1872, and in the wider sense has been given from time to time since 1872 to the schools of Scotland in increasing amount but in very varied ways.

To begin with, the Act of 1872 provided for a Parliamentary grant, and so defines it (sect. 1) that the term "Parliamentary grant" has thenceforward a definite meaning. It is defined as a grant made in aid of a school out of monies provided by Parliament for the Civil Service, entitled "For Public Education in Great Britain." The term Parliamentary grant does not apply to the monies provided by Parliament, but to the grants made out of such monies by the Scottish Education Department (sect. 67) under the conditions contained in their Minutes in force for the time. And these grants may be made (1) to any school board in respect of the public schools under their management, that is, in popular language, to school board schools in parish or burgh; and (2) to the managers of any school which is, in the opinion of the Scottish Education Department, efficiently contributing to the secular education of the parish or burgh in which it is situated, that is, briefly, to a non-school board school, or what in England would be called a voluntary school.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Governors of George Watson's Hospital v. Parish Council of Edinburgh.

Unquestionably the reception of a Parliamentary grant would be the reception of state aid, and schools of the second category complying with the conditions of the department and so receiving Parliamentary grants would be "state-aided" and therefore "voluntary" in the sense of the definition of the Act of 1897. And there is nothing at first sight to confine such voluntary schools to schools of the elementary class or to exclude secondary schools from participating in the Parliamentary grants, if they comply with the Department's conditions.

At the time the Act of 1872 was passed, the term secondary in reference to education had not come into use, but the Act recognised (sects. 62–64) a distinction between higher class public schools and others of a more elementary character, though the term elementary is not found in the statute. The statute vested in the school boards of parish and burgh (sects. 23 and 24; see also sect. 38) not merely elementary schools, but all schools which were properly described as parish or burgh schools, as distinguished from schools having exceptional foundations and governing bodies, such as, for instance, the schools of the several Edinburgh hospitals. The Act itself scheduled (Schedule C) a certain number of schools as higher class public schools, and by sects. 62 and 63 committed it to the school boards, subject to the approval of the Department, to resolve that any other schools under their management should be deemed to be higher class public schools. But a higher class public school under these sections is not to be a burden on the school fund and therefore to share in the school rate, but is to be, so to speak, self-supporting. And though ex facie of sect. 67 such school might share the Parliamentary grant, I think that it would have been inconsistent with the terms of sects. 62–64 that it should have done so. If so, I cannot assume that the Legislature intended the endowed secondary school not under the school board to do so either. But whatever might have been contended under the Act of 1872 this matter was cleared up by the application to Scotland of the 20th section of the English Elementary Education Act 1876, which provided that in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant the income of the school shall be applied only for the purpose of public elementary education. Accordingly from 1876 onwards it was made quite clear that none but elementary schools, and therefore neither higher class public schools nor secondary schools not under the management of a school board, were to receive a Parliamentary grant.

Before passing from the Act of 1872 it is to be noted that in sect. 12 there is the first statutory use of the term "state-aided." In excluding teachers from eligibility as members of school boards, the teacher of a state-aided school is mentioned as in contradistinction to the teacher of a public school thus—"No teacher of a public school or state-aided school," etc. A "public school" is defined in sect. 1 as being a school board school, and, though a public school may be also a "state-aided" school, the use of the alternative "or state-aided school" must have been intended to bring in schools not under a school board but yet receiving a Parliamentary grant, for that was the only form in which state aid was under that Act and for some time afterwards given.

If, then, "state-aided" meant in the section above referred to, recipient of a Parliamentary grant, does it in subsequent legislation continue to have the same restricted meaning?

I find nothing to note in the Education Act 1878, except that with regard to the examination of higher class schools sect. 19 (though using the word "public," I think per incuriam) recognises that there may be schools not under school boards giving higher class and not merely elementary education, just as by sect. 20 it recognises that there may be school board schools doing the same.

The next Act to be considered is the Technical Schools Act 1887. This Act empowers school boards to provide technical schools, and, subject to applying the school fees to teachers' salaries, to charge any deficiency upon the school fund. But the statute contemplates that such school may claim a grant from the Department of Science and Art. Now I understand that from 1836 onwards Parliament has provided a grant administered, so far as Scotland was concerned, for a long time by the Department of Science and Art, and now by the Scottish Education Department, towards the support of schools and continuation classes of a technical character. In a sense, therefore, participation in this grant would be the receipt of state aid, and I understand that though this statute provides only for the establishment of public or school board technical schools, other higher class schools not under school boards have been in use to participate in this grant prior to 1887. I do not, however, think that this fact can be regarded as making them state-aided in the sense in which that term was used once at least in the 1872 Act, and is frequently used in the Acts to be now mentioned, and in the Act to be interpreted.

I come therefore to the history of the abolition of school fees in which is involved the grant towards secondary education in which the complainers' schools participate, and in respect of which participation they claim to come under the category of "voluntary schools" as defined in the Act of 1897.

Although prior to its passing, the Exchequer had been in use to make sundry contributions in relief of local taxation, the English Local Government Act 1888, for the first time, I think, created what is now known as "The Local Taxation Account," to the credit of which were to be carried, first, the proceeds of certain licences; and, second, a share of the Probate Duties, and so far as England is concerned, provides for their distribution.

In the same year was passed the Probate Duties (Scotland and Ireland) Act 1888, which, inter alia, assigned to Scotland its proportionate share of the Probate Duty grant to be carried to "The Local Taxation (Scotland) Account," and made an interim provision for its application. Then the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1889, a share of the Probate Duty grant having been already directed to be carried (by the Act of 1888 last referred to) to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, provided, firstly, for the application of the share of the Probate Duty grant for the current year 1889–90. After allocating a sum of £50,000 to the relief of local taxation in the Highlands, and another sum towards the maintenance of highways, it declares (sect. 19 (3)) the balance shall be applied towards payment in relief of school fees "in the state-aided schools in Scotland," and distributed in such manner and in accordance with such conditions as may be set forth in a Minute by the Scottish Education Department. Then it provides for carrying to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account the proceeds of certain scheduled licences from and after the close of the current financial year; and, secondly, for the application of the whole monies so in the future carried to the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, that is, the share of the Probate Duty grant and the proceeds of the Local Taxation Licences grant, in a more permanent way, and here again it appropriates the balance towards the relief and payment of school fees in "the state-aided schools of Scotland." There is also a noticeable use of the same term in sect. 85 of the said Act of 1899. Now at that date the term "state-aided school," which Parliament uses as having a recognised or recognisable meaning, would only, I think, apply to schools which were recipients of the Parliamentary grant. For I cannot think that the Legislature had in contemplation schools participating in the comparatively unimportant grant for technical education, which was at that time administered outside the purview of the Education Acts, and by an authority other than the Education Department.

Next comes the Local Taxation and Excise Act 1890. This Act provided anew for the distribution of the sums carried to "Local Taxation Account" from the Probate Duty grant and the Customs and Excise Duties grant. In dealing with the Scotch share of these grants (sect. 2 (2)), a sum not exceeding £40,000 is to be applied in relief from the payment of school fees in "the state-aided schools" in Scotland of children in the compulsory standards of the Scotch code. Here again, therefore, "state-aided" school is used as though it had a definite if not a statutory meaning.

The limitation to children in the compulsory standards does, I admit, create some difficulty, as indicating that the "state-aided" school may be more than elementary, and if so, why not secondary? But I do not think that the contention can be pushed that length, as it is notorious that all the best Parliamentary grant schools aim at going beyond the compulsory standards though not claiming to be higher class or secondary schools. Again, by the Education and Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act 1892 a further rearrangement was made, and the term "fee grant in Scotland" is adopted. Instead of the balance of monies carried to the credit of the Local Taxation account, there is to be paid out of monies provided by Parliament an annual grant towards relief from the payment of school fees in "state-aided" schools in Scotland of £265,000, or of such other amount as Parliament may determine, and here are the important words: "Having regard to the amount of the fee grant under the Elementary Education (England) Act 1891." If anything were wanted to indicate that "state-aided schools in Scotland" meant only elementary schools receiving a Parliamentary grant, it would be found here in reference to the English Elementary Education Act of 1891. This change liberated money formerly applied in relief of school fees, and accordingly for the first time Parliament applied £60,000 of the sum so liberated in aid of the cost of secondary education in Scotland. The distribution of this sum of £60,000 was to be made by the Department, and they were not restricted in their grants to higher class public schools, but might include either schools "under the same management as a state-aided school," or a school of the class which I may shortly define as endowed schools. It is clear that "a state-aided school" must in this provision mean a non-school-board elementary school receiving a Parliamentary grant, as distinguished from the class of schools supplying secondary education and intended to share in the secondary education grant in aid. I do not need to refer to the Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act 1898, which can have no bearing on the interpretation of that of the previous year.

I return now to the Education Act 1897, where the term "voluntary school" is defined as being a state-aided day school not provided by a school board. There can, I think, be no doubt that when Parliament used the term state-aided, it used a term which it considered to have a definite meaning and one which did not need interpretation. Having regard to the history of educational legislation from 1872 onwards, the term had come in Parliamentary usage to have a definite and stereotyped meaning. That is the only meaning which it can reasonably receive in the clause providing the 3s. aid grant, in which the definition of voluntary school occurs; and if so, I can give it no other meaning in the subsequent clause which gives exemption from local taxation to voluntary schools.

As the schools of the complainers are not non-school-board elementary schools receiving a Parliamentary grant, but secondary or higher class endowed schools participating only in the secondary education grant in aid, they are not voluntary schools in the sense of the section which I am called upon to interpret.

This note of suspension will therefore fall to be refused, with expenses.—28*th October* 1907.

Process—Proof or Jury Trial—Reparation—Collision Between Vessels at Sea—Loss of Member of Crew of One Vessel—Action of Damages by Relatives of Deceased—Form of Inquiry—Nautical Assessor—Issue Disallowed.

The pursuers in this action were the widow and children of George Kerr, master of the s.s. "Ruby," which was sunk on 9th October 1905 as the result of a collision with the s.s. "Prudhoe Castle" in the Firth of Forth near the Forth Bridge. The master and six of the crew were drowned. The result of a litigation between the owners of the respective vessels was to find that both were to blame.

The averments of fault made by the pursuers against the defenders were as follows:—

Cond. 5. The death of the said George Kerr was caused through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, owing to their faulty navigation. In particular, the "Prudhoe Castle," in breach of the regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea, and especially Articles 25, 28, and 29 thereof, and of the rules of good seamanship, (1) failed to keep a proper look-out; (2) failed to signal her alteration of course to starboard; (3) failed to timeously stop and reverse her engines when approaching the "Ruby"; (4) when the vessels were on courses which, if maintained, would have taken them clear of each other, negligently directed her course to port; and (5) the Firth of Forth west of the Forth Bridge, and, in particular, at and near the place of said collision, being a narrow channel, failed to keep to that side of the fairway or midchannel which lay on her starboard side.

The pursuers proposed an issue in ordinary form for the trial of the action.

The defenders contended that the case was not suitable for jury trial and ought to be sent to proof. They referred to M'Lean v. Johnstone, 1906, 14 S.L.T. 63, 8 F. 836; Nautical Assessors (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 40), sect. 2.

The Lord Ordinary refused an issue and allowed a proof.

Lord Salvesen.—I have very great sympathy with the pursuer, because, if my recollection serves me right, she is the only person of all those who suffered by this very disastrous collision who remains uncompensated, and I would have been very anxious if I could to have given her the benefit of having her case submitted to a jury. But if I did so, I think I should be establishing a bad precedent and also going contrary to the decisions of both Divisions of the Inner House. I think it must now be taken as settled law that in a maritime case where questions arise as to navigation, and with regard to which it might be right that the judge should be assisted by a nautical assessor, the case is not suited for jury trial but ought to be tried by the judge himself. I entirely agree with Lord Kyllachy's opinion as reported in Maclean v. Johnston, that where an action is raised to recover damages for loss of life at sea, if the issue involved is a simple issue of fact, the case may quite appropriately be tried by a jury. But when I look at the averments here I am afraid I cannot regard this case as falling within that category. There are five respects in which it is said that the defenders' vessel was improperly navigated, and the allegations of fault involve the construction, or the application, at all events, of the rules for preventing collisions at sea which constitute a very difficult code to interpret. In these circumstances I have no option but to refuse the issue. —24*th October* 1907.

Expenses — Sheriff — Ministerial Act—Sheriff has No Power at Common Law to Award Expenses when Acting Ministerially—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. cap. 68), sects. 10, 13 and 26.

This was a suspension raised by Mr W. J. N. Liddall of Navitie, Kinross, of a charge at the instance of the Parish Council of Ballingry for £48, 4s. 3d., being the expenses awarded against him by the Sheriff-Substitute of Fife and Kinross at Kirkcaldy (Shennan) in a petition under the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act 1855, in which he had appeared as an objector.

The facts of the case and contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary held that under the said Act the Sheriff was acting ministerially and had no right to impose expenses, and suspended the charge.

Lord Johnston.—Mr Liddall of Navitie under this suspension complains that he has been charged at the instance of the Parish Council of Ballingry on an extract decree for expenses pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute of Fife which the latter had no power to grant.

The circumstances are these:—The Parish Council of Ballingry, as coming in place of the old Parochial Board, in May 1906 presented a petition to the Sheriff of Fife by virtue of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act 1855, praying him to designate 4½ acres of the glebe lands of Ballingry for the purposes of a burial ground for the parish. The prayer of their petition concluded by craving the Sheriff to find any person offering objections to the petition liable in expenses. Mr Liddall competently appeared, and after the statutory enquiry the Sheriff-Substitute, in disposing of the petition, found him liable in expenses. I am of opinion that neither had the Parish Council a right to conclude for expenses nor had the Sheriff-Substitute power to award them under said petition. That he should have even done so on the merits had he the power is unintelligible, his whole reasoning leading to an opposite conclusion, and proving that Mr Liddall's opposition was not only necessary but advantageous in the public interest as well as in his own, and amply justified by the result. But the question before me does not depend on the merits, but on the competency of the Sheriff's award.

The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act 1855 provides for the closing of burial grounds which have become dangerous to the public health or offensive to public decency, and for the provision of burial grounds, whether existing burial grounds have been so closed or not. In relation to this matter certain authority is given to the Sheriff, subject to an appeal to a Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session, but I think that the very subject-matter of the authority committed to the Sheriff raises the prima facie presumption that his action will be ministerial and not judicial. This is amply confirmed by the provisions of the statute when these are examined in detail.

The Sheriff is first called in by sect. 3, where it is proposed to put the statute into operation, when a parish is partly burghal and partly landward, to determine whether for the purposes of the Act such parish is to be deemed to be burghal or landward. And where application is made to him for that purpose he is to hear "any parties having interest."

In the next place, by sects. 4 to 8, the Sheriff may be applied to not merely by the Parochial Board, but by any ten persons assessed for relief of the poor, or any two householders residing within one hundred yards of an existing or proposed burial ground, to determine whether such burial ground is or would be dangerous to public health or offensive to public decency. The provisions for the procedure on such application require the Sheriff "to permit all parties whom he shall judge to have an interest to appear and be heard in such manner as he shall deem fitting." He is to make enquiry, and if satisfied of the truth of the allegations of the applicants, he is to pronounce an interlocutor to such effect and transmit a copy to the Home Secretary, whereupon an Order in Council is to be pronounced closing the existing or prohibiting the opening of the proposed burial ground. In this branch of the statute there is no provision for appeal, but there is a prohibition of the renewal of the application to the Sheriff, except with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, till after the lapse of five years. In both these provisions it is quite clear that the Sheriff is acting ministerially, and this is accentuated by the clause to which I have last referred, and to enable him to deal properly with such applications it is manifestly necessary, and to the public advantage, that all having interest should be heard.

Then there follow in sects. 9 to 14 enactments for the provision of burial grounds for parishes, and I think also of additional ground to be added to an existing burial ground, and that whether the burial ground of the parish has been ordered to be closed or not. So far as I am concerned the important sections are 10 and 13. Sect. 10 provides for the Parochial Board, any ten ratepayers, or any two members of the Board, applying by summary petition to the Sheriff to have a suitable portion of land designated. And after examining witnesses, of whose evidence he shall keep a note, and making enquiry, the Sheriff is to proceed to designate and set apart such portion as he may deem necessary "of any lands in such parish suitable for the purpose," provided that due intimation is first given to the owner of such lands that he may be heard for his interest before such designation is actually made. Then sect. 13 incorporates the Lands Clauses Act 1845, which in effect makes the Sheriff's designation of a parcel of land for the purpose of a burial ground the equivalent of a private Act and confers compulsory powers on the Parochial Board as promoters of the undertaking to acquire the lands designated by the Sheriff. It is somewhat strange that the 10th section should only provide expressly for the owner of such lands being heard for his interest, but I think that the Sheriff-Substitute, having regard to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, did right in giving a wide interpretation to the word "owner," and in holding it to include anyone who, as Mr Liddall, might be injuriously affected, in respect, for instance, that the land proposed to be taken marched with his estate and was separated therefrom by a burn, in the water of which he had the rights of a riparian proprietor, and which water was liable to be polluted by drainage from the proposed cemetery. I cannot understand the reasoning of the Sheriff-Substitute's note, in which he indicates that he was prepared to be satisfied of the suitability of the ground chiefly because it was the only ground possible, without satisfying himself that either there would be no injurious affection of the burn by pollution, or that proper precautions were to be taken to prevent it, and which led him to proceed to designate the land with a mere warning that, "having in view Mr Bennett's (that is, Mr Liddall's adviser's) cogent criticism of the tentative scheme, they (the Parochial Board) must see that an efficient scheme is provided." It is manifest that but for Mr Liddall's appearance, whether statutorily entitled or not, the drainage question would never have been considered and must have subsequently been raised between him and the Parochial Board in the form of an action for nuisance.

In this third class of applications to the Sheriff an appeal is given to a Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session, but notwithstanding I cannot hold the proceedings either before the Sheriff or before him to be anything but ministerial. Of this I think it is sufficiently conclusive that by sect. 13 to the Sheriff is committed the duty of a Parliamentary Committee on a private Bill.

As the statute makes no provision as to expenses except by saying (sect. 26) that the expenses incurred by the Parochial Board in carrying the Act into execution, so far as not covered by burial fees, are to be raised by assessment, the complainer here maintains that the Sheriff-Substitute in his final deliverance on the Board's application had no power to award expenses against him, while the respondents maintain that he was entitled to do so by virtue of his common law powers. I am of opinion that he had no such common law powers, and that having no statutory power he was acting ultra vires in awarding expenses against Mr Liddall.

That he was acting ministerially I think cannot be doubted, and I refer to Binning v. Easton & Sons, 1906, 8 F. 407, and to Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co., 1907, S.C. 607.

The Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act 1868 is an Act of somewhat similar character, though it provides for appeal to the Sheriff and ultimately to the Lord Ordinary in teind causes from proceedings in the Church Courts, and there is therefore rather more to be said for such an appeal being of a judicial character than under the statute in question. Yet by sect. 15 of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act it was thought necessary to give express power to the Sheriff and Lord Ordinary to award expenses.

Two categories of cases were referred to as authorities on this subject. First, those in which summary complaints of a merely quasi criminal character were concerned, as in Ledgerwood v. M'Kenna, 1868, 7 M. 261, where opinions were expressed that justices without any express power might competently award expenses in a complaint under that Act, but I think it is sufficient to say of that case that the justices were assumed to be acting judicially. Then in the analogous case of Nimmo v. Clark & Wilson, 1872, 10 M. 477, being an appeal to the Court of Session from a conviction by the Sheriff for contravention of the Mines Regulation Act 1860, the question was raised whether the Court of Session, to whom the appeal was taken, could award even expenses in the appeal, there being no provision for an award of expenses in the original complaint. There was no suggestion that the Sheriff could have awarded expenses in the court below, and the Court held that on the analogy of the practice in the Justiciary Court in appeals from convictions of a criminal character they were entitled to award expenses in similar appeals from convictions of a civil character.

The other category of cases to which I was referred was those in which the Sheriff acts as referee, as in the Burgh Police Act 1892, in the matter of extension of burgh boundaries, definition of drainage and water areas, etc., and it was pointed out that in County Council of Dumbarton v. Clydebank Burgh Commissioners, 1901, 4 F. 111, the Court on a statutory appeal from a Sheriff had assumed the power of awarding expenses both before them and in the court below of a successful opposition to the magistrates' application, although the statute made no provision for expenses. I have some difficulty in understanding that decision, and looking to what Lord M'Laren says, I cannot regard it as a considered judgment upon the point, and can only explain it to my own mind by assuming that in the peculiar circumstances of the case, and to redress a manifest hardship, the Court used their nobile officium to do that which neither they nor the Sheriff had power under the statute or common law to do. But this does not infer that the Sheriff had any power at his own hand to do the same, and in support of my view I refer to White v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, 1897, 24 R. 446.

I therefore propose to suspend the charge, with expenses.—31*st October* 1907.

International Law—Foreign Decree—Decree-conform—Enforcement of American Decree — Circumstances Where Jurisdiction of American Court Not Recognised.

The following statement of the circumstances under which this action was raised is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—

"This is an action by the assignees of an American citizen to enforce a judgment in absence, obtained in the State of New York, by the grant of a decree-conform. The facts, as appearing from the pleadings, or ex facie of the proceedings in the American Courts, are as follows:—

"On 21st November 1903 the defenders, who are distillers in Scotland, entered into an agency agreement with a certain Demeter Pick of New York for the sale of their whiskies in the United States and Canada. Disputes arose as to the carrying out of the mutual obligations of parties, and it appears to be common ground that very few orders which Mr Pick obtained were accepted by the defenders. In October 1905 Mr Duncan M'Callum, one of the defenders' directors, had occasion to be in New York on business, and on 30th October 1905 he was served with a summons in which Mr Pick claimed 10,000 dollars for breach of the agreement. The defenders explain that the alleged service took place on board a steamer by which Mr M'Callum was returning to this country, by handing him an envelope, the contents of which he did not ascertain until he opened it at sea some days later. They further say that he did not understand the nature of the document. Those explanations are denied, and I cannot, therefore, in any way proceed upon them at present. It is certain, however, that no appearance was made for the defenders, or any other person; and the proceedings shew that, after the formal evidence had been led, decree in absence was pronounced on 28th April 1906. Both the summons and the judgment were directed against 'Stewart, Galbraith & Co.' and not against 'Stewart, Galbraith & Co. Ltd.,' who are the present defenders. This judgment was assigned on 4th June 1906 by Mr Pick to Moses Weill, who appears to have been his attorney, and on 29th June 1906 Mr Weill assigned it to the present pursuer. Both assignations bear to be of a judgment for 10,000 dollars obtained against Stewart, Galbraith & Co.

"It seems to have been ascertained that this judgment could not be enforced against the defenders, and accordingly a motion was made for leave to amend the Judgment Roll by the insertion of the word 'Limited' after the words 'Stewart, Galbraith & Company' wherever appearing in the Roll. This motion, which was not intimated to the defenders, was granted; and it is upon the judgment as so amended that the pursuer now sues."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:—

"(1) No title to sue.

"(2) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusion of the summons, the action should be dismissed.

"(5) The said alleged judgment having been pronounced by a Court having no jurisdiction over the defenders, is not enforceable against them."

The Lord Ordinary sustained the first, second and fifth pleas in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them with expenses.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as set forth above].—These proceedings are sufficiently extraordinary to invite examination, notwithstanding that Mr Justice Betts, the same judge who had pronounced the decree in absence and granted leave to amend the Judgment Roll, refused an application to vacate the judgment, and held that the service of the summons was good. It is unnecessary, however, to consider these matters, as I have reached the opinion that the American Court had no jurisdiction such as the Courts of Scotland will recognise to entitle the pursuer to a decree-conform.

The defenders are described as a limited company, having their registered office in Scotland. They could not, therefore, be subjects of the United States, nor resident there at the time when the action began, neither is it alleged that they had contracted to submit themselves to the forum in which the judgment was obtained, nor that in the character of pursuers they had selected the forum in which they were sued, and they are not said to have had real estate within the State of New York. Now these are the only grounds of jurisdiction which will be recognised as properly subjecting a party to the jurisdiction of a foreign Court (Rousillon v. Rousillon, 1880, 14 Ch. Div. 351; approved Sirdar Gurdyal Singh [1894], A.C. 670). It may well be, nevertheless, that, according to the legislation of New York State, a foreign corporation may be properly cited there although none of these grounds of jurisdiction exist. We are familiar in Scotland with the process of founding jurisdiction by arrestment of moveables; but it is quite certain that a foreign court, and even an English Court, will not grant a decree-conform to a Scotch decree where this was the only ground of jurisdiction of the Scotch Court which pronounced it. It is therefore of no consequence whether according to the law of New York State the defenders were subject—whether on the ground of citation or otherwise—to the jurisdiction of the Courts there. In the Privy Council case to which I have already referred it was expressly decided that the mere fact that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the Court in which the judgment was pronounced would not, in a personal action, give jurisdiction over a defendant who was personally resident elsewhere; and it was laid down in absolute terms that no territorial legislation can give jurisdiction which foreign Courts ought to recognise against foreigners who owe no allegiance or obedience to the Power which so legislates. Assuming, therefore, that the accidental presence and citation of a director of the defenders' company in New York was sufficient, according to the law there prevailing, to confer jurisdiction on Mr Justice Betts to pronounce the judgment in question, that has no relevancy in this action unless the ground of jurisdiction was one which the Scotch Courts ought to recognise. Accepting Mr Justice Fry's enumeration in Rousillon's case of the grounds of such jurisdiction as complete, it is obvious that the jurisdiction on the grounds claimed cannot be recognised here.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Pick v. Stewart, Galbraith & Co. Ltd.

What I have said proceeds on the assumption that the defenders had been properly called and cited. I have already pointed out that they were not called, in the first instance, under their proper statutory designation; and that it was only after a judgment had been pronounced against defenders who, if they exist at all, are a different persona from the present defenders, that the judgment was amended without notice, so as in fact to substitute these defenders in place of another party against whom the judgment had been pronounced. Such a proceeding seems to be contrary to elementary rules of justice, and to indicate that the particular tribunal which sanctioned it was disposed to accede to any ex parte motion. When, in addition, it appears that the only judgment of which the pursuer is an assignee is a judgment against Stewart, Galbraith & Co., it is obvious how hopeless his present demand is. I shall accordingly sustain the first, second and fifth pleas for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action.—2nd November 1907.

I. Arbitration—Partnership—Dissolution—Clause in Contract of Co-partnership Referring Differences Between Partners as to Meaning of Contract—Dissolution of Firm—Exclusion of Action—Held that the Jurisdiction of the Court was Not Excluded by Arbitration Clause.

II. Partnership — Action for Dissolution of — Construction of Arbitration Clause in Contract of Co-partnery—Reference of Differences Between Partners as to Contract.

This was an action at the instance of David Smith Semple, writer, Paisley, against Thomas Dun Macnair and Gavin Crawford, also writers in Paisley, in which the pursuer sought to have it declared that the firm of D. S. Semple, Macnair & Crawford (of which the parties were the individual partners) was dissolved on or about 4th January 1907, and that at that date the defenders ceased to have any share or interest in the said firm, its property and assets, and that their share and interest vested, as at the said date, in the pursuer, subject to their right to receive from the pursuer their share and interest in the firm as the same should appear from a balance-sheet to be made at the said date; or otherwise, that a decree should be pronounced dissolving the said partnership as at the date of citation in this action, or at such other date as might be fixed; and that, upon said decree of dissolution being pronounced, the pursuer and defenders should be decerned and ordained to realise the assets of the co-partnery and, after repayment of the capital of each partner, to divide the same among the parties according to their interests.

The pursuer averred that in September 1901 he was carrying on business alone as a law agent and conveyancer in Paisley. At the said date he arranged to take the defenders into partnership with him, and a contract of co-partnership was entered into by the parties on 27th September 1901. This contract provided that the co-partnership should begin on 1st October 1901 and should endure till 28th May 1917, and that the pursuer should always be entitled to the position of senior partner.

The contract of co-partnership also provided :—

(2) "The business shall be carried on under the firm of 'D. S. Semple, Macnair & Crawford,' and the signature of the firm may be used by any of the partners, but for behoof of the partnership only. . . . In the event of any contravention of this provision the contravener . . . . in the option of the other partners, ceasing to be a member of the Company, without any legal process whatever, on payment of his share and interest as is hereinafter provided with regard to the share and interest of a partner becoming bankrupt or insolvent."

(5) "The second and third parties shall be bound to devote their whole time and attention to the partnership business, but the first party shall only be bound to devote such time and attention to the business as he pleases, and the partners shall consult each other on all matters of importance. It is specially agreed that, with the assistance of the junior partners, the senior partner will, so long as he desires, conduct the secretary and law agency of the Paisley Heritable Property Investment Society and such trust estates as are presently under his charge, as he may desire, and the second and third parties shall conduct the court, conveyancing and general work of the office, and report at least once a week to the senior partner."

(7) "A proper set of business books shall be kept . . . . the books shall be balanced annually on 31st December in each year. When the books are balanced, a balance-sheet shall be made out shewing the profit or loss, the said balance-sheet shall be examined and docqueted by the partners within a period of two months after the balance is made. . . ."

(8) "At each balance whatever sum stands at the credit of each partner beyond his capital may be either withdrawn by the respective partners in whole or in part, or with consent of his co-partners allowed to remain in the business and bear interest at five per cent. per annum."

The pursuer's averments in Conds. 5 and 7 were that he had a large amount of work for clients who had employed him prior to the co-partnership, which he continued to conduct. He occasionally called in the assistance of his co-partners in this work, but they objected to aid him with it, and demanded that he should hand over the control of it to them. On the other hand, the defenders kept locked up the receptacles for papers which they brought to the partnership office and denied the pursuer access to them. From the autumn of 1903 onwards the defenders interfered with the pursuer's clients and with his conduct of their business, and, in defiance of his wishes, took the affairs of his clients out of his hands, and on different occasions entered into communication with them and usurped the entire management and control of various matters outwith the work allotted to them under the contract. Also, the defender Crawford, with the concurrence of the other defender, ignored the pursuer and sought the advice of other law agents regarding the affairs of the pursuer's clients.

In other condescendences (omitting Cond. 3, which the pursuer withdrew) the pursuer averred that the defenders had endeavoured to take the management of the whole affairs of the firm out of the pursuer's hands; that they had kept the firm's bank and cheque books and deposit receipts in their safe, and excluded the pursuer from access thereto; that since August 1903 they had ceased to report each week to him; that in 1905 they did not submit the balance-sheet of the firm to him; and that in 1906, having prepared a balance-sheet, they withdrew their shares (including a portion of their capital) before giving the pursuer an opportunity of checking the balance-sheet. Further, they abused the pursuer to the firm's clients, and on 25th July 1906 the defender Macnair wrote to one of the pursuer's clients blaming the pursuer for neglect of that client's interests. The defenders also amalgamated with the firm's business the trade of house-factoring, and persisted in signing the firm's name in connection with said business, in contravention of Article 2 of the Contract of Co-partnership. In consequence of the defenders' conduct the relations between the parties became strained, and the pursuer sought to have it declared that the defenders, in respect of their contraventions of the contract of co-partnership, had ceased to be members of the co-partnership.

The defenders founded, inter alia, on the last clause of the said contract providing for arbitration (which is quoted in the Lord Ordinary's opinion), and pleaded:—

"(5) In any event the action should be sisted until it has been decided by the arbiter whether or not the defenders have committed any breaches of the contract."

Lord Mackenzie.—The pursuer is the senior partner of the firm of D. S. Semple, Macnair & Crawford, who carry on business as law agents in Paisley, and the defenders are the two junior partners. Decree is sought that the firm was dissolved on or about 4th January 1907, or otherwise the Court is asked to pronounce a decree dissolving the partnership. There is also a conclusion applicable to the division of the assets on dissolution.

The defenders maintain that the matters founded upon by the pursuer in his condescendence fall within the reference clause in the contract of co-partnery, and their motion was that the action should be sisted in order that the arbiter nominated in that clause may consider and decide the differences which have arisen between the partners, and report whether the condition of affairs in the partnership is due to the fault of the pursuer or of the defenders; and, if there is fault on both sides, how far it is the fault of the pursuer and how far the fault of the defenders, and indicate whether, in his view, there should be dissolution, and in the event of his being of opinion that dissolution is advisable, to report the terms upon which, in his opinion, it should take place. These are the terms of the motion made by counsel for the defenders.

Now the reference clause is in the following terms:—"In the event of any difference arising between the partners, or between the representatives or creditors of a deceasing or bankrupt partner and the surviving or solvent partners, as to the true intent and meaning of these presents, or any alterations that may hereafter be made on the same, or to the implement or carrying out of these presents, or in any way concerning the same, such differences are hereby submitted and referred to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decreet-arbitral" of an arbiter named. It was not maintained on behalf of the defenders that under this clause the arbiter had power to decree dissolution. That, it was admitted, was matter for the Court. The argument was that as the averments of the pursuer in support of his demand for a dissolution related all, or nearly all, to breaches of the contract of co-partnery, these were differences falling within the reference clause to be determined by the arbiter; that consequently he must first of all pronounce his decision upon them, and that then his report should be submitted to the Court, and that the Court should say whether there is to be dissolution or not.

Semple v. Macnair and Crawford.

I think there is a fallacy in the argument of the defenders, and it is this: The difference between the partners here is whether there should be dissolution or not; that, it is admitted, is not a matter for the arbiter to decide, and therefore the jurisdiction of this Court to pronounce a decision upon the difference between the partners is not excluded by the reference clause. As bearing upon the question in issue it will be necessary to investigate matters in dispute between the parties. Each of these matters taken by itself might have fallen within the terms of the reference clause. Where, however, the question is what bearing they have upon the only question raised in this action, viz., whether there should be decree of dissolution or not, I am unable to see how the arbiter comes in place of the Court. What the defenders are really asking the Court to do is to form an opinion on and decide a question without hearing the evidence. The case seems to me entirely different from that of the North British Railway Co. v. The Lanarkshire and Dumbarton Railway Co., 1895, 23 R. 76. There the difference was to be determined by the arbiter. Here it is not. There the question in dispute was within the reference clause, but it was argued that the defenders' actings were outwith their statutory power, and that the questions raised were questions of law. It was held that there was no reason why the engineer to whom the matter had been committed should not dispose of it. So, too, in The Caledonian Railway Co. v. The Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Co., 1874, 1 R. (H.L.) 8, it was held that a difference between the parties in regard to the mode in which an agreement was to be carried into operation was within the arbitration clause, and that the action was excluded. If the question in this case, whether there should be dissolution, had been one for the arbiter, these cases would have applied. According to the argument submitted, they do not.

Reference was made on behalf of the defenders to the English cases of Russell v. Russell, 1880, 14 Ch. D. 471; Walmsley v. White, 1892, 40 W. R. 675; Belfield v. Bourne [1894], 1 Ch. 521; Vawdrey v. Simpson [1896], 1 Ch. 166. In these cases it was held, on a construction of the arbitration clause, that it was for the arbiter to say whether there should be dissolution of the partnership or not. The defenders here, however, did not carry their contention so far. I could understand the defenders founding on these cases if they were prepared to go the full length of them. According to the decisions in these cases, it was the person who heard the evidence who decided the matter. The proposal here, however, is for one tribunal to take the evidence and report, and for another to form an opinion and pronounce a decree. In my opinion that is out of the question. I may point out that there appears to be a difference between Scotch and English practice in such matters as this. In Scotland where the partners have agreed to refer the question to arbitration the jurisdiction of the Court is excluded. In England where a motion is made to stay proceedings by reason of an agreement to refer to arbitration, the Court has a discretion whether to grant the motion or not (Lindley on Partnership (7th ed.), p. 494).

I am of opinion that the defenders' fifth plea in law should be repelled; . . . . the case will be continued in order that the pursuer may deliver to the defenders particulars in regard to his averments in Conds. 5 and 7. The question of relevancy may be further discussed if so desired, after this has been done. The pursuer intimated that he did not insist in his averments in Cond. 3. —5th November 1907.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. I (b), 2, 12—Payment During Incapacity — Workman in Right of Registered Agreement Earning with Same Employers Lower Wages — Charge on Registered Agreement—Suspension of Charge—Offer to Pay Difference for Period of Lower Wages—Nimmo & Co. Ltd. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890, Followed.

This was an action of suspension at the instance of William Baird & Co. Ltd., coal and iron masters, complainers, against John M'Whinnie, sometime miner, respondent, in which the complainers sought to suspend a charge by the respondent in virtue of an extract registered memorandum of agreement and warrant of the Sheriff of Stirling thereon, dated 24th April 1907. The facts are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Lord Mackenzie.—The respondent is a miner who met with an accident to his eye on 29th March 1906, while in the employment of the complainers. He claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 in respect of his total incapacity for work. On 12th April 1906 the parties agreed that the weekly amount of compensation in respect of the respondent's total incapacity was 14s. 5d. The respondent's average weekly earnings in the complainers' employment were 28s. 9⅗d. The sum of 14s. 5d. was the maximum rate under the statute for total incapacity.

The respondent was paid 14s. 5d. a week of compensation from 12th April to 29th May 1906. On 29th May he returned to work at a wage of 18s. 4d. a week, which he continued to earn till 12th July 1906. During this period he was paid 5s. 3d. a week as partial compensation. On 13th July 1906 he again became totally incapacitated, and his total incapacity continued till 13th September 1906. On 21st July 1906 an agreement was entered into between the parties under which the respondent was again paid compensation at the maximum rate of 14s. 5d. a week. A memorandum of the agreement of 21st July 1906 was recorded in terms of the Act. The agreement, which is produced, does not refer to the respondent's total incapacity, but in Answer 5 he admits that he received the payment of 14s. 5d. a week from 13th July to 13th September 1906 in respect of his total incapacity. On 13th September 1906 the respondent returned to work with the complainers. He continued to work from that date till 6th May 1907 at wages which averaged 23s. 2d. a week.

On 6th May 1907 the respondent charged the complainers on the memorandum of agreement of 21st July 1906 to pay to him £35, 5s. 6d., being forty-two weeks' compensation at 14s. 5d. a week from 21st July 1906 to 6th May 1907, under deduction of £6, 9s. 9d., being the amount received by him between 13th July and 13th September 1906. If the complainers pay the sum charged for, the respondent would receive, in respect of the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, a sum considerably exceeding (the complainers say about 9s. a week) his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

The complainers maintain that the respondent is only entitled to compensation, from 13th September 1906 to 6th May 1907, at the rate of the full difference between the average of his actual weekly earnings during that period and the average of his weekly earnings prior to the accident. This for the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907 amounts to £9, 10s. 3d., which complainers tender in the present suspension of the charge.

The complainers argued that the present case was ruled by the principles laid down in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168, followed in Nimmo & Co. Ltd. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890, and I am of opinion that this argument is well founded. The respondent maintained that this was not so, because under the Workmen's Compensation Act, Sched. I, sect. (1) (b), compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. a week might be awarded in respect not only of total, but also of partial incapacity. He accordingly maintained that an application must be made to have the agreement reviewed. I am unable, looking to what I consider to have been decided by these cases, to hold that the respondent can found upon the agreement of 21st July 1906, so as to enable him to recover a sum in excess of his average weekly earnings prior to the date of the accident. In the present case, either the respondent got wages on the implied agreement between him and the complainers that compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. per week — the amount which had been fixed in respect of his total incapacity — was no longer due or claimable, because the total incapacity in respect of which this sum of compensation was due had ceased, and therefore the right to get, or obligation to pay, compensation at that rate had come to an end; or the payment of wages at the average rate of 23s. 2d. a week was in the first place to be held to the extent of 14s. 5d. of that sum as payment of the compensation, and the balance as the remuneration given for such service as the respondent in his partially disabled condition was able to render. In Nimmo's case the complainers tendered a sum which represented the full difference between the respondent's average earnings prior to the accident and his actual earnings for the period in question. The Court, in respect of his refusal to accept this offer, sustained the reasons of suspension, and suspended the charge simpliciter. Accordingly I am of opinion in the present case that there should be a finding that the compensation due to the respondent was payable only during his total incapacity; and further, in respect of his refusal to accept the complainers' offer of £9, 10s. 3d., that the reasons of suspension should be sustained and the charge suspended simpliciter—the complainers being found entitled to expenses. —5th November 1907.

182. Macfarlane v. Colam.

Reparation—Road—Motor Car—Motor Car Left Unattended at Roadside in Breach of Turnpike Act, But Not Causing Obstruction—Horses Shy at Car, Causing Damage—Held That Car Owner Not Liable

1ST DIV. Macfarlane v. Colam.

—ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1878 (41 & 42 VICT. CAP. 51), SECT. 123, AND TURNPIKE ROADS (SCOTLAND) ACT 1831 (1 & 2 WILLIAM IV. CAP. 43), SECT. 96.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Inverness.

In this action a horse-hirer sued the owner of a motor car for the sum of £38, as representing damage alleged to have been suffered by the pursuer through injury to a waggonette and pair of horses of his property owing to the fault of the defender. The immediate cause of the injuries complained of was the upsetting of the waggonette, the horses drawing it having taken fright at the defender's car, which had been left unattended at the roadside.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Grant) found the defender liable for the damage sustained.

The facts of the case and the grounds of judgment are fully detailed in the Note to the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor, which is in the following terms.

The motor car belonging to the defender in this case was left by his son upon the roadway of the public road between Kingussie and Newtonmore about 6 p.m. on the afternoon of 30th July 1906. No person was left in charge of the car, but Mr Colam, jun., had stopped the machinery and disconnected it, in this complying with the Motor Car Regulations on the point.

A waggonette and a pair of horses belonging to the pursuer came from the direction of Newtonmore, and the horses taking fright at the motor car, the waggonette was overturned and the horses and the waggonette damaged.

The driver of the waggonette was a careful and experienced man, and in no way by his fault contributed to the accident.

The available breadth of the roadway was a little more than 15 feet; of that the car occupied about one-third, leaving about 10 feet passage for the waggonette. There was a stone wall on the opposite side of the road to the car, so that there was no possibility of expanding the space by going on the verge.

There was thus no absolute obstruction of the highway: ten feet of an opening are enough for the passage of a waggonette and pair, assuming the driver was of ordinary skill and the horses perfectly quiet.

There was a grass verge to the road on the side on which the motor car lay, but it was not a place where Mr Colam could have placed his car, having reasonable regard to its care, nor could he prudently have placed it on either of the approaches of the house which he was visiting, an unfinished house his father was building.

There remains the one point on which culpa may be inferred on the part of young Mr Colam, whether he acted in breach of the Statutory Regulations under the Road Acts in leaving his car unattended on the highway. Sect. 96 of 1 & 2 William IV. cap. 43, as incorporated in the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act 1878, sect. 123, inter alia, enacts "If any person shall leave any . . . . carriage whatever upon such road or on the side or sides thereof without any proper person in the sole custody or care thereof, longer than may be necessary to load or unload the same, or shall not place such . . . . carriage during the time of loading or unloading the same or of taking refreshments as near to one side of the road as conveniently may be, either with or without any horse or beast of draught harnessed or yoked thereto, shall for each and every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding fifty shillings sterling over and above the damages occasioned thereby."

A motor car is a carriage in the sense of the Road Acts; vide Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896, sect. 1 (b).

Mr R. L. Colam did leave the car in question on the road without any proper person in the sole custody or care thereof. I cannot doubt that the fact of the car being there was the immediate cause of the accident. The horses were skilfully driven; they had passed motors in motion eight times that day without becoming unmanageable; and no other cause can be suggested for this accident than this stationary and unattended motor car placed where it ought not to be according to the Road Acts. There is thus, I consider, a direct relation between young Mr Colam's act and the damage that resulted.

There remains to be considered the exceptions to the section. During the time necessarily required for loading and unloading or for taking refreshments, a carriage may be left unattended if placed as near to one side of the road as conveniently may be, that is, on either side, not necessarily the proper side in passing. These particulars Mr Colam complied with. The car was practically close to the side on which his business lay. No allegation of "refreshment" was raised, and all that is left is the question whether his absence was no longer than was requisite in "unloading." The object of his journey was to take some vases—fragile articles—to the new house; if that had been done expeditiously and he had returned to the car without delay, it might have been soundly maintained that this was "unloading" in the sense of the Act; but the evidence shews, I think, that he stayed longer in the house than was absolutely requisite to deposit the vases. His return was occasioned by the accident itself: not actuated by the desire to return to his motor as soon as possible; and he admits having been ten minutes in the house, though the architect, Mr Cameron, puts it at a shorter period of time

I conclude, therefore, that the accident was occasioned by Mr R. L. Colam's breach of the statute, and that his father was responsible, as he was on his father's business. I think it is true, as some witnesses say, that horses are more ready to take fright on a country road than in a town street, where there are a variety of sounds and sights to distract their attention; but that does not enter into my reasons of judgment any more than what my private opinion may be as to the reasonableness of this section of the Act which I have to administer. I must hold that Mr R. L. Colam was in fault in leaving his car unattended, and the defender is liable for the direct consequences of his so doing.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session. His counsel was stopped by the Court.

Argued for the Pursuer: The defender was liable, as the cause of the accident lay in his wrongous use of the road (Harris v. Mobbs, 1878, L.R. 3 Ex. Div. 268; Williams v. Day, 1883, L.R. 12 Q.B.D. 110).

The Court recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and assoilzied the defender.

The Lord President.—In my view this is really a most preposterous case. The driver of a motor car, in order to go up to a house, leaves it on a road, and he leaves it in such a position that there is plenty of room for other vehicles to pass. He goes up to the house, leaving the car standing, and he is absent for about fifteen minutes. He had stopped the car and the machinery was not running, and it was therefore not an object of terror to anything else on the road by means of noise, and there it stood on the side of the road. Another man comes along driving a pair of horses, and when he gets beside the car the horses shy and he has not sufficient control of them to prevent them getting into the ditch. The carriage is injured and one of the horses is injured, and then he brings an action against the owner of the motor car. The only ground upon which the Sheriff-Substitute has allowed the case is that he finds that under a well-known section of the Turnpike Act no vehicle must be left unattended on the roadway, and there is a forty-shilling penalty, and then he says, "That being so, I do not doubt the car being there was the immediate cause of the accident." It was the immediate cause in the sense that it was the object at which the horses shied. But the car being unattended was, in the Sheriff's view, a contravention of the statute. All I can say is that if that were so there would be a great many convictions. I will assume, however, that there could have been a conviction under the statute. But the fact of the car being unattended did not make it something which became more terrifying than it otherwise would have been, for this good reason, that while it is quite true that the presence of a man, and especially if he use his voice, calms horses, the car might have been well attended with the man sitting behind the car and not visible. In the whole circumstances I think the case is quite irrelevant. It would have been a different thing if the car had been placed so as to cause an obstruction to the highway, but upon the facts, agreeing with the Sheriff, I do not think there was any obstruction. I advise your Lordships to recal the interlocutor, find in fact that the leaving of the car in the position described did not constitute an obstruction of the highway; find that the leaving of the car unattended had no relation to the accident, and that the same happened through the shying of the horses and the inability of the driver to control them; find in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in damages, and assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Kinnear.—I concur.

Lord Dundas.—I also concur. I observe that the Sheriff-Substitute makes no finding of fault on the part of the defender, but concludes that, as the accident was occasioned by Mr Colam, jun., leaving the car, the defender is liable in damages. I am unable to see that the breach of the statute, if there was a breach of the statute, had any relation to the accident which occurred.—1*st November* 1907.

184. Lang v. St Enoch Shipping Company Limited.

Ship—Seaman—Contract of Service for Commercial Voyage—Carriage of Contraband—Refusal to Proceed to Belligerent Port—Discharge of Seaman—Wrongful Discharge—Wages—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sects. 134 and 186—Seaman Wrongfully Discharged on Account of Refusal to Proceed to Belligerent Port Held Entitled to Recover Wages from Date of Discharge to Date of Final Settlement in Terms of Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 134, and also to Damages—Caine v. Palace Shipping Company Limited [1907], A.C. 386, Followed.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

Robert Lang, fireman, 44 Cheapside Street, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against the St Enoch Shipping Co. Ltd., 48 West Regent Street, Glasgow, to obtain decree for (1) the sum of £4 per month from 24th January 1905 until the date of settlement, less the sum of £4, 12s. 5d. paid to account, in name of wages due to the pursuer, and (2) the sum of £100 in name of damages.

Proof was allowed and led. The facts found proved were set forth in the interlocutor of the Second Division as follows:—

"Find in fact (1) that on 24th January 1905 the pursuer agreed to serve as a fireman on board the defenders' steamship 'St Helena,' under articles which are admitted on record; (2) that the said steamship loaded at Cardiff a cargo of Welsh coal, and on 16th April 1905 she arrived at Gap Rock, the signal station for Hong Kong; (3) that the master there received orders to take the vessel to Nagasaki in Japan; (4) that the master, in accordance with these orders, altered the ship's course for Nagasaki and communicated the change to the crew; (5) that at this time a state of war existed between Russia and Japan, while towards them Great Britain maintained an attitude of neutrality; (6) that some time previously Russia had notified as contraband of war every kind of fuel, including coal; (7) that the pursuer along with the majority of the crew refused to go to Nagasaki with this cargo, and was entitled under the articles so to refuse; (8) that it is not proved that the pursuer and the rest of the crew refused to work the ship from Gap Rock or the vicinity thereof to Hong Kong; (9) that the defenders thereafter wrongously charged the pursuer and the rest of the crew before the police magistrate at Hong Kong with refusal of duty, and that the said magistrate convicted each of them of the said offence and sentenced them to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour; (10) that while they were still undergoing imprisonment the said ship was despatched from Hong Kong, and that, the defenders having made no provision for the passage home of the pursuer, in terms of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, he was sent home as a distressed seaman."

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), provides:—

Sect. 134. In the case of foreign going ships . . . .

(a) The owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seaman on account, at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement, two pounds or one-fourth of the balance of wages due to him, whichever is least, and shall pay him the remainder of his wages within two clear days (exclusive of any Sunday, fast day in Scotland, or Bank holiday) after he so leaves the ship.

(b) If the seaman consents, the final settlement of his wages may be left to a superintendent under regulations of the Board of Trade. . . .

(c) In the event of the seaman's wages or any part thereof not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof.

Sect. 186 (1). In the following cases . . . .

(b) Where the service of any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship terminates at any port out of Her Majesty's dominions, the master shall give to that seaman or apprentice a certificate of discharge in a form approved by the Board of Trade. . . .

(2) The master shall, also besides paying the wages to which the seaman or apprentice is entitled, either—

(a) provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in Her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman; or

(b) furnish the means of sending him back to some such port; or

(c) provide him with a passage home; or

(d) deposit with the consular officer or merchants as aforesaid such a sum of money as is by the officer or merchants deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his maintenance and passage home.

On 9th June 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Boyd) assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who on 22nd November 1906 decerned against the defenders for the sum of £6, 8s. as the balance of wages due to the pursuer up to the date of his arrival in Hong Kong, and the sum of £40 in name of damages.

The Defenders appealed and argued: No doubt the crew were entitled to refuse to proceed to Nagasaki (Caine v. Palace Steam Shipping Co. Ltd. [1907], A.C. 386). But it was proved that they had refused to obey the captain's order to come aft at the time when he wished to inform them that he had given up the voyage to Nagasaki. That was a case of refusal to obey lawful orders. The pursuer was therefore in breach of his contract, and was not entitled to bring an action thereon. Caine v. Palace Steam Shipping Co. Ltd. (cit.) was distinguishable. The pursuer there had not refused to obey lawful orders. Even if the pursuer were entitled to sue, he was only entitled to the wages actually earned, because there was a dispute as to liability which entitled the master to refuse to pay (Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 134 (c)). Alternatively the running of the wages was stopped at the date of the judgment of the Sheriff, that being the date which corresponded to the date of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Caine (cit.). It was immaterial that there had been no payment into Court, because payment into Court without admitting liability was unknown in Scotch practice. If the pursuer were entitled to continuing wages under sect. 134 (c), he was not entitled to damages in respect of failure to comply with sect. 186. Sect. 134 proceeded on the hypothesis that the contract remained in force, sect. 186 on the hypothesis that the contract had been terminated. In any view the sums which the pursuer had earned, or might have earned, since the date of discharge, should be taken into account in fixing the amount of damages.

Argued for the Pursuer: It was not proved that the pursuer had refused to obey any orders other than the order to proceed to Nagasaki. That was an unlawful order, which the pursuer might refuse to obey. He was not in breach of his contract, and was entitled to sue thereon (Caine v. Palace Shipping Co. Ltd., cit.). The pursuer was entitled to wages up to the date of "final settlement" (Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 134 (c)), i.e. up to the date when they were actually paid. In Caine (cit.) the running of wages was stopped at the date of the judgment of the Court of Appeal only because there was a payment into Court at that date. There was no such payment here. The pursuer was entitled to damages as well as wages (Merchant Shipping Act, sect. 186, Caine, cit.). As to wages earned by the pursuer, if the defenders wished to limit their liability, it was for them to establish the fact on which the limitation of liability depended. In the present case there was no evidence as to the amount of the pursuer's earnings.

"Recal the interlocutor of the Sheriff of Lanark dated 22nd November 1906, as also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute dated 9th June 1906; find in fact . . . . (ut supra). Find in law that in these circumstances the defenders are liable to the pursuer in damages; and also that under and by virtue of sect. 134 (c) of the said Merchant Shipping Act, the pursuer's wages continue to run, and are payable until the time of the final settlement thereof; therefore assess the damages at £40 (including maintenance); find the pursuer entitled to wages at the admitted rate of £4 per month from 24th January 1905 until the date hereof, under deduction of the sum of £4, 12s. 5d. received by him to account (£134, 9s., less said £4, 12s. 5d.), and accordingly decern against the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the said sums of £40 and £129, 16s. 7d., being together the sum of £169, 16s. 7d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date hereof until payment; find . . . . (as to expenses)."

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The pursuer seeks compensation under the following circumstances. He was a fireman,—one of the crew of a vessel called the "St Helena." The vessel being on the way to Hong Kong, which by her papers was her port of destination on the voyage she was making at the time, was signalled, when still at sea, from the signal station on the coast near Hong Kong, to proceed to Nagasaki, in Japan, and her course was altered accordingly. The war between Russia and Japan being in progress at the time, and the cargo, which was coal, having been declared contraband by both belligerents, the crew in a body refused to work the ship in the direction of Nagasaki. They had various interviews with the master, in which they consistently refused to serve the ship in a voyage to Nagasaki, and accordingly they remained on board idle. That being the position, the master, after consultation with his officers, who in the meantime were navigating the vessel, altered her course, and made for Hong Kong. He says that he summoned the men aft to inform them that he was going to Hong Kong, but that they refused to come aft. The crew say that the delay in coming aft was only a few minutes, while they cleared away their dinner things, and that when they came aft he waved them back, saying that he "wanted nothing more to do with them." Whoever is right as to what happened, the important point is that the master did not take proper steps to test whether the crew would assist in taking the vessel to Hong Kong, but navigated the vessel by the officers only for some time. No new order was issued. The crew were under the order to go to Nagasaki, or if that order was one that the master had no legal right to enforce, it was for him to cancel it and issue other orders. It therefore becomes the crucial point in the case, whether from the time when the order to set the course for Nagasaki was given until the time when the crew were landed at Hong Kong, any order was given by the master which the crew were bound to obey, and which they 2ND DIV. refused to obey. The occasion was an important and a serious one, the master having maintained that the crew were bound to give their services to go to Nagasaki, in which he was wrong. It lay with him to take proper measures to bring the working of the vessel into normal conditions, if he could do so. In testing this, one naturally looks to the log to see what was recorded at the time, that being the official statement made on the responsibility of the master, when the events were recent, and by which the position must be judged in any question with him. Now, the log records the abandonment of the voyage to Nagasaki, and gives the details of the duties undertaken by the officers plainly upon the footing that the master had not then informed the crew or called on them to return to duty. The day after this entry was made there appears an entry which is of great importance in the case. It is in these words:—"The foregoing entry had been read over to the members of the crew interested, who replied as follows, that they refused to go to Nagasaki as ordered, but they professed their willingness to take the ship into Hong Kong." That entry follows immediately on the entry mentioned above. It is very difficult to see how in the face of that entry it can be said that the crew ever refused to assist in navigating the vessel into Hong Kong. That being so, the sole question between pursuer and defender is narrowed down to this: Had the master the right to demand that the crew should work the ship on a course for Nagasaki? That is the question which was raised by the master before the magistrate in Hong Kong, and on which the master succeeded in having the men imprisoned. It is plain that the master proceeded throughout upon the footing that the crew were bound to obey his order to work the vessel to Nagasaki, and that they refusing to do so, he did not put them to the duty they were willing to undertake, viz. to navigate the vessel to Hong Kong. The conviction in Hong Kong was plainly wrong, and cannot be maintained. The risk of sailing into waters in which capture for carrying contraband of war was probable, was not a risk which the men in signing articles had undertaken. Therefore the men were in no default in refusing to go to Nagasaki, and it is plain that had that been accepted, they might have been able to do what they had undertaken to do, namely, to work the vessel on the course for Hong Kong.

Lang v. St Enoch Shipping Co. Ltd.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

In these circumstances the pursuer sues for wages in so far as not paid down to the date of final settlement, and for damages. The damages found are not impugned, but the Sheriff has not given wages down to the date of settlement. In that I think the Sheriff has erred. I am clearly of opinion that sect. 134 (c) of the Merchant Shipping Act applies, and that the wages under that clause run to the date of final settlement, there being no ground for attributing the delay in the settlement to the pursuer, or any one else than the master or his owners.

The view I take in this case is strongly confirmed by the case of Caine v. The Palace Shipping Company, recently decided in the House of Lords.

Accordingly, my view is that the pursuer is entitled to the damages as found in the court below, and to his wages, as far as not already paid, down to the date of settlement.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—In my opinion this case is indistinguishable in point of principle from the case of Palace Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Caine and Others, decided by the House of Lords on July 29th last. If so, we are bound to follow that case.

There, as here, the question arose out of the war between Russia and Japan, and out of a demand by the master that the crew (including in this case the pursuer, who was a fireman, and therefore a "seaman" in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894) should go with the cargo of coal, which had been declared contraband of war by both belligerents, to a port in Japan. The information as to the destination of the ship was communicated to the crew for the first time in this case when the ship reached Gap Rock, the signal station for Hong Kong: while in the House of Lords case the information was given at Hong Kong itself. But it is not contended that this trifling variation in the facts makes any distinction in principle. The only difference which the defenders represent as material is that the refusal of the pursuer and the rest of the crew to obey a lawful order applied, as they say, to an order to take the vessel to Hong Kong, and had nothing to do with the orders to go to Nagasaki in Japan. But this, though quite distinctly averred by the defenders on record (Ans. 10), is not borne out by the proof. The master nowhere says that he ever asked the pursuer and the others to take the vessel to Hong Kong. On the contrary, he says that after he had twice asked the men, first collectively and then individually, to "continue on the voyage," the course being at that time set for Nagasaki, in accordance with orders which had been received at the signal station, and they had twice refused, in the face of his remonstrances, he had a conference with the chief officer and the chief engineer as to the possibility of continuing the voyage, and it was then for the first time decided to go into Hong Kong, with the aid of the officers and engineers, the course being changed for Hong Kong in consequence of this decision. The Sheriff-Substitute discusses the precise sequence of events, and prefers the evidence of the officers examined to that of the men; but the Sheriff, on the other hand, accepts the evidence of the men, which is to the effect that they were in the act of going forward, in response to the master's command delivered by the third officer, when he held up his hand on the bridge and "said he wanted nothing more to do with us." Though personally I am disposed to agree with the Sheriff, I do not think that it is necessary to decide absolutely between these two slightly different versions of what occurred, seeing that there is no attempt on the part of the defenders to prove that any order, or even suggestion, was ever made to the pursuer and the others that, whether they were willing to go to Nagasaki or not, they were at least bound to work the vessel into Hong Kong. The most that is attempted on the part of the defenders by way of suggestion is to say, that the men must have seen that the ship was turned towards Hong Kong, and might then have offered to do their duty. But if the men were right in their refusal to carry contraband of war to a port of one of the belligerents, their legal position could not be reversed or affected so long as this order was never withdrawn or a new order substituted. And that this was the truth of the case sufficiently appears, I think, from the log-book of the ship on the two critical days. After the entry about the refusal of the crew "to do any more work or continue the voyage" (i.e. to Nagasaki), there is an entry, "In consequence of the above refusal, we were compelled to abandon the voyage, and take the ship into Hong-Kong," and then there is a description of the several duties undertaken by the officers. That again is followed by an entry made next day, and signed not only by the master and the chief officer, but also by the chief engineer, in the following terms:—"The foregoing entry has been read over to the members of the crew interested, who replied as follows, that they refused to go to Nagasaki as ordered, but they professed their willingness to take the ship into Hong Kong." I regard this statement not only as a de recenti record made by the officers of the ship of the true position of the contending parties, but it squares with all that followed. Acting on his erroneous views of the crew's rights, the master had the men put on shore, tried before the police magistrate of Hong-Kong, and sentenced to three weeks' hard labour for refusal of duty. After three days of the sentence had elapsed, the governor of Hong Kong, in the exercise of his discretionary powers, released the men, because (as appeared from subsequent correspondence with the Colonial Office) there had been an opposite decision in Hong Kong on a similar charge. In that opposite decision it had been held that, in view of the proximity of belligerent ships, special risks, not covered by the crew's agreements, did exist. It is therefore plain that the whole question turned, not on any minor point connected with the few hours' steaming from Gap Rock to Hong Kong, but on whether the crew, having signed an agreement to serve on an ordinary commercial voyage, subject only to perils of the sea, were justified in refusing to serve after the agreement had been broken by the shipowner requiring them to serve on a voyage which, although within the geographical limits of the articles, was yet attended with risks not contemplated by the articles. The consequences, as regards the pursuer, were that, when he was released, the ship was gone, and that he had to accept a passage home as "a distressed seaman." He accordingly now sues the defenders (1) for wages at the rate of £4 per month from the date of the articles till the date of final settlement, in terms of sect. 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, less a small sum paid to account, and (2) for the sum of £100 of damages. The Sheriff deals with the claim for wages merely, by giving decree for the sum of £6, 8s., admitted in the defences as the amount of the pursuer's wages up to his arrival in Hong Kong. The damages he assesses at £40.

The pursuer is satisfied with this latter award, as covering maintenance and every other claim except money wages. But I am of opinion that we must follow the rule applied by the House of Lords with regard to wages; and to that extent we must recal the Sheriff's interlocutor. In other words, we must hold that the master acted wrongfully in procuring the imprisonment of the pursuer on an unlawful ground and in bringing his engagement to an end without making any provision for his passage home, in terms of sect. 186 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In these circumstances it follows that the matter is regulated by sect. 134 (c) of that Act, which declares that the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof. There has been no final settlement thereof down to the present time, and the delay is not due to any cause other than the wrongful act or default of the owner or master. We must therefore give decree for the pursuer's wages at the admitted rate of £4 per month down to the date of our judgment hereon, under deduction of the sum of £4, 12s. 5d. admitted to have been received by him in Cond. 11, but without any reference to the sum of £6, 8s. alleged to have been paid by the defenders to the superintendent of shipping in Hong Kong as the balance of wages due to the pursuer; and quoad ultra we must affirm the Sheriff's award of damages (including maintenance), with which the pursuer declares he is satisfied.

This does not mean that we dissent from the main findings of the Sheriff. On the contrary, we agree with them; but it is necessary formally to recal his interlocutor and to vary his findings, in order to bring his judgment into harmony with a later decision of the House of Lords.

Bill of Suspension and Liberation.

This was a Bill of Suspension and Liberation at the instance of David Gold, who was convicted in the Police Court at Glasgow on a complaint at the instance of the respondent.

The complaint charged:—

That David Gold, of 74 Parson Street, Glasgow, did, during the period between 19th July and 9th August 1907, in his licensed broker's shop at 75 Glebe Street, in his house at 74 Parson Street, in his store at 64 Parson Street, and in a close at 14 Albert Street, Townhead, all in Glasgow, or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow, the particular place or places being to the complainer unknown, on different occasions during said period, the particular occasions being to the complainer unknown, reset in all ten rubber cycle tubes, eight freewheel clutches, twenty-four cycle inflator connections, one cycle hub and one horn, the particular articles resetted on each occasion being to the complainer unknown, the said articles having been dishonestly appropriated by theft from the shop of Joseph Milliken at 6 George Street, Glasgow, by Arthur Hughes, now of West Thorn Reformatory, Parkhead, Glasgow, and Robert Ralston, of 300 Charles Street, Townhead, Glasgow, and the value of the property above libelled is under Ten pounds sterling; and the said accused has been previously convicted of reset of theft, conform to the conviction specified in the subjoined schedule, and to be put in evidence at the trial.

The conviction and sentence was as follows:—

The magistrate, in respect of the evidence adduced, finds said accused guilty of the crime charged, and the previous conviction libelled in the schedule having been proved against the said accused, the magistrate therefore sentences and adjudges said accused to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days from this date, and grants warrant to officers of law to apprehend and convey him to the prison of Glasgow, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law.

The complainer presented this Bill of Suspension, and the respondent lodged answers thereto.

The reasons of suspension set forth and answers, were, inter alia, as follows, viz.:—

STAT. 5. David Cook [writer, Glasgow, the complainer's agent], before the accused was asked to plead to the charge, stated certain objections to the relevancy of the complaint, in respect that the latitude taken by the respondent as regards time and place was too great, and in consequence the complaint was irrelevant, and was vague, indefinite and ambiguous. He asked that said objections should be noted, and the record of the proceedings shews that that was done. The magistrate repelled the objections, held the complaint relevant, and allowed a proof.

Ans. 5. Admitted, under reference to the record of proceedings.

STAT. 6. The said conviction secured against the complainer is improper and inept, particularly in respect that it does not bear that he was convicted of any particular offence committed at any particular time or at any particular place, or in respect of any particular article or property. By the failure of the respondent, George Neilson, to give the complainer proper notice in said complaint of the particular offence or offences with which he was charged, with due specification of time, place and property, complainer was seriously prejudiced in preparing his defence. He is yet without knowledge of what particular offence it is that he has been convicted of, and the proceedings of the St Rollox Police Court . . . . fail to disclose the particular offence or offences with which he is charged and of which he has been convicted.

STAT. 7. For the prosecution there were several witnesses examined. From no witness except the said Robert Ralston was there elicited any information with regard to the time at which the offence or offences were committed, and he, on giving evidence on oath, deponed that the great bulk of the articles were sold to the complainer in the month of June 1907. In addition, it was proved that the said Robert Ralston and the said Arthur Hughes left the employment of Joseph Milliken referred to in the complaint on the 17th of July 1907, and that they could have no opportunity of selling articles subsequent to that date or in the month of August. They further stated that all articles stolen by them prior to leaving their employment had been disposed of by them prior to the first date mentioned in the complaint under which the complainer has been convicted. Both these witnesses further deponed as to the particular articles which they alleged were sold by them to the complainer, and stated which articles were sold in the shop and in the house of the complainer, and in the close and store referred to. They further deponed that they had informed the police as to the exact number of articles sold to the complainer on each occasion, with a specification of the place where each transaction occurred.

Ans. 6 and 7. Denied. Explained that, as is frequently the case in charges of a similar nature, the present charge contained as specific an averment of locus as the knowledge of the prosecution at the time justified the prosecution in making. The evidence adduced at the trial disclosed, and the magistrate found it proved, that two boys [had stolen the articles mentioned in the complaint and sold them to the complainer]. The magistrate was perfectly satisfied that the transactions were from beginning to end dishonest, and that the complainer had been clearly proved guilty of the crime charged. Explained that the complainer did not ask for any adjournment, nor did he lead any evidence to explain his possession of the said articles. A previous conviction of reset was proved against the complainer.

Stat. 8. Further, the record bears that one Joseph Milligan was examined as a witness. There was no such witness examined. Further, one Milliken was examined as a witness and his name is omitted from the record. Accordingly the conviction is bad and inept in respect the statutory provisions have not been complied with.

Ans. 8. Admitted that in the record of proceedings the name of the witness Joseph Milliken is spelt as Joseph Milligan. His designation otherwise is correct.

The Complainer pleaded:—

1. The said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the complainer set at liberty in respect—(1) That the complaint against him is irrelevant on the grounds stated in the objections thereto and as herein founded on; (2) that on the facts proved in evidence the charge against the complainer was not proved; and (3) that the complainer, owing to the absence of specification in the pretended complaint brought against him, was seriously prejudiced, and had no opportunity of instructing a proper defence so as to prove his innocence.

2. Separatim, the said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended in respect that it does not disclose the particular acts of which the magistrate found the accused guilty, and that the magistrate in convicting the complainer of the crime as charged, should have specified the particular place or places, the articles and the dates, in respect of which the said conviction passed.

3. The said conviction and sentence should be set aside in respect that the names of the witnesses examined are not noted in the record of proceedings as required by statute.

Argued for the Complainer: (1) The words "or elsewhere in Glasgow" in the complaint were sufficiently wide to render the complaint irrelevant on the ground of possible want of jurisdiction on the part of the magistrate who tried the case. If the complaint had stopped before these words it would have been relevant, but these words made the latitude of place libelled excessive. (2) There was in the complaint a series of alternatives, and there was a large latitude in time. The conviction was a general conviction. When alternatives of place such as were here and a large number of articles were charged, the conviction ought to be a special one. The articles as to which reset was found proved ought to be specifically set forth, and also the place or places at which it was proved to have been committed. Particularly was this so where the places mentioned in the complaint were such as to include places which might be outwith the jurisdiction of the magistrate trying the case. There was really no difference between a case with alternatives such as were here and a long list of specified articles alleged to be resetted, followed by a general conviction, and a case of alternative charges with a general conviction. The schedule which gave the form of conviction (Sched. K, No. 1, of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864) used the words ("or state to what extent he is guilty"); and those words applied to such a case as this. (3) It was essential to a conviction standing that the record of proceedings should contain a list of the witnesses who were examined (Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sect. 16, Sched. I). The record here did not contain the name of a witness who was examined, viz. Milliken. And it contained the name of a man who was not examined, viz. Milligan. The conviction ought on this ground to be quashed.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

The Court refused the Bill.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have no doubt or difficulty in holding that this bill of suspension must be refused.

To take the last objection first: one of the witnesses in the list of witnesses is slightly misnamed. The object of having the names of the witnesses recorded is that they may be ascertained. When a witness has been slightly misnamed in the list but his address and designation are correct, there can be no difficulty in ascertaining the person who is meant. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that the conviction cannot be set aside upon that ground. It would be absurd to hold otherwise. The total omission of the name of a witness from the list is quite a different matter. But a slight mistake in the name of a witness is not material, provided the person is sufficiently identified.

The complainer also objects to there being no finding by the magistrate specifying the particular places, times, and articles as to which he was found guilty. It is an entirely new idea to me that when alternatives as to time and place have been stated in a complaint, and these allegations as to time and place have been held relevant to be remitted to probation, it is necessary to have special findings in the conviction and sentence as to the particular times and places at and on which the crime has been committed. But it is said here that the prosecutor took too great a latitude. The place of the crime is stated as, inter alia, "or elsewhere in Glasgow to the prosecutor unknown." I should like to say that prosecutors ought always to avail themselves of the simpler forms of stating place and time which are authorised by the statute, which makes a great deal that is often found in complaints like this, such as this statement of "elsewhere to prosecutor unknown," quite superfluous. But as regards the latitude here taken, such latitude has been long ago decided to be legitimate in cases of reset. There are two cases in Bell's Notes which clearly shew this. In the first of these cases (M'Intosh, 4th January 1831, Bell's Notes to Hume on Crimes, p. 213) the place libelled was "within your house in King Street, Leith, or in some other part within the town or in the vicinity of Leith to the prosecutor unknown." In the second case (Wilkinson, 30th September 1835, Bell's Notes to Hume on Crimes, p. 213) the place libelled was "some place in the county of Perth to the prosecutor unknown." Such latitude is necessary in cases of reset. It is a continuing crime. The person accused may originally have got the goods honestly, but if he afterwards finds that he got them from a thief, the moment he knows this he is guilty of reset, unless he takes steps at once by informing the police to shew that he has no guilty intention with regard to the goods.

But it is said further that this is a general conviction of resetting a great number of different articles, and that the complainer has been put at a disadvantage because he did not know from the conviction which articles he has been found guilty of resetting. The magistrate was not bound to make any such finding. He pronounced a verdict of guilty as libelled. Now that means guilty of resetting all the articles or part thereof. It may sometimes be important to distinguish as to particular articles; for example, where the charge is resetting one article of great value and also other articles of comparatively small value. In such cases it might be right to limit the verdict to particular articles, and the matter should be attended to at the trial. But in the ordinary case, when there is a doubt regarding the guilt of the accused as to two or three of the articles libelled, there is no need to mention that in the conviction. A general conviction of guilty means guilty of all that is charged or of a substantial and material part thereof, and that is enough. I may add that reset is in many respects peculiar. For example, it is competent in a case of reset to prove previous convictions for the purpose of shewing guilty intention.

On the whole matter I think everything in this case was done regularly and properly, and that there is no ground for setting aside the conviction.

CAP 21), SECT. 5—CIRCUMSTANCES WHERE PROOF AS TO WIFE LIVING APART FROM HUSBAND WITH HIS CONSENT REQUIRED.

Sect. 5 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. cap. 21) enacts as follows:—

"Where a wife is deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent, a judge of the Court of Session or Sheriff Court, on petition addressed to the Court, may dispense with the husband's consent to any deed relating to her estate."

This was a petition presented by Mrs Marion May Duncan or M'Donald or M'Lennan, Maybank, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, wife of Herbert Alexander M'Lennan, wine and spirit merchant, 1 Buckingham Street there. The petitioner lived apart from her husband. She proposed to sell a bill-posting business which she had carried on for a number of years, but her husband refused to give his consent so as to enable her to grant a valid conveyance to the purchaser. In this petition she craved the Court "to dispense with the consent of the said Herbert Alexander M'Lennan to such disposition, assignations, or other deeds of transfer as may be requisite to effectually convey to a purchaser the said bill-posting business carried on by the petitioner."

The husband lodged answers in which, inter alia, he denied that he had deserted the petitioner, or that she was living apart from him with his consent, and maintained that the said section of the said Act did not apply to the circumstances of the parties to this petition.

The Lord Ordinary held that the application could not be disposed of without inquiry, and allowed a proof.

Lord Salvesen.—The petitioner in this case is the wife of the respondent, from whom she is living apart. She proposes to sell a bill-posting business, which she has been carrying on for a number of years; and she has asked her husband's consent, so as to enable her to grant a valid conveyance to the purchaser. This consent he refuses to give; and the prayer of the petition is that the Court should dispense with his consent, and so enable her to deal with her property in the same way as if she were unmarried.

The application is made in virtue of sect. 5 of The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the terms of which are quoted on page 5 of the petition. It is a condition of the petitioner succeeding under this section that she should instruct either that she has been deserted by her husband or is living apart from him with his consent, and her counsel urged me, without enquiry, to come to the conclusion that it sufficiently appeared from the pleadings that the petitioner was living apart from the respondent with his consent; and, if so, that this was obviously a proper case for the Court exercising its power of superseding the respondent's curatorial rights. On the latter point I should not have much difficulty, because I do not think it is a good reason why the husband should refuse his consent to the sale of the separate business carried on by his wife that she may thereby be enabled more readily to defeat any legal rights of succession that he might have in her estate if she predeceased. Prima facie the curatorial power of the husband ought to be exercised with a view to the wife's benefit and the protection of her estate, and not in order to protect his rights of possible succession, or, as the petitioner suggests, with a view to coercing her to make payment to him of a substantial sum of money as the price of his consent. It is admitted here that the petitioner is a clever business woman; and as she has managed this bill-posting business without her husband's interference with much success, it would seem that she may well be trusted to dispose of it on advantageous terms.

The other question, however, is primarily one of fact, and I have to consider whether there are sufficient admissions by the respondent to justify me in holding that the petitioner is living apart from him with his consent. The Dean of Faculty, for the petitioner, maintained that it was sufficient for his purpose that there were no relevant averments in the answers that the petitioner had deserted her husband; and, if so, it followed that she must be living apart from him with his consent in the sense that he acquiesced, whether reluctantly or not, in her so doing. I confess that I would gladly have reached that conclusion, because the broad facts of the case appear to be best explained on this footing. The parties were married in 1895, and since the end of 1896 they have been both resident in Glasgow; and both have had ample means to enable them to take up house together. They have been, apparently, seeing each other from time to time, and communicating on friendly terms; and yet all the time the petitioner has been living under the name of her first husband in her own house, while the respondent has been residing with his mother. On carefully considering the respondent's answers, however, I am unable to take that prima facie view of the case. He says (page 5) that in November 1896 he "again offered to take up house with her and let the marriage be known. The respondent repeatedly urged her to adopt this course and end what he regarded as an intolerable position, but she always declined." Again (p. 7) the respondent denies that the petitioner has been deserted by him; and his answer proceeds as follows: "The petitioner and respondent have all along been constantly in one another's society. Denied that she is living apart from him with his consent. Explained that, on the contrary, the respondent has all along objected to the petitioner's refusal to reside with him as husband and wife (sic), and has persistently offered to make a home for her, and urged her to live openly with him as married persons." I was at first disposed to think that the absence of any allegation that the respondent had taken a house for his wife, to which he had invited her to come, might indicate that his alleged offer was not such as she was bound to accept; but, on the other hand, it may well be that the respondent was not bound to interrupt his present mode of life, or to go to the useless expense of taking and furnishing a house if he was assured that his wife would not join him there. I have therefore, with some reluctance, come to the conclusion that I cannot dispose of this application without enquiry; although I fully realise that it might be in the interests of both parties that many of the matters which are dealt with in the petition and answers should not be made public property. —6th November 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The following narrative of the facts of the case is taken from the note of the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) appended to his interlocutor of 20th July 1905.

"This action is raised by Lord Polwarth to establish liability against the North British Railway Company and the North-Eastern Railway Company jointly, or jointly and severally, for the loss of three head of cattle destroyed at Tweedmouth Junction on their way back to Maxton, the station for Lord Polwarth's estate of Mertoun, from the Northumberland Agricultural Society's Show at Alnwick on 13th July 1904.

"The cattle were despatched from Maxton on the morning of 12th July, via Kelso, and travelled by the short route by Coldsteam and Wooler to Alnwick. They were returned on the afternoon of the 13th from Alnwick, via Alnmouth Junction, to Berwick, and thence back to Tweedmouth, with the intention of sending them from Tweedmouth, via Coldstream and Kelso, to Maxton. While standing at Tweedmouth Junction, the truck in which the cattle were caught fire, and they were destroyed.

"The cattle being prize animals, the sum of £800 is claimed as their value.

"The question raised, or intended to be raised, depends first upon the special contract made by Lord Polwarth, through his factor Mr Campbell, with the Company or Companies for the transit of the cattle; and second, upon the fact that the North-Eastern Company returned the cattle via Berwick and not via Wooler, and the effect thereof. . . .

"The admitted situation is that Maxton Station is on the North British Railway between St Boswells Junction and Kelso; that from Kelso to Sprouston is part of the North British line, but is worked by the North-Eastern, and the traffic between the two Companies is exchanged at Kelso, so that practically the North-Eastern line may be said to begin at Kelso; that from Kelso Alnwick can be reached by two routes of the North-Eastern—one, the shorter, via Coldstream and Wooler, the other, the longer, via Coldstream, Tweedmouth, and Alnmouth; that the route via Tweedmouth frequently involves the traffic being taken to Berwick and back to Tweedmouth; that besides the routes above mentioned, traffic between Maxton and Alnwick could be taken by a third, but a very roundabout route, via Duns and Reston, to Berwick, on the North British, and thence via Tweedmouth and Alnmouth, on the North-Eastern, to Alnwick.

"An arrangement exists, as was not denied, though the details of the arrangement and the precise relations of the Companies were not before me, between the North-Eastern and the North British Railway Companies (and I gather that the agreement is a general one among all railway companies in the kingdom) for the transit of cattle for bona fide show purposes to and from agricultural meetings at freight-and-a-half—i.e. freight for going and half freight for returning. But in order to obtain the benefit of such reduction of freight a somewhat elaborate system of documents requires to pass, the precise terms of which are essential to the contract between Lord Polwarth and the Railway Companies.

"In the first place, before the cattle start on the outward and return journeys respectively, declarations are required, Nos. 13 and 16 of process, to be handed to the station agents at the point of shipment for the outward and homeward journeys. These declarations are each of them headed North-Eastern Railway. What the precise relation between the North British and the North-Eastern Railway Companies in the matter is, as I have already said, not disclosed, but the terms preclude the North-Eastern from denying that the North British was at least their agent, except on the footing of denying authority and disclaiming the transaction altogether. But without detailed information there is practically no doubt, having regard to the known relations of the two lines, that, as between themselves, there exist arrangements for through traffic which cover the occasion in question.

"No. 13 of process commences with a certificate by the secretary to the Agricultural Society that the stock had been entered by Lord Polwarth for exhibition. The rest of the document is titled a certificate, but it is in reality one side of an agreement which, if stock are tendered and accepted for transit on the faith of it, becomes mutual. In consideration of the North British receiving and forwarding the stock under the conditions applicable to agricultural show traffic, Lord Polwarth, through his factor, undertook to relieve the North British Company and all other Companies over whose lines the animals might pass, from all liability for loss, etc., except upon proof that such loss, etc., arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the servants of such Companies. Endorsed upon this document are 'General Conditions of Conveyance,' which I understand to be the conditions applicable to agricultural show traffic, as none others are referred to. Of these the important articles are that the stock is conveyed—

8. To the Show at ordinary rates.
9. From the Show, if sold, at ordinary rates.
10. From the show, if unsold, at half rates back to the station whence sent.
1. The live stock can only be conveyed at the owner's risk.
6. On returning, if the animals remain unsold, the exhibitors must produce a certificate of the fact, issued by the secretary of the society, and signed by the exhibitor, in order to be entitled to the privilege of having the stock charged at half rates.
7. In order to secure the return of the live stock at half rates if unsold, the exhibitors must in every case take care to consign them on the return journey by the same route as they were sent to the meeting, otherwise full rates will be charged.

"On delivery of this document to the station agent at Maxton, on 12th July 1904, the usual owner's risk consignment note was prepared by the agent and signed by W. Henderson, the man in charge of the cattle, whose authority from Lord Polwarth was not disputed. It bore simply that the cattle were consigned from Maxton to Alnwick, via Kelso, which left it in the Company's option to send them on from Kelso, via Wooler or via Tweedmouth, although it must, I think, be conceded that it was the understanding of both parties that the cattle would travel via Wooler, not only as the shorter and more convenient route, but also that which consisted with the hour at which the cattle were delivered, and the times of the trains running, and prior arrangement to this effect may, for aught that appears, be proved.

"What Henderson signed was a request that the cattle 'be carried at the special or reduced rate, in consideration whereof he agreed to relieve the North British Company and all other Companies over whose lines the stock might pass from all liability for loss, etc., except upon proof that such loss, etc., arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the Company's servants.'

"It was pleaded that the only contract made with the North British Company was a contract for the carriage of the stock from Maxton to Alnwick, as Lord Polwarth came under no obligation for a return journey. I do not think that this contention is tenable. I think that the North British Railway Company contracted on behalf of itself and the North-Eastern Company absolutely for the carriage of the stock to Alnwick and conditionally for the carriage of the stock from Alnwick back to Maxton, and that, on the condition being purified by the stock being tendered at Alnwick in the circumstances required by the general conditions of conveyance, the contract in both its heads became absolute, and I think that this composite contract, absolute and conditional, was binding on the North-Eastern, unless it could plead, which it does not do, want of authority on the part of the North British Company.

"On the return journey, the document No. 16 of process, also signed by Mr Campbell, Lord Polwarth's factor, was handed to the station agent at Alnwick, similar in terms with the document No. 13 of process, and having the same general conditions of conveyance endorsed, except that it bore the word 'returned' as part of the heading 'agricultural show traffic,' and 'from the Show' instead of 'to the Show,' and also bore a certificate by the Agricultural Society's secretary that the stock had been exhibited, instead of had been entered for exhibition, and was addressed, not to the North British, but to the North-Eastern and North British Companies. But then the document No. 16 of process was supplemented by the document No. 15, signed by Henderson, the man in charge, and, admittedly, representing Lord Polwarth. This bore a declaration, first of all, that the stock had been exhibited and had not been sold, and was still the bona fide property of the exhibitor; and, in the second place, a request which, on the stock being accepted for carriage, completed a mutual agreement in terms very similar to that which is embodied in the North British consignment note No. 12. In fact, No. 15, with the North-Eastern consignment note, No. 14, are the North-Eastern's counterpart of the North British consignment note, No. 12.

"But though the terms are very similar generally, and have the same object, viz., to relieve the railway companies from loss, except for wilful misconduct on the part of their servants, and the contract is to be deemed to be made separately with all Companies parties to any through rate under which the stock is carried, there is this important difference that the consignment is expressly for carriage back to the station "named" in the schedule endorsed, which station is Maxton, North British "(from which station such animals or goods were consigned here for the above-mentioned Show), by the same route as on the journey here at the reduced rate below your ordinary rate; and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate,' etc. The italics are the Company's. Neither in this nor in the consignment note No. 14 is any route otherwise mentioned, but merely the station of destination, viz. Maxton."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:—

"1. The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusion of the summons.

"3. The defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, in respect that the animals were at the time of the fire being carried under an owner's risk special contract.

"6. No declaration having been made by or on behalf of the pursuer in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, sect. 7, the defenders are not in any event liable in excess of £15 for each animal."

The sections of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. cap. 31) are sufficiently set forth in the judgment of Lord Low.

On 20th July 1905 the Lord Ordinary continued the cause to allow the pursuer an opportunity of lodging a minute of amendment of his record.

He added the following note:—

Lord Johnston [after the narrative above quoted].—It is maintained in the first place for the defenders that their liability is, in any event, limited to £15 per animal, in respect that no declaration of an excess value was made on behalf of Lord Polwarth in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, sect. 7; and in the second place, that the stock was, at the time of the fire, being carried under an owner's risk special contract, which exempted them from liability, in respect that no wilful misconduct on the part of their servants was alleged.

Lord Polwarth's answer is that, assuming that both or either of these defences might, under other circumstances, have been available to the defenders, they cannot in the actual circumstances be pleaded, in respect that the Companies had broken their contract with him by diverting the traffic round by Berwick and Tweedmouth, instead of sending it back by the route by which it came.

This answer requires, first, a consideration of the contract, and, second, of certain English authorities bearing upon the point.

I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is not open to the Railway Company to plead that the condition endorsed on the documents Nos. 13 and 16, to the effect that the traffic must be consigned on the return journey by the same route as that by which they were sent, is one entirely in their favour, and which may be waived by them if they find it convenient (Bidoulac, 1889, 17 R. 144). I do not need to determine, absolutely, whether this might or might not have been so on the documents Nos. 13 and 16 of process, for the matter does not rest on these documents alone; it rests also on the document No. 15 of process, which having been accepted and the cattle delivered for carriage on the faith of it, becomes a mutual contract for the return journey "by the same route as on the journey here."

But the Railway Companies maintain further that the word "route" is elastic, and that they were not confined to transmitting the stock by the same line of rails by which it had come, but were entitled to return it by any combination of their lines, for though they did not put their argument precisely in these words, I cannot find any other which accurately defines it. I think they limit their contention to this, that so long as they send back by Kelso, it is open to them to send either by Wooler or Tweedmouth. But it appears to me that if their contention is good at all, it would warrant their returning the traffic by Reston and St Boswells, or by any other possible route on their combined systems—say Edinburgh and St Boswells. I cannot hold that the word "route" has this extended meaning, even with the limitation which the Company indicates. I think that "route," particularly in the phrase "the same route," as "on the journey here," imports a definite line within the system of a company, or within the combined system of two companies, and not merely the system or systems of one or both as a whole. I do not suggest that this view could be pressed to the extreme point, as for instance to involve a breach of contract if traffic which was taken through Carstairs station were returned by the Carstairs loop line without entering the station; but without pressing the argument to such an extreme, I cannot hold that the route from Alnwick, by Alnmouth and Tweedmouth or Berwick, was not an entirely different route from that by Wooler, and one to which pursuer might reasonably have objected had it been proposed to him as sufficient implement of the Company's contract.

I think it is not unfair to test this point by putting the converse proposition. Suppose at Alnwick the pursuer for his own advantage or convenience had booked his cattle back to Maxton via Tweedmouth or Berwick, could he have had any answer to the Company's demand for full freight on the return journey? In my opinion he would not.

But I am bound, in the second place, to consider the English authorities founded upon, as they appear to bear very closely on the question.

I do not think that the case of Great Western Railway Company v. M'Carthey, 1887, L.R. 12, App. C. 218, goes further than to determine that the clause in the owner's risk contract note of both the companies concerned imported quite a legal condition exempting from liability under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, sect. 7, provided a proper alternative was given, and in the present case no question is apparently raised on this score, but the three cases (Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway Company 1876, L.R., 1 Q.B.D. 302; Mallett v. Great Eastern Railway Company, [1899], 1 Q.B. 309; and Foster v. Great Western Railway Company, [1904], 2 K.B. 306) are more apposite, and the latter was founded upon as the ruling case and as deciding the present question in favour of the railway companies.

I pass over Morritt's case, as it may be referred to the same principle as Foster's case.

The real question is between Mallet's case and Foster's case, and whether Mallett's case is a sound judgment and applicable to the present, or is substantially overruled by Foster's. In Mallet's case the contract was to carry from Lowestoft to Jersey via London, the Great Western Railway, and Plymouth, whereas the receiving company transmitted goods from London via the London and South-Western Railway and Southampton. This was done by mistake of their servants, who misread the direction, which was not very distinctly written. There was delay in the transmission and consequent loss. It was held that the delay was delay in the performance of the contract and arose in consequence of the defenders doing something which was wholly at variance with the contract.

But in Foster's case the circumstances were different. The goods were being carried also to Jersey, and they ought to have been transmitted from Exeter via London and South-Western to Southampton. But they were accidentally carried past Exeter, and when the mistake was discovered, it was too late to send them back to Exeter to catch the Southampton boat, and the Railway Company did what was best in the circumstances by sending them via Weymouth, which was a totally different route from that by which they had undertaken to carry them. The decision was that the breach of their contract was at Exeter, but that it was occasioned by their servants' negligence but not wilful misconduct, and that they were therefore protected by the relieving clause in their contract, that after Exeter they were no longer obliged to have recourse to that clause, because they were no longer carrying under the contract, but as baillees of the goods were doing their best in the circumstances. And the case was carefully distinguished from that of Mallet. It is quite true that in the opinions of the judges who gave judgment in the case, and particularly of Lord Alverstone, there is an undercurrent of dissatisfaction with the case of Mallet, but it goes no further. It may be that it is justified, if it be held that in Mallet's case at London a similar mistake was made to that made in Foster's case at Exeter; but even if this be so, neither Foster's case nor Mallet's case, assuming it to be corrected by the judgment in Foster's, is like the present. Here there was no mistake in transit. There was a deliberate diversion of the route from the beginning, and I do not think that the doubts indicated in Foster's case strike at the grounds of judgment in Mallet's case, but merely their application in the circumstances. But whether these grounds of judgment properly applied in Mallet's case or not, they apply, in my opinion, here, and I cannot hold them displaced by Foster's case.

I speak of the above cases with the respect due to them as decisions pronounced by the English Courts in pari materia though not binding on me, but I should myself have adopted the ground of judgment in Mallet's case in the circumstances of the present.

On the documents, therefore, upon which the case must ultimately depend, and on which it was argued by the pursuer, I should be prepared to hold that he might have a good case to recover untrammelled by the owner's risk contract, embodied in the special agreement for carriage to and from the Show. But then the documents are not his record, but are only embodied in it and that insufficiently by reference. And while Mr Mackintosh presented a very able argument on the documents and authorities, he failed, to my mind, to connect them with his record. [His Lordship criticised the pursuer's record, coming to the conclusion that his averments were irrelevant.] —20th July 1905.

The pursuer having lodged a Minute of Amendment, the Lord Ordinary on 25th November 1905 repelled the first, third, and sixth pleas in law for the defenders and allowed the parties a proof of their averments as to, inter alia, the value of the cattle.

He added the following note:—

2nd Div.

Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co. and Others.

Lord Johnston.—The record in this case has been amended in terms of my interlocutor of 27th October, and the defenders admitted at the bar that the pursuer had complied with the requirements of the opinion expressed by me on 19th July, and stated that they did not propose to raise further the question of relevancy. But they contended that, though it might be implied from the form of my opinion that the question raised in their sixth plea in law had been disposed of, that was not really the case. That plea in law, the sixth, is to the effect that "no declaration having been made by or on behalf of the pursuer in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, sect. 7, the defenders are not in any event liable in excess of £15 for each animal."

It is true that I did not expressly consider or dispose of that plea, though I stated that the point raised was the first point maintained for the defenders. My recollection is, however, that I thought it unnecessary to deal with it separately and considered it covered by the opinion which I expressed with reference to what was maintained in the second place in support of the defenders' third plea in law, which was that "the defenders should be assoilized from the conclusions of the action, in respect that the animals were at the time of the fire being carried under an 'owner's risk' special contract."

The defenders having asked to be re-heard on their sixth plea in law, I have now heard a full argument, and have reconsidered the question with the result that I shall now repel the plea.

Prior to the passing of the Carriers Act 1830 (11 George IV. and 1 William IV., cap. 68), common carriers were practically in the position of guaranteeing the safe delivery of goods which they accepted for carriage, and all goods which they accepted for carriage for one person they were bound to carry for all the lieges. The law, however, allowed them to relieve themselves, by notice published with the intent to limit such heavy responsibility. But in respect of the practice of persons tendering for carriage parcels the value of which was grossly disproportionate to the bulk, without notifying to the carrier the value and nature of the contents, and of the difficulty of fixing parties with knowledge of such limiting notices, the Legislature thought fit, by sect. 1 of the above Act of 1830, to enact that no common carrier by land for hire should "be liable for the loss of or injury to any article or articles or property of the descriptions following" (and there followed an emuneration of bullion, gold and silver plate, jewellery, bank notes, paintings, china, silks, furs, lace, and other articles of similar nature, of value disproportionate to bulk), contained in any parcel or package delivered for carriage "when the value of such article or articles or property aforesaid, contained in such parcel or package, shall exceed the sum of £10, unless at the time of the delivery thereof . . . . the value and nature of such article or articles or property shall have been declared by the person or persons sending or delivering the same, and such increased charge as herinafter mentioned, or an engagement to pay the same be accepted by the person receiving such parcel or package." By this provision, therefore, the carrier was entirely relieved for the loss of or injury to any such article, unless it was declared, and what was practically a premium of insurance paid.

But when railways and canals came practically to supersede the common carriers of 1830, while the Act of 1830 still continued to regulate the carrier's liability where it applied, a further limitation was found necessary, and was introduced by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, sect. 7, but the relief given was not absolute, but qualified and limited. That section provided that every Railway and Canal Company "shall be liable for the loss of or any injury done to any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any articles, goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, and delivering thereof, occasioned by the fault or neglect of such Company, or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such Company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability, every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void," subject to the following provisos:—1st, "that nothing in the Act contained should be construed to prevent the Companies making such conditions with respect to the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of any of the said animals, articles, etc., as should be adjudged by the Court to be just and reasonable"; and 2nd, "that no greater damages shall be recovered for the loss of or for any injury done to any of such animals beyond the sums hereinafter mentioned (that is to say) . . . . for any neat cattle, per head £15," unless the sender should at the time of delivery declare them to be of higher value, in which case it should be lawful for the Company to demand and receive a reasonable percentage upon the excess value to be paid in addition to the ordinary rate of freight.

2nd Div.

Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co. and Others.

It was maintained that this provision limited the defenders' liability for the loss of the pursuer's cattle to the sum of £15 per head, in respect that he had not declared them to be of higher value and paid the consequent increased freight. But I think that the grounds on which I have already disposed of the defenders' third plea in law apply to the plea founded upon this provision, and warrant my rejecting it. I think that it is an implied condition of the Railway Company taking benefit by the limitation of liability provided, that they shall carry on the contract on which the cattle were delivered.

I have again considered the English authorities to which I was referred at the first debate, and certain further authorities which were quoted, but I have not changed my view of their bearing.

The former authorities quoted were Morrit v. North Eastern Railway, 1876, L.R. 1 Q.B.D. 302; Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway [1899], 1 Q.B. 309; and Foster v. Great Western Railway Company [1904], 2 K.B. 306. I am prepared on further perusal to admit that Mallet's case was wrongly decided, and that it was in reality not distinguished, but disapproved by the Court of King's Bench in Foster's case. But that does not alter my view of the bearing of the two other cases. They determine that a mistake, even negligently made, by a railway company in the course of executing the contract of carriage, which resulted in goods being diverted from the route by which they were contracted to be carried, did not deprive the Companies in the one case of the benefit of the provision of sect. 1 of the Carriers Act 1830, and in the other case of the benefit of a special condition just and reasonable, and therefore permissible to be made, under sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854. But they leave open the question what is to happen when the mistake or the neglect or the default occurs, not in course of executing the contract, but where the contract is never even commenced to be executed.

The distinction between these cases and certain others to which I will immediately refer was, I think, correctly noted by Lord Blackburn, then Mr Justice Blackburn, when he says in Morritt's case at 1 Q.B.D., page 304, "in each of these (that is, the latter cases) there was an intentional act on the part of the defendants in sending on or misdelivering the goods; here there was only negligence."

The new cases to which I have been referred are Sleat v. Fagg, 1822, 5 Barn. and Ald. 342 and 24 R.R. 407, and Garnet v. Willan, 1822, 5 Barn. and Ald. 53 and 24 R.R. 276, in both of which carriers were held responsible for loss notwithstanding notice equivalent to the provisions of the Carriers Act 1830, brought home to the knowledge of their customer, because they were not carrying under their contract but outwith their contract, and these decisions seem to me to support the view which I have already expressed. I was also referred to Hearn v. L. & S.-W. Railway, 1855, 24 L.J. Ex. 180; Millen v. Brasch, 1882, L.R., 10 Q.B.D. 142; and Handon v. Caledonian Railway Company, 1880, 7 R. 966. The first two are illustrative of the general question; the latter, like the cases of Sleat and Garnet, is more directly in line with the present.

In fact, I remain of the opinion which I formerly held that the question at issue in the case depends upon whether Lord Polwarth's cattle were returned "by the same route as on the journey" out. I have already expressed my reason for the opinion that they were not so returned. If so, they were not carried on the contract, but contrary to the contract of carriage . . . .—25*th November* 1905.

The parties having lodged a Minute of Admissions, whereby they, inter alia, admitted that the value of the cattle was £550, the Lord Ordinary, on 27th February 1907, decerned against the defenders for the agreed on sum of £550.

He added the following note:—

Lord Johnston [after discussing questions not now reported].—But the case has been taken throughout on the footing that the pursuer founded entirely on breach of contract, and though I think that their record might have deduced this more pointedly, I think that it is their real case on record. If so, then the contract was broken, the cattle were not carried on it, but in contravention of it. It was no mere negligence or fault of the defenders' employees diverting the cattle in transit. They never were carried on the contract at all, and this was done intentionally. Whether for the defenders' convenience, or whether it was assumed that the pursuer would thereby get better expedition, does not appear to me to affect the question. Under their contract the defenders, whether they were common carriers or carrying on a special contract, were bound to deliver the cattle at Maxton, and they could not do so. They cannot therefore plead any of the conditions of the contract to excuse their breach. Nor can they so plead the statutory limitation of liability, for the statute subsumes a contract of carriage, and that the carriage proceeds under that contract. I cannot distinguish from Handon v. Caledonian Railway Company, 1880, 7 R. 966, in Scotland, and from Sleat v. Fagg, 1822, 5 B. & A. 342; Lilley v. Doubleday, 1881, L.R. 7 Q.B.D. 510, and Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon, 1886, L.R. 12 A.C. 11, in England. The damage then is the value of the cattle. "The question is whether the defendant was responsible for the goods, and if so the damage must be their value," per Lindley, J., in Lilley v. Doubleday, supra (and cf. Ellis v. Turner, 1800, 8 T.R. 531), unless indeed the damage was too remote. But this I cannot hold in face of the English cases of Davis v. Garett, 1830, 6 Bing. 716; Scaramanga v. Stamp, 1880, L.R. 5 C.P.D. 295, to which I was referred. I do not think that even a damnum fatale would have excused the defenders, but the defenders do not attempt to show that the accident was occasioned by the agency of nature, and could not reasonably have been avoided (Nugent v. Smith, 1876, L.R. 1 C.P.D. 423).

I shall therefore decern against the defenders for the agreed-on sum of £550 with expenses. I do not think that there should be any modification in respect of the amendment of record, for if the defenders did not add to their statement in defence, they brought forward for the first time the important plea last disposed of, and occasioned the third hearing.—22*nd February* 1907.

The Defenders reclaimed and argued: (1) No doubt the contract for the return of the cattle provided that they should be sent back by the route by which they had come to Alnwick. But in the original contract that route was defined as via Kelso. Here the cattle were being sent back via Kelso, and there was thus no breach of contract. Further, the stipulation as to the route was a stipulation wholly in favour of the defenders, on which the pursuer was not entitled to found (Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trs., 1889, 17 R. 144). (2) Apart from this, the cattle were carried at owner's risk, and there was no averment of misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants. This exemption would not avail the defenders if the cattle were in their hands dehors the contract. But here the defenders were engaged in sending the cattle back to Maxton, and were thus in course of executing the contract. They were therefore protected by the exemption clause (Morrit v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 1876, L.R. 1 Q.B.D. 302; Foster v. Great Western Railway Co. [1904], 2 K.B. 306; Scaramanga v. Stamp, 1880, L.R. 5 C.P.D. 295). Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Co. [1899], 1 Q.B. 309 was inconsistent with Foster (cit.) and was wrong. (3) In any event the defenders were only liable to the extent of £15 per head. The limitation in sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act applied to every case of goods being lost when in the Company's hands as carriers (Morrit v. North-Eastern Railway Company, cit., Foster v. Great Western Railway Company, cit.), whether the loss was due to breach of contract or to tort (Great Western Railway Company v. M'Carthy, 1887, L.R. 12 A.C. 218; Hodgman v. West Midland Railway Company, 1865, 35 L.J. Q.B. 85; Hill v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 1880, 42 L.T. 513). This conclusion was supported by the cases on the analogous provisions of the Carriers Act 1830 (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. cap. 68), sect. 1; Hinton v. Dibdin, 1842, 2 A. and E. Q.B. 646; Baxendale v. Harp, 1852, 21 L.J. Ex. 123; and of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. cap. 104), sect. 514; London and South-Western Railway Company v. James, 1872, L.R. 8 Ch. 241; Wahlberg v. Young, 1876, 4 Asp. Mar. Cas. 27). The cases relied on by the pursuer were distinguishable. Sleat v. Fagg, 1822, 5 B. and A. 342, and Garnett v. Willan, 1821, 5 B. and A. 53 were cases on the old law of carriers prior to the Carriers Act. Hearn v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 1855, 10 Ex. 793, was doubted in Millen v. Brasch (1882, L.R. 10 Q.B.D. 142).

Argued for the Pursuer: The contract provided that the cattle should be sent back by the route by which they had come. They had in fact been sent back by a different route. The defenders had never sent the cattle on the contract journey. Therefore they had dealt with the cattle dehors the contract and were bound to make good the loss (Justinian's Institutes, III. 14. 2; Ersk., III. 1, 22; Jones on Bailments, p. 68). The pursuer was entitled to found on this stipulation. It was important to him that the cattle should return by a route the risks of which he knew. Bidoulac v. Sinclair's Trs. (cit.) was not in point. It only decided that a defaulter could not found on his own default. Neither the owner's risk clause in the contract nor the limitation of liability contained in sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act would avail the defenders. These applied where mistakes had been made in the course of performing the contract (Morrit v. North Eastern Railway Company, cit.; Foster v. Great Western Railway Company, cit.; Great Western Railway Company v. M'Carthy, cit.; Baxendale v. Harp, cit.; Hodgman v. West Midland Railway Company, cit.; London and South-Western Railway Company v. James, cit.), and did not apply where goods had been dealt with dehors the contract (Davis v. Garrett, 1830, 6 Bing. 716; Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon, 1886, L.R. 12 A.C. 11; Scaramanga v. Stamp, cit.; Ellis v. Turner, 1800, 8 Term Rep. 531; Garnett v. Willan, cit.; Sleat v. Fagg, cit.; Lilley v. Doubleday, 1881, L.R. 7 Q.B.D. 510; Handon v. Caledonian Railway Company, 1880, 7 R. 966; Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company, cit.). In the present case the cattle had been intentionally sent on a journey which was not the contract journey, and had thus been dealt with dehors the contract. The case was substantially the same as if the defenders had retained the cattle in their hand in order to satisfy a debt due to them by the pursuer, and had sent them to the south of England for sale.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and decerned against the defenders for the sum of £45, with interest, from the date of citation.

Lord Low.—The instructions which the pursuer gave to the defenders to convey his cattle from Maxton to the agricultural show at Alnwick were to convey them via Kelso. These instructions were indefinite to this extent that, beyond Kelso there were two routes, one by Wooler and the other by Tweedmouth, both upon the defenders' system, by either of which the cattle might have been sent to Alnwick, and between which there was little difference either as regarded distances or convenience. It was stated by the pursuer's counsel that the intention was that the cattle should be sent by the Wooler route, because it was arranged that the cattle truck should be taken from Maxton by a train which ran in connection with a Wooler train. If that had been admitted or proved, it might have been sufficient to show that "via Kelso" meant in this particular case via Kelso and Wooler, but there is neither admission nor evidence on the point. All that we know is that the cattle were consigned to Alnwick via Kelso, and if that was all that the defenders were requested and agreed to do, I am inclined to think (although in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to decide the point) that it was open to them to take the cattle via Tweedmouth.

Lord Low.

The cattle were, in fact, conveyed by the Wooler route. They were safely delivered at Alnwick, and no question arises in regard to the journey thither.

At the close of the Show the cattle, not having been sold, required to be returned to Maxton. The defenders give special terms to persons sending live stock to agricultural shows upon certain conditions. They, inter alia, charge only half rates for the return journey of stock which is not sold, but only upon the condition that "the exhibitor must in every case take care to consign them on the return journey by the same route as they were sent to the meeting, otherwise full rates will be charged."

The pursuer was naturally desirous to have his cattle returned at half rates, and accordingly his servant, who had charge of the cattle, filled up and signed the form supplied by the defenders of a special contract for the return of unsold cattle from a show at half rates. The document runs thus:—"You are requested by the undersigned to receive the cattle in question for carriage back" to Maxton, "by the same route as on the journey here, at the reduced rate below your ordinary rate; and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate for the carriage thereof, the undersigned hereby undertakes to free and relieve you" of all liability for loss or damage unless caused by wilful misconduct on the part of the Company's servants.

Although these were the terms of the contract for the return journey, the defenders did not send the cattle via Wooler, but via Tweedmouth. During the journey the truck in which the cattle were being conveyed took fire, to the effects of which they all ultimately succumbed. The question to be determined in this case is whether the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuer for the loss which he has sustained, and, if so, what is the measure of their liability?

The defenders maintain: (1) that they are not liable to any extent in respect that by the contract the pursuer relieved them of all liability for loss, unless the loss was occasioned by the wilful misconduct of their servants, which is not alleged; and (2) that in any view they were not liable in a larger amount than £15 for each animal in terms of the seventh section of the Railway and Canals Traffic Act 1854.

In support of their contention that they are liable to no extent the defenders argued in the first place that the words in the contract "by the same route as on the journey here" meant the route by which the cattle were consigned when sent to the Show—namely, via Kelso, and that as they (the defenders) had the option of taking the cattle either by Wooler or Tweedmouth on the outward journey, they had the same option on the return journey. I am of opinion that that argument is not well founded. The words in the contract for the return journey which I have quoted seem to me, according to their natural and ordinary signification, to mean the route by which the journey to Alnwick was as matter of fact made, and I do not think that it is competent to read them as meaning something else, by reference to a prior and entirely separate contract.

The defenders further argued that the stipulation in regard to the route was inserted solely for their benefit, because they only agreed to carry the cattle at half rates on the return journey upon the condition that the pursuer should consent to the cattle being sent back by the same route as that by which they had come. The stipulation therefore (the defenders argued), although binding upon the pursuer, was not binding on them, and that, so long as they only charged half rates as for the Wooler route, they could send the cattle by another route, if they found it more convenient to do so.

Here, again, I am unable to accept the defenders' argument. If the argument be sound, the defenders were entitled to convey the cattle by any route they chose, and would not be bound to consider whether it was equally convenient and safe for the pursuer as the specified route. To say that the defenders had such power seems to me to be out of the question, seeing that the pursuer had agreed that the cattle should be conveyed at his risk. No doubt he took the risk in consideration of the reduced rate which was charged for the carriage, but he also took the risk for the route which was specified, and for no other.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders were in breach of their contract in taking the cattle by Tweedmouth, and that they cannot found upon the indemnity clause in the contract.

The question remains whether the defenders' liability is limited in amount by the Railway and Canals Traffic Act 1854? The Lord Ordinary has answered that question in the negative, holding that the Act applies only where a railway company is carrying cattle under a contract, and that in this case the route adopted by the defenders having from its commencement been a different route from that specified, they were altogether outside of their contract. Whether that view be sound or not appears to me to depend upon the construction of the statute.

By the first section it is enacted that every railway company shall "afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic"; and traffic is defined as including animals. A railway company therefore is bound to carry cattle.

By the seventh section it is enacted that every railway company "shall be liable for the loss of or for any injury done to any horses, cattle, or other animals . . . . in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants. . . . Provided always that no greater damages shall be recovered for the loss of or for injury done to any of such animals beyond the sums hereinafter mentioned (that is to say) . . . . for any neat cattle per head fifteen pounds," unless the person sending the animals shall have declared them to be of a higher value, in which case the company is authorised to demand a reasonable percentage upon the excess of value so declared.

In this case the pursuer made no declaration of value, and, accordingly, if the statute applies, he cannot recover from the defenders more than £15 for each of the cattle.

What, therefore, the railway company is by the statute made liable for, is the loss of, or injury to, cattle, "in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof." Now, unquestionably, the defenders received the cattle from the pursuer's servant for the purpose of forwarding them to Maxton, and they were, in fact, forwarding them to Maxton when the fire occurred. Prima facie, therefore, the Act applies. But it was said that the defenders cannot be regarded as having been acting as carriers for the pursuer at all, because they intentionally and deliberately adopted a route which was wholly different from that by which, alone, the pursuer had agreed that the cattle should be conveyed.

The force of that argument lies in the fact that the defenders intentionally adopted a different route from that stipulated, and that fact differentiates this case from those in which the contract has been departed from by mere mistake or carelessness, as, for example, when goods have been despatched upon the contract route, but have afterwards been negligently shunted on to the wrong line, or put into the wrong train at a junction, or where goods have been carried on beyond the station at which they ought to have been delivered. It seems to me, however, that the fact that there has been intentional departure from the contract route does not of itself solve the question. Suppose that cattle were being sent to an agricultural show, or to be sold at a market to be held on a particular day, and that after they had been carried a certain distance along the contract route it was found that the line ahead was blocked,—I cannot doubt that railway officials could send the cattle on by another route by which they could arrive at their destination in time for the show or market, without losing the benefit of the statute in the event of the cattle being killed or injured after they had been diverted from the contract route.

In this case we do not know the reasons which led the defenders to send the cattle via Tweedmouth, because there is neither admission nor evidence upon the point, and probation has been renounced. It is not averred, however, that there was anything of the nature of wilful misconduct, in the ordinary sense of these words, on the defenders' part, or that they took the cattle via Tweedmouth for any other purpose than to deliver them to the pursuer at Maxton. The Dean of Faculty gave an illustration, intended to enforce his argument, that the defenders, having intentionally departed from the contract, could not found upon the statute. The case which he supposed was that the pursuer had been in debt to the defenders, and that they had resolved to hold the cattle against the debt, and for that purpose had carried them off to York. I agree that, in that case, the statute would not have applied, because the defenders would not have been engaged as carriers in receiving, forwarding, or delivering the cattle. In the case which happened, however, they were acting as carriers and in no other capacity. When the accident occurred they were carrying the pursuer's cattle to the appointed destination, and there was nothing in the nature of appropriation of the cattle to their own use, or of handing them over to another carrier, or of sending them to the wrong destination, or the wrong person. It therefore appears to me that the defenders did not, by their breach of contract, put themselves outside of the statute, and I am confirmed in that view by the highly authoritative judgment which was given in regard to a similar question under the Carriers Act in Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 1876, L.R. 1 Q.B. Div. 302.

I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to recover more than £45, being the statutory maximum amount allowed when no declaration of value is made.

188. The Walker Steam Fishing Company Limited.

Company — Capital — Reduction — Confirmation by Court—Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. cap. 131), sect. 9, and Companies Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. cap. 26), sect. 3—Alternative Resolutions for Reduction or Conversion of Capital—Terms of Resolution Not Confirmed by Court in Respect It Was Doubtful Whether Resolution Was Truly a Resolution to Reduce Capital—Resolution Providing for "Conversion" or "Re-allocation" of Capital—Terms of Alternative Resolution Confirmed by Court.

Petition for Confirmation of Reduction of Capital.

This was a petition for confirmation of a resolution to reduce capital presented by the Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Co. Ltd.

The petition stated:

The Company was established to purchase and acquire from Thomas Walker, trawl owner in Aberdeen, two steam trawlers known as "Star of Peace" and "Star of the East," together with their furnished appurtenances and apparelling, to adopt and carry into effect a provisional contract entered into between the said Thomas Walker and Andrew Walker, Commercial Road, Aberdeen, for behoof of the Company, providing for the Company taking over at the price of £5400 each (being the cost price), a contract for the building of these steam trawlers, and to carry on the business of fishing by trawl, lines, nets or otherwise from the port of Aberdeen, or any other port or ports as might be thought expedient.

Clause Fifth of the Memorandum of Association is in the following terms:—"The capital of the Company is £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with power to increase or reduce the capital in conformity with the law in force at the time and with this Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, as originally framed or as duly and competently altered, and to attach to any additional capital such preferential, deferred or special rights, privileges, or conditions as the Company may determine."

By Clause 52 of the Articles of Association it is provided that "The Company may by a special resolution reduce its capital by reducing the number or the value or both the number and the value of the shares into which it is divided, and may consolidate or subdivide its shares, and may cancel any shares that have not been taken or agreed to be taken by any person in the manner and with all or any of the incidents prescribed by the statute"; and by Clause 148, that "If the Company shall be wound up, the surplus assets shall belong to the holders of the shares in proportion to the amount paid up or deemed to be paid up thereon, but this Article shall be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of any shares to be issued on special terms."

The whole of the original share capital was issued as ordinary shares, and 12s. 6d. has been paid up on each share. Since its incorporation the Company has been uniformly prosperous. For the first two years the dividends were at the rate of 7½ and 5 per cent. respectively on the subscribed capital, and during the last three years uniform dividends at the rate of 10 per cent. have been declared and paid, and that after ample allowance has been made for depreciation on the Company's property. The Company finds that the capital subscribed is as much as it can profitably make use of for many years to come, and its financial position is such that there is no necessity for retaining the liability of 7s. 6d. attaching to each share, which liability has the effect of unduly depressing the selling value of the Company's shares. The Company desires, however, to retain the denomination of its shares at £1 sterling each, which is the reason for resolutions numbers one and two, and for the first minute hereinafter specified.

Accordingly an extraordinary general meeting of the Company was held in Aberdeen on 27th April 1907, at which the following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

(1) That the capital of the Company be converted from 50,000 shares of the value of £1 each, whereof 12s. 6d. has been paid upon each share, a total of £31,250, into 50,000 shares also of the value of £1 each, upon 31,250 of which the full amount shall have been paid up, leaving 18,750 shares to be issued at the discretion of the directors for the time being, and that such conversion be effected by re-allocating the share capital among the shareholders, crediting to each shareholder one £1 share in respect of every pound sterling with which he or she is credited in the share capital account of the Company.

(2) That in order to carry out the re-allocation of the share capital among the shareholders, the directors of the Company be authorised to receive from Mr Andrew Walker, Commercial Road, Aberdeen, such amount as may be required to pay the shareholders any fraction of a pound sterling with which they may be credited in the share capital account of the Company, and that the said Andrew Walker receives the resultant remaining shares at par value equivalent to the amount so paid by him;

alternatively,

(3) That the capital of the Company be reduced from £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, on which 12s. 6d. each has been called and paid up, to £31,250, divided into 50,000 shares of 12s. 6d. each fully paid, and that such reduction be effected by extinguishing the liability in respect of uncalled capital on the said shares to the extent of 7s. 6d. per share.

At an extraordinary general meeting held on 13th

May 1907, these resolutions were unanimously confirmed as special resolutions of the Company.

The Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. cap. 131), sect. 9, provides:

Any company limited by shares may, by special resolution, so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum of association, if authorised so to do by its regulations as originally framed or as altered by special resolution, as to reduce its capital; but no such resolution for reducing the capital of any company shall come into operation until an order of the Court is registered by the registrar of joint stock companies as is hereinafter mentioned.

The Companies Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. cap. 26), sect. 3, provides:

The word "capital," as used in the Companies Act 1867, shall include paid-up capital; and the power to reduce capital conferred by that Act shall include a power to cancel any lost capital, or any capital unrepresented by available assets, or to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company; and paid-up capital may be reduced either with or without extinguishing or reducing the liability (if any) remaining on the shares of the company; and to the extent to which such liability is not extinguished or reduced it shall be deemed to be preserved, notwithstanding anything contained in the Companies Act 1867.

On 19th July 1907 the Court remitted to Mr W. G. L. Winchester, W.S., to enquire and report whether the power prayed for should be granted.

The reporter reported, inter alia, as follows:

The conclusion I have formed is that the first resolution printed in this petition cannot be confirmed by the Court as "a reduction of capital" under either the Act of 1867 or that of 1877. The resolution in question purports to be "a conversion" or "re-allocation" of the share capital, and I do not think it can in any sense be held to be "a reduction of capital" within the meaning of the Acts founded on by the petitioners.

The second or alternative resolution clearly imports a reduction of capital, and is authorised by the regulations of the Company as originally framed, and is competent under sects. 9 to 19 of the Act of 1867. The petitioners ask for confirmation of one or other of the special resolutions, and I beg respectfully to suggest that, should your Lordships hold the first resolution to be incompetent, the second or alternative resolution may be confirmed.

Argued for the Petitioners: The first resolution was a resolution for the reduction of capital. It was therefore competent to the Court to confirm it, and it ought to be confirmed (Companies Act 1867, sect. 9; Companies Act 1877, sect. 3; Phœbe Coal Co. [1900], W.N. 182). In any event the alternative resolution ought to be confirmed.

The Court confirmed the reduction of capital resolved on by the alternative resolution.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—In this case we have the benefit of a very careful report by Mr Winchester, and we have also had the advantage of a fair and candid statement by Mr Morton. He says that the shareholders would prefer to have the first alternative resolution confirmed. But the reporter is of opinion that we ought not to confirm the first alternative resolution and that we ought to confirm the second, which has this at least to be said for it, that it is literally and plainly a resolution for "reduction of capital." I agree with Mr Winchester. He does not say that any existing creditor will be prejudiced by the one proposal more than the other. But he says that a resolution to "convert" and "re-allocate capital" is not in terms or in reality a proposal to reduce capital. Therefore the first alternative resolution is not strictly within the words of the statute. Mr Morton says that he has searched for and has failed to find any case which would be a precedent for doing what he asks the Court to do here. In the absence of such a case, I think the safer course will be to walk by the strict words of the statute, and confirm the second alternative resolution.

2nd Div.

The Walker Steam Fishing Co. Ltd.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

Lord Low.—I concur, but with considerable regret. I recognise, however, that the first of the alternative resolutions, although for practical purposes it amounts to very much the same thing as the second, does not in fact reduce the capital, which is the only matter which the statute empowers the Court to deal with.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur. I am of opinion that no reasons of expediency can justify the Court in departing by a hair's breadth from the provisions of the statutes under which alone they have jurisdiction to make alterations in the capital of a company that has been incorporated under the Companies Acts.—16*th November* 1907.

UNIVERSITY REPRESENTATIVE, AND (2) THAT WOMEN GRADUATES NOT ENTITLED TO HAVE VOTING PAPERS SENT THEM BY THE REGISTRAR IN TERMS OF THE UNIVERSITIES ELECTIONS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1881, SECT. 2, SUBSECT. 3.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 176.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

The circumstances of this case appear from the previous report.

The Pursuers reclaimed and argued: University representation was not a part of a general scheme of representation, but a special franchise created by the Act of 1868. It differed from the ordinary franchise (1) in being based on education and not property; and (2) in the nature of the constituency, which was unique in not being geographical. The University franchise was thus sui generis, and even though there were a presumption against the capacity of women to vote at common law, that could not apply to a franchise purely statutory and differing in essentials from other franchises. Sect. 27 of the Act of 1868 gave a vote to every member of the General Council "of full age and not subject to any legal idcapacity." The question was, Did this include women members of the General Council? (1) "Person" was equivalent to "man or woman" (The Queen v. Crosthwaite, 1864, 17 Ir. C.L. Rep. 157). There was thus a direct enfranchisement of women. The same words, "all persons, being of lawful age and not subject to legal incapacity," in the Education (Scotland) Act 1872, Sched. B. 2, included women. The Act of 1868 in dealing with any franchise but the University franchise, used the words "every man" (sects. 3, 4, 5 and 6). It was only in the case of the University franchise that a change was made to "every person." There was therefore a presumption that the phrase was expressly varied so as to include women. In sects. 2 and 7 of the Reform (Ireland) Act, 2 & 3 Will. IV., cap. 88, which conferred the franchise on persons outside the University, the words used were "male person"; and in sects. 60 and 61, dealing with the University franchise, "every person" is used. So the same thing was done both in Ireland and Scotland and could not be accidental. (2) If "every person" was equivalent "to every man or woman," then women could not be disqualified by the words "not subject to any legal incapacity." "Legal incapacity" referred to peers, lunatics, paupers and aliens, etc., and had no reference to sex. In the Reform (England) Act 1832, sects. 19 and 20, the words "every male person of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity" occur, shewing a legal incapacity has no reference to sex. The cases of Chorlton v. Lings, 1868, L.R. 4 C.P. 374, and Brown v. Ingram, 1868, 7 M. 281, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, were distinguished because in them the claimants were not on the register. In any event the registrar was bound to send voting papers to "each voter as entered on the Register of the General Councils" in terms of sect. 2, subsect. 3, of the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act 1881. The registrar was not a judge of who was entitled to receive voting papers. He was bound to send out the papers, and the Vice-Chancellor was the person to decide whether the vote was good if an objection was taken.

Argued for the Respondents: At common law the Parliamentary franchise was confined to men, and if women were to have the franchise bestowed on them by statute it was natural to expect it would be bestowed in unequivocal terms, and not by a doubtful implication. Thus the onus was on the pursuers to shew that the Acts had bestowed the franchise on them. The word "person" in the Act of 1868 did not include women. In itself it was an ambiguous word. It was not necessary in 1868 to use a distinctively masculine term, as there were at that time no women graduates. "Legal incapacity" included the incapacity of sex. A woman was incapax quoad a manus publicum. The mere fact that women were on the register did not entitle them to vote, as they were subject to a legal incapacity (Stowe v. Jolliffe, 1874 L.R., 9 C.P. 734; Earl of Beauchamp v. Madrefield, 1872, L.R. 8 C.P. 245; Beresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, 1889, L.R. 23 Q.B.D. 79; Wilson v. Town Clerk of Salford, 1868, L.R. 4 C.P. 398; Borough of Oldham, 1869, 1 O'Malley and Hardcastle's Election Petitions, 151; Marquis of Bristol v. Breck, 1907, 23 Times L.R. 224. If women were not entitled to vote they were not entitled to have voting papers sent to them. The Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act 1881, sect. 2, subsect. 3, ordered the registrar to send voting papers to "each voter" on the register of the General Council, not to each person on the register. Women were not "voters." Suppose a paper sent to a woman and a vote given and not objected to, the result would be that the Vice-Chancellor could not ex proprio motu disallow the vote, and a woman's vote would be counted.

The Court adhered.

Lord M'Laren. — Apart from the right to University representation which is now claimed, it is an incontestable fact that women never have enjoyed the Parliamentary franchise of the United Kingdom. Prior to the Reform Acts of 1831 and 1832 there were many varieties of the Parliamentary franchise. The vote in counties was confined to freeholders. In Scotland the borough members were elected by town councils,

Some of the English boroughs had a representation as wide as that of the present law; in the greater number the franchise was more or less restricted, but not always in the same degree or on the same type.

All varieties of the Parliamentary franchise had this element in common, that its exercise was confined to men; and even in the cases where the right of election was confined to a few burgage tenures, or even to a single tenement, if the owner was a woman she was not entitled to vote. In view of these facts, we must conclude thatit was a principle of the unwritten constitutional law of the country that men only were entitled to take part in the election of representatives to Parliament.

All ambiguous expressions in modern Acts of Parliament must be construed in the light of this general constitutional principle. We are not to be understood as invoking any merely technical rule of construction in this matter; what is meant is that if Parliament had intended to subvert an existing constitutional law in favour of women graduates, the intention would naturally be expressed in plain language, and therefore if ambiguous language is used it must be construed in accordance with the general constitutional rule.

By sect. 27 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act 1868, a vote for the election of a University member is given to "every person whose name is for the time being on the register" . . . . "if of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity." The qualification of "full age" was necessary, because the register of graduates might contain the names of men who had taken their degrees before attaining majority. The qualification "not subject to any legal incapacity" was also necessary; a peer, for example, might be on the register of graduates, but it was not intended that he should have a vote for returning a member to the House of Commons. It was not necessary to exclude women by express words, because at that time women could not lawfully be on the University register.

Now this is the Act of Parliament which created the University constituencies of Scotland, and therefore in its inception the University franchise had this element in common with the franchises of counties and burghs, that it was confined to men. It may here be observed that in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of this Act, which define the qualifications of voters in counties and burghs, the words used are "every man," so it appears that the expression "every person," which is used with reference to University elections, had the same meaning as "every man" in the earlier sections.

By the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act 1881 provision is made for taking the vote at University elections by means of "voting papers," and in particular by sect. 2, subsect. 3, the registrar in case of a poll is required to send through the post a voting paper "to each voter to his address as entered on the register of the General Council of the University, who shall appear from said address to be resident within the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands." The expression "each voter" here used could not give rise to any ambiguity as to sex, because at this date the University register was a register of men. The proviso of subsect. 16, excluding persons "subject to any legal incapacity," does not seem to have any material bearing on the present question.

The claim of the pursuers to vote at the election of a member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St Andrews is founded on their status as graduates of one of these Universities. By the Universities (Scotland) Act 1889 the Commissioners thereby appointed were empowered to make ordinances "to enable each University to admit women to graduation in one or more Faculties." By the Ordinance of 1892 this power was exercised, and women have been admitted to graduation in certain Faculties. The pursuers' names have been placed on the registers of the General Council of one of these Universities in right of their respective degrees. It may be observed that the Universities Act 1889 does not empower the University Commissioners to admit women graduates to the franchise; and if it had been intended that the degree should carry with it the right of voting at Parliamentary elections, we should have expected to find a provision to that effect in the Act of Parliament itself. It is quite certain that the University Commissioners had no power to make any deliverance on this subject, and the same observation applies to the powers of the University Courts in the execution of the ordinance. The pursuers' claim accordingly must rest on the Representation Act of 1868 and the Universities Elections Act 1881.

The argument must be that a franchise originally conferred on graduates who were necessarily men has been extended to women graduates, not by a direct enfranchising enactment, but by the indirect effect of an Act of Parliament which does not profess to deal with political privileges, but is concerned only with academic functions, and which, in the interests of the higher education of women, authorises the admission of women to graduation. The degree itself, or rather the right to take a degree, is not even conferred by the Act of Parliament, but is made dependent, first, on the judgment of Commissioners empowered to take evidence, and secondly, on the pleasure of the governing bodies of the respective Universities. It is difficult to conceive that the Legislature should have conferred the power of extending the franchise by devolution to a class of persons hitherto excluded by a constitutional rule, a power which it has always kept in its own hands, and it appears to us that there is absolutely no evidence in the terms of the Universities Act 1889 that Parliament intended to extend the franchise to women, or had any question of political privileges in view, when it empowered the University authorities to admit women to graduation. We think that the Representation Act 1868 and the Universities Elections Act 1881 must be construed now, as heretofore, with reference to the political disabilities of women, and that the circumstances of the pursuers being on the University registers does not remove the disability.

In consequence of an amendment made on the record at the hearing of the case, the pursuers contend that in any event they are entitled to receive voting papers, leaving it to the candidate or his agent to object to the vote if tendered, and to the Vice-Chancellor or his deputy to dispose of the objection, all in terms of the 10th subsection of section 2 of the Universities Elections Act 1881. It is, no doubt, true that if the registrar (taking a different view of his statutory duty) had sent the lady graduates voting papers, the votes might have been objected to and disallowed by the Vice-Chancellor.

But as our judgment on the main question is adverse to the claim of the lady graduates, it follows that no individual of the class has a cause of action for not receiving an invitation to give a vote which she could not lawfully exercise, or a title to sue for a declaratory finding that she is entitled to receive such a paper. We are therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed, and the reclaiming note refused.

That is the opinion of the Court. — 16*th November* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 183.)

The pursuers reclaimed.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The questions raised on the reclaiming note were: (1) Whether the burgh of Haddington had acted correctly in proceeding under sect. 103 of the Public Health Act 1897, and whether that section was still unrepealed.

(2) Whether "reasonable notice in writing" had been given in term of sect. 103.

(3) If not, whether the pursuers were entitled to the remedy they asked—removal of the completed works.

(4) Whether, if they had received proper notice, the pursuers could have prevented the execution of the works, having reference to the power of the Sheriff under sect. 109 of the Public Health Act 1897.

(5) Whether sect. 217 of the Burgh Police Act 1892 applied to the circumstances of the case.

(6) Whether the defenders were entitled to expenses taxed as between agent and client under the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893.

The contentions of the parties appear from the Opinions of the Court.

Sect. 217 of the Burgh Police Act 1892 provides:

217. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners, contrary to any private right, to use, injure, or interfere with any sewers or other works already made or used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating lands, or to use, injure, or interfere with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay, or towing-path in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same; and nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice or affect the rights, privileges, powers, or authorities given or reserved to any person under any local or private Act of Parliament for the drainage, preservation, or improvement of land, or for or in respect of any mills, mines, machinery, canal, or navigation as last aforesaid.

Sect. 103 of the Public Health Act 1897 is quoted in the previous report. The other sections of the statutes under consideration are sufficiently cited in the opinions of the Court.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties in the pursuers' reclaiming note against the interlocutor of Lord Dundas, dated 6th July 1906, Recal the said interlocutor in so far as it finds the defenders entitled to expenses as between agent and client in terms of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 1 (b); quoad ultra, refuse the reclaiming note; adhere to the said interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern; refuse the defenders' motion for expenses as between agent and client in terms of the said Public Authorities Protection Act 1893; find them entitled to expenses on the ordinary terms. . . ."

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—After mature consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment in favour of the burgh of Haddington is right, and should be adhered to. The conduct of the case throughout has been marked by an ability which has only been equalled by its keenness. Now, where private interests conflict with an admitted public benefit, and the question comes before a court of law, the Court in my opinion ought to be strict to mark any neglect of the private interest which amounts to a failure to make compensation for the property either taken or injuriously affected. But where, as here, there is no case of that kind, but only a difference of opinion as to the precise method by which the public benefit is to be conferred and a criticism of the legal machinery which has been invoked in attaining it, I do not think that any such duty arises. Of course the public authority charged with the execution of the work must proceed according to law, but it is not every captious objection to their procedure that is to be listened to, particularly if it results in no serious or even sensible injury to the person objecting. And that, in my view, is a fair description of the kind of injury alleged here.

The case for the pursuers is, not that an improved system for the drainage of Haddington was altogether unnecessary, or even that the system actually projected and partially carried out was not a "great improvement" in the public interest; they admitted as much by their letter of 23rd June 1905. Their case as now presented, after a great part of the work has been done, is that they did not discover till 10th November of that year that the defenders were interfering with the alveus of the river Tyne which at the place in question is their property, or in which at least they have a common interest with others, the interference consisting, not in the discharge of sewage into the river, but in the laying of certain drain pipes on the surface of the alveus, instead of in the bed of the river, and thereby affecting the natural flow of the river opposite their mills; that the defenders could not, under the 217th section of the Burgh Police Act 1892, interfere with any stream without the pursuers' consent in writing; that they gave no such consent; and that, even if the defenders were justified in proceeding under the Public Health Act 1897 alone, they did not follow the directions of that Act, because they failed to give reasonable notice to the pursuers, as required by sect. 103, of their intention to carry their sewers through the property of the pursuers; and, in particular, did not send to them the report of a surveyor to the effect that such a course was necessary. The practical conclusion of the summons is that the defenders ought to be ordained to lift all their pipes and other structures, and restore the channel of the river to its former condition. It will thus be seen that the nature of the case leading to these rather startling conclusions is both complicated and involved. It means that, where a burgh is situate on a running stream, the town council of that burgh cannot improve its drainage, however desirable in the public interest, if the scheme involves any interference with that running stream, without the consent in writing of everybody who can qualify any sort of right or interest in that part of the stream. It also means that the administrators of a burgh must make up their minds, before they set a drainage scheme on foot, which of two extant and possibly inconsistent codes they are to follow, under penalty that, if they make a slip, they may be called upon, months after the work has been done, to undo it, at great public detriment and expense. This may be the result of too much legislation on a particular subject, or of want of care in framing the legislation; but it is not a result to be readily adopted.

2nd Div.
Montgomerie & Co. Ltd. v. The Burgh of Haddington.
Lord Stormonth-Darling.

The Lord Ordinary finds a sufficient justification for the interlocutor which he has pronounced in the recent First Division case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 17th November 1905, 8 F. 77, in which it was held that the procedure prescribed by the Public Health Act 1897 for a local authority in the making of sewers was a code complete in itself, and that a local authority was entitled to exercise the powers given by that Act (as the Magistrates of Kirkcudbright did), without regard to the procedure prescribed by the Burgh Police Act. That conclusion was necessary to the judgment, and none of the judges expressed any dissent from it. Undoubtedly it justified the decision in this case, so far as the Outer House was concerned, if the Lord Ordinary was of opinion, as he was, that the notice here given was in fact reasonable. Brown's case would not be equally binding on us, for we might take measures for the reconsideration of the point if we thought such a course desirable. But, so far as I personally am concerned, I am quite satisfied with the decision in Brown's case; I have no fault to find with it of any kind. And it was a unanimous judgment of the First Division.

It was urged by Mr Clyde for the pursuers that, while the defenders might have had an option to proceed either under the Act of 1892 or under the Act of 1897 before the passing of the Burgh Sewerage and Water Supply Act of 1901, they had no such option after the passing of that Act, and that Brown's case would have been, or ought to have been, decided otherwise than it was, if the provisions of the Act of 1901 had been properly brought before the First Division. I do not think so. The First Division had the Act of 1901 in view when they pronounced their judgment, and I do not see that it makes the great difference for which Mr Clyde contends. No doubt, by sect. 1, it calls the Act of 1892 "the principal Act"; and where sums of money have been borrowed for purposes of sewerage or water supply, it lays upon town councils the duty of providing the sums necessary for repaying the principal and for paying interest on such sums out of a special assessment to be made under the Act of 1892, with certain limitations as to amount, and certain provisions as to approval of the Local Government Board for Scotland, in the case of such prescribed amounts not being sufficient to meet the expenditure. It is also true that, by sect. 5 of the Act, the town council of any burgh, in addition to the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1892 or any other Act, with reference to sewerage and water supply, are to have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Public Health Act of 1897 upon local authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with certain specified exceptions. Further, it is true that, to make these provisions harmonise with the course of legislation, sects. 101, 113, 133, 134, and 137 of the Act of 1897 are repealed. But all that does not get over the fact that sect. 103 of the Act of 1897 is not repealed; and, so long as it was left standing, it does not seem to me that it was in any respect ultra vires of the defenders to proceed under sect. 103, which gave them the power to construct within their district (which this extension undoubtedly was) "such sewers as they might think necessary for keeping their district properly cleansed and drained." They were made the judge of the necessity of such operations, at least in the first instance, and if the pursuers meant to challenge the necessity or to demand a report by a "surveyor" in addition to the plan (whatever it was) which was sent with the letter of the town clerk dated 20th June 1905, then was the time, in my judgment, for the pursuers to have formulated their demand. I agree with all that the Lord Ordinary says in his opinion on this part of the case; and, particularly in view of the town clerk's offer to give the pursuers "any further information," I think it is too late now for the pursuers to complain that they did not get reasonable notice. I am satisfied that the pursuers, on receipt of the letter of 20th June and its accompanying plan, knew perfectly well that the defenders intended to carry a new drain "into, through, or under" the pursuers' lands, and that, their reply having been an express approval of the scheme without any qualification either as to the level of the new drain or otherwise, they must be held to have been satisfied of its necessity and of the sufficiency of the notice generally. It is clear from the decision of the case of Roderick v. Aston Local Board in 1877, in 5 Ch. Div. 328, under the corresponding English Public Health Act of 1875, that a power to carry sewers "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever" cannot be read as if those words meant only "under."

In reaching the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, I confess I do not share the doubts of my brother Lord Low as to the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's finding that the pursuers "have validly complied with the requirements of the Public Health Act 1897." These doubts are, as I understand, founded on the view that the town clerk failed to disclose, either by his letter of 20th June or by the plan which accompanied it, that the two proposed new pipes were not to be laid at the same level as the old single pipe, and that this omission, though not due to carelessness or a desire to conceal anything, was yet such as to justify the pursuers' assumption that the two new pipes were to be so laid. But that assumption (the justification of which I doubt, particularly looking to the note on the plan No. 8 of process that the old 12-inch pipe was "to be lifted and relaid") ought only, in my view, to have led to an enquiry for more information which, be it observed, had been proffered in the town clerk's letter. At all events, it does not seem to me to negative what is the main issue on this part of the case, viz. whether the defenders gave "reasonable notice in writing" of the works which they proposed to execute upon private property.

It remains for consideration whether the proceedings of the Burgh of Haddington have been gone about in violation of sect. 217 of the Act of 1892, the section which provides that "nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners" to do certain things, including using, injuring, or interfering with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay or towing-path, in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, "without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same." It might be enough to rely, as the Lord Ordinary does, on the judgment in Brown's case as settling that the defenders did not require to resort to the Act of 1892 as authorising them to use, injure, or interfere with the river Tyne, inasmuch as sect. 103 of the Public Health Act of 1897 gave them the required authority; and all that sect. 217 says is that "Nothing in this Act contained, i.e. the Act of 1892, shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners to do" certain things. But, even if this were not so, I greatly doubt whether sect. 217 applies to this case at all. Reading the section as a whole, it looks to me very much as if the protection of the private owner was carried so far as to entitle him to withhold his consent altogether (instead of merely entitling him to receive compensation), for the reason that, in the exceptional cases specified, any interference with these "private sewers or watercourses," as the sidenote calls them, might defeat the object aimed at by some local or private Act of Parliament, and not at all that, in the very common case of a river bordered by a town, any exceptional protection was thought to be necessary to guard against any, even the smallest, interference with the flow of the stream. The danger of pollution is dealt with separately in the Public Health Act by reference to the Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts; but I never understood that the high doctrine of Bicket v. Morris, 1866, 4 M. (H.L.) 44, which related to building operations by an opposite neighbour on the alveus of a stream, was thought to be within the purview of sanitary or drainage statutes.

Moreover, if the pursuers were to insist on the view that their consent in writing was a necessary preliminary to any interference with the river Tyne, they ought, in my opinion, to have tabled their proposition at once, instead of reserving it till the works were well advanced. My belief is that the applicability of sect. 217 was a pure afterthought on the part of the pursuers, due to the ingenuity of their legal advisers.

I have not adverted to any of the oral evidence in the case, because I consider it almost entirely beside the question. And I cannot help observing that, in my opinion, municipal authorities deserve some commiseration for having to pick their way through such a tangle of redundant legislation as Parliament has provided for their guidance.

With regard to the point which was made as to the application of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, and as to which the Lord Ordinary has given effect to the defenders' demand, I agree that that part of his Lordship's interlocutor must be recalled, on the short ground that the Act itself declares, by sect. 3, that it shall not apply "to any action, prosecution, or other proceeding, ... on account of any act done in any case instituted under an Act of Parliament, where that Act applies to Scotland only, and contains a limitation of the time and other conditions for the action, prosecution, or proceeding." Now the Public Health Act, under which this action must be held to have been instituted (on the assumption that the defenders are to get their expenses), does contain, by sect. 166, a limitation of the time within which such action shall be commenced, and it also contains (at the beginning of the same section) "other conditions" applicable to the action.

Lord Low.—The first question to be determined in this case seems to me to be whether it was competent for the defenders to proceed under the powers conferred upon local authorities by the 103rd section of the Public Health Act 1897.

I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the affirmative, because the section applies to all local authorities, whether in burgh or in landward districts, and it has never been expressly repealed, nor, in my judgment, can it be held to have been repealed by implication.

After the passing of the Public Health Act 1897 a somewhat anomalous condition of matters arose in regard to public sewers and drains in burghs, because the Burgh Police Act 1892 contained a complete code in regard to these matters within burgh, and the Public Health Act also contained a complete code which was applicable to burghs as well as to other districts; and further, the assessments authorised by the two Acts differed both as to amount and as to the persons liable.

It was for the purpose of remedying, or at all events of partially remedying, that state of matters that the Burgh Sewage, Drainage, and Water Supply Act 1901 was passed. That Act, by amending certain sections of the Act of 1892, and repealing (as regarded burghs) certain sections of the Act of 1897, did away with the double method of assessment authorised by the two last mentioned Acts, and established one method of assessment for burghs. It further declared that as regarded burghs the Act of 1892 should be the principal Act, and it incorporated with that Act certain sections of the Act of 1897, and repealed certain sections of the latter Act.

That being the scheme of the Act of 1901 I think that one would have expected that all the provisions in the Act of 1897 which it was intended should still apply to burghs would have been incorporated in the Act of 1892, and that all provisions which it was intended should no longer apply to burghs would have been (quoad burghs) repealed. If that had been done, burgh authorities would have found the whole code applicable to them in the Act of 1892 as amended, together with the incorporated sections of the Act of 1897. But the course actually adopted by the Legislature was very different. As I have said, certain sections of the Act of 1897 were repealed, and other sections were incorporated into the Act of 1892, but there were also a number of sections in the former Act which applied to burgh as well as to other authorities which were neither incorporated nor repealed. It is true that a good many of these sections contained provisions identical, or practically identical, with what had already been enacted as regarded burghs in the Act of 1892, and so far as these sections were concerned it was immaterial that they were neither incorporated nor repealed. But there are also sections which contain provisions which have no equivalent in the Act of 1892. The 103rd section itself may be taken as an example. That section, inter alia, authorises all local authorities to construct sewers for the purpose of outfall or disposal or treatment of sewage without their district. It was admitted that (whatever may be said as to the other powers given in the section) no such power as that which I have quoted is conferred upon the local authority in burghs by the Act of 1892, and therefore, unless the 103rd section is still applicable to burghs, the local authority in a burgh has been deprived of a very important power which has been conferred upon all other local authorities. No reason was, nor, I imagine, could be, suggested for denying such a power to burghs; and indeed I should expect that it would be more frequently expedient or necessary that sewage should be disposed of outside the area under the control of the local authority in the case of a burgh than in the case of a country district. I therefore see no reason for holding that sect. 103 (and the remark applies to other sections in a similar position) does not apply to burghs, because, although it is not incorporated with the Act of 1892, it is not repealed. In taking that view I am confirmed by the judgment of the First Division in the case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 8 F. 77.

There is, however, another ground for holding that sect. 103 is still in force as regards burghs. By the 5th section of the Act of 1901 it is provided that "the town council of any burgh, as the authority under the principal Act, in addition to the powers conferred upon them by the principal Act or any other Act, shall with reference to sewerage or drainage or water supply within such area, have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Public Health (Scotland) Act 1897 upon local authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with the exception of the rights, powers and privileges conferred by sects. 122 and 131 of the last-mentioned Act, to which sections the present section shall not apply."

Now the two excepted sections are in express terms limited to districts of a "local authority, not being the local authority of a burgh," and in the part of the Act dealing with "sewers, drains, and water supply" there are other sections (at all events in regard to water supply) whose application is limited in the same way. It is plainly the powers contained in the latter sections which are conferred upon burgh authorities in addition to powers already possessed by them. The object, therefore, of the enactment is to add to and not to diminish the powers of burgh authorities, and the powers to which the addition is made are described as those conferred "by the principal Act" (that is, the Burgh Police Act 1892) "or any other Act." Now the Act of 1897 is another Act which confers powers upon burgh local authorities which they did not possess before (as, for example, by the 103rd section), and it seems to me to be plain that the Act of 1901, so far from taking away any powers conferred upon burgh authorities by any prior Act, conferred upon them powers which they did not previously possess.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders were entitled to proceed, as they did in fact proceed, under the powers of sect. 103.

The next question is whether the defenders followed the procedure prescribed by that section. The part of the section applicable to this case is that which enacts that a local authority may construct a sewer "after reasonable notice in writing (if upon the report of a surveyor it should appear to be necessary) into, through, or under any lands whatsoever." The pursuers did not found upon the clause in regard to a surveyor's report, but they maintained that "reasonable notice" of the works proposed was not given to them. Notice was, in fact, sent to the pursuers by the letter of the town clerk of 20th June 1905, and the pursuers' complaint is that the information given as to the character of the proposed sewer was not reasonably adequate in that not only did it not disclose that the new pipes were to be laid upon the surface of the bed of the stream instead of under the surface (as was the case with an existing pipe), but that the inference from the letter was that the new pipes were to be laid upon the same level as the existing pipe.

It seems to me that there are substantial grounds for that objection. The state of matters which existed when the notice was given was that a 12-inch pipe ran down the bed of the river from the Victoria Bridge to Spoutwell Brae, and the plan which was sent to the pursuers along with the letter of 20th June shewed that pipe, and alongside of it an 18-inch pipe. In the letter it was said that "the existing 12-inch water-closet sewage pipe" (which I understand to be the pipe which ran down the bed of the river) "will remain," but nothing was said about the 18-inch pipe shewn on the plan. The explanation of that I take to be that it did not occur to the town clerk that the laying pipes in the bed of the river below the Victoria Bridge could in any way affect the pursuers, and what he desired to make clear in the letter was what the proposed sewage arrangements above Victoria Bridge were—a matter in which he was aware that the pursuers were interested. The weir of the dam which supplies the pursuers' mills is immediately above Victoria Bridge, and the pursuers had objected to a discharge of sewage which under the existing system was made into the dam. By the proposed scheme that discharge was discontinued, and all the sewage was taken down the river by means of the two pipes, and what the town clerk desired to make clear was that the proposed scheme did away with a state of matters to which the defenders strongly objected. But although the town clerk did not refer in the letter to the 18-inch pipe, he sent a plan which shewed that pipe, and accordingly the pursuers were notified that if the scheme were carried through, an additional and larger pipe would be taken down the bed of the stream. The plan, however, shewed nothing in regard to the level at which the pipes were to be laid; but as the town clerk said that the 12-inch pipe would remain, I think that the pursuers were justified in assuming that the 18-inch pipe would not only be laid alongside of it, as shewn on the plan, but would be upon the same level

Now I think that it is established by the evidence that the 12-inch pipe was embedded in the channel of the river and did not shew above the level of the river bed, but to what extent that state of matters was due to the manner in which the pipe had been originally laid, and to what extent to sagging or sinking of the pipe, it seems to be impossible to ascertain with certainty. I think, however, that the pipe most probably was originally laid under the river bed. One thing seems to be clear, and that is, that neither the defenders nor the men of skill by whom they were advised ever considered the question of the level of the new pipes as compared with the level of the old pipe. It does not seem to have occurred to them that there was any question of that kind which required consideration, and for this reason: There were two fixed points between which the old pipe ran and between which the new pipes were to run, and did run when laid, the one point being an opening in the abutment of the Victoria Bridge through which the pipes were passed, and the other an iron pipe which crossed the river at Spoutwell Brae, and with which the pipes in question were connected. Now, obviously the natural and most efficient way to lay the pipes between these two points was to lay them upon a uniform gradient, that is to say, in a straight line from the one fixed point to the other, and it never occurred to the engineers to enquire whether the old pipe had or had not been originally laid in that way.

The failure, therefore, of the defenders to inform the pursuers that the new pipes would be above ground was not due to any desire on their part to conceal anything, nor can the town clerk be charged with carelessness in not having brought the matter to the pursuers' notice. On the other hand, the pursuers were, as I have already said, in my opinion justified in assuming that the new pipes would be in the same position as the old, that is to say, below the surface of the river bed, and it is not surprising that they felt aggrieved when they found that instead of the bed of the river remaining free from obstructions, two large pipes were laid upon it and covered with cement, thereby forming a structure of from four to ten feet in breadth. The pursuers aver, and they have adduced some evidence in support of the averment, that that structure renders their mills more liable to be flooded than they were formerly, and although I do not think that they have made out a strong case, it seems to me to be impossible to say that the risk of flooding may not have been to some, although probably to a very slight, extent increased.

Now assuming that the pursuers did not get that reasonable notice of the works proposed by the defenders which is required by the 103rd section, what is the result? The pursuers' demand, and it is their only demand so far as this action is concerned, is that the pipes should be removed. In order to determine whether or not that is a remedy which is open to the pursuers I shall consider what the position of matters would have been if the pursuers had received notice of the precise way in which it was proposed to lay the pipes, and had objected.

2nd Div. Montgomerie & Co. Ltd. v. The Burgh of Haddington. Lord Low.

It seems to me that notwithstanding an objection on the pursuers' part, the defenders could have proceeded with the works and laid the pipes exactly as they have done, because the 103rd section does not say that the consent of the persons to whom notice must be given is required, or that they may object to the proposed sewer. All that seems to be contemplated is that persons through whose lands it is proposed to take a sewer should have an opportunity of considering the matter, and stating their views to the local authority.

In expressing that opinion I am not leaving out of view the provisions of the 109th section of the statute, which enacts that "In case it may become necessary to enter, examine, or lay open any lands or premises" for the purpose of making plans, surveying, taking levels, and the like, and, inter alia, for the purpose of making sewers, "and the owner or occupier of premises refuses or withholds access and leave to perform the said operations, the local authority may, after written notice to such owner and occupier, apply to the Sheriff, who, if no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary, shall grant warrant to the local authority, their officers and others thereby authorised, to enter and do all or any of the works or operations foresaid at all reasonable times in daylight." In terms of the 157th section of the Act, any order made by the Sheriff is final and not subject to review.

In the case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright there was some difference of opinion in regard to the power conferred upon the Sheriff by that section, Lord M'Laren taking the view that the Sheriff was empowered to consider and determine whether the operations proposed by the local authority ought or ought not to be allowed, while Lord Adam was strongly of opinion that the Sheriff's powers were limited to questions of procedure, and that he had no authority to consider whether the proposed sewer was necessary or not. I agree with Lord Adam. I think that the main function of the Sheriff is to regulate the way in which the work is to be proceeded with, so as to be as little burdensome as possible to the owner or occupier. No doubt it is made imperative on the Sheriff to grant warrant to the local authorities to enter the lands only "if no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary," which implies that if sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary the Sheriff may refuse the warrant. I do not, however, think that that is inconsistent with the view which I take of the scope of the enactment, because there may be cases in which the Sheriff would be justified in refusing a warrant without considering or dealing in any way with the question whether or not the works were necessary. Suppose, for example, that a local authority proposed to construct a sewer through private lands in the exercise of the powers in the 103rd section, and attempted to enter the lands and commence operations without having given previous notice in writing to the owner or occupier, and without having obtained a report from a surveyor that the sewer was necessary, I have no doubt that the Sheriff would be entitled to refuse a warrant and to dismiss the application in respect that the local authority had not followed the statutory procedure. I am accordingly of opinion that the 109th section does not aid the pursuers, and indeed I did not understand their counsel to found upon that section.

I am therefore of opinion that if the defenders were entitled to proceed under the powers conferred by the 103rd section of the Act of 1897, without any limitation of these powers, except those contained in the section itself, and in the 109th section, the pursuers are not entitled to have the pipes in question removed. I take it that the Court will not order removal of a structure which can be immediately replaced, especially where, as here, there was no radical defect in the title of those who erected it, but merely an unintentional failure to comply with certain statutory formalities.

The question remains, however, whether the powers conferred by the 103rd section are not limited and qualified by the 217th section of the Act of 1892? By that section it is enacted "that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise" the local authority, inter alia, "to use, injure, or interfere with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay, or towing-path in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same."

It seems to me that if that enactment is applicable to the present case, and if it is to be construed literally, it is conclusive in the pursuers' favour, because the defenders did, without the pursuers' consent, use and interfere with a river in which the pursuers not only had an interest as owners and occupiers of mills, but of the alveus of which they were proprietors, either from bank to bank, or ad medium filum at the part where the pipes in question are laid.

The Lord Ordinary suggests that even if the section is applicable, the pursuers gave their consent in writing. I cannot assent to that view, because although the pursuers did in writing express their approval of the scheme, they did so in the belief, which they were justified in holding, that the pipes were to be laid under ground. If they had been aware that the pipes were to be laid above ground they would certainly not have approved of the scheme, nor given their consent to it.

But however that may be, I am of opinion that the 217th section does not apply to the present case. In the first place, the section, in terms, only applies to operations carried out under the powers conferred by the Act of 1892.

That appears from the opening words of the section, which are "Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise."

In like manner the language of the 103rd section seems to me to negative the idea that the powers thereby conferred are subject to any limitation. The power which is in question in this case is to construct a sewer "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever." The word "whatsoever" is plainly unnecessary except for the purpose of emphasis, and the inference appears to me to be that it was used in order to make it clear that the generality of the power was to be subject to no exception. I am therefore of opinion that it would be contrary to the declared intention of the Legislature to hold that the power conferred has been limited and curtailed, in the case of burghs, so as to be excluded altogether as regards the subjects enumerated in the 217th section.

If I am right in the view which I have already expressed that the 103rd section is not repealed by implication quoad burghs by the Act of 1901, the only ground upon which it could be contended that the 217th section applies to operations under the 103rd section would be that the Act of 1901, by declaring the Act of 1892 to be the principal Act, placed the 103rd section of the Act of 1897 in the position of an enactment which merely added to the powers conferred by the principal Act, and therefore fell to be read along with and as part of that Act. Now the Act of 1901 has left the 103rd section, along with the group of sections of which it is one, in a very anomalous position, because, while it makes the Act of 1892 the principal Act, and incorporates with that Act certain sections of the Act of 1897, and repeals other sections of the latter Act, it simply leaves the group of sections to which I have referred standing, without either repealing them or incorporating them with the principal Act. In these circumstances I do not think that it is legitimate to infer that the Legislature intended that the wide powers conferred upon all local authorities by the 103rd section should be limited in the case of burgh authorities alone by reading into that section the 217th section of the Act of 1892. To make that inference would be to construe the Act of 1901 either as incorporating the 103rd section with the Act of 1892, or as declaring that it should be read along with and as forming part of that Act. The section has certainly not been incorporated, and I do not think that there is enough to imply a direction that it shall be read as part of the Act of 1892. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the pursuers cannot found upon the 217th section.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed in so far as it assoilzies the defenders. I am not, however, prepared, for the reasons which I have given, to assent to the finding that the defenders have validly complied with the requirements of the Public Health Act.

Lord Low

With regard to the question of expenses raised under the Public Authorities Protection Act, I need only say, without going into details, that an examination of the Act has led me to the same conclusion as that expressed by Lord Stormonth-Darling.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur entirely in the opinion of my brother Lord Low, which I have had the privilege of reading, and with which I entirely agree.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have very little to add. This case has seemed to me to be attended with considerable difficulty. But I have come to the view that the judgment should be as proposed. I cannot say that I think the giving of notice under the Act was done with that clearness and formality which would be expected when notice was being given by a public authority proposing to interfere with a piece of property in which private proprietors had a substantial interest. I think that the procedure was loose, and not by any means a model for imitation by any public body. But it was treated by the pursuers as a notice without objection. Accordingly the work proceeded in the knowledge and under the observation of the pursuers. It seems to me that, knowing that important works were going on under the notice, the pursuers were not acting as they should have done in allowing these expensive works to be carried on and completed without taking steps to vindicate any rights they had which they saw were being encroached upon. Except upon the strongest grounds I could not hold that merely upon a question of notice an objector could come forward and require that the works erected should be removed, thus making a work involving great cost abortive, and compelling the adoption of some new and probably more expensive expedient. I agree with Lord Low in thinking that if the pursuers had objected, they could not have made good their objection to the works being executed under sect. 103 of the Public Health Act, if that Act applied. But further, in this case I have formed a very decided opinion that the pursuers have failed to prove in any reasonable degree that the works which were executed could cause any damage to their interests.

I do not add anything upon the question of application of the statutes. I entirely agree in the opinion that the Authority proposing to make the alterations were entitled to proceed under sect. 103 of the Public Health Act, and I agree with Lord Low in the views he has expressed as to the 217th section of the Act of 1892, in holding that the pursuers cannot found on this Act.—13*th November* 1907.

Petition for Recal of Arrestments.

This petition was presented on 1st November 1907 by Messrs Barclay Curle & Co., shipbuilders at Whiteinch, praying for the recal of arrestments which had been laid upon two steamers, the one lying in graving dock in the harbour of Glasgow, and the other in the petitioners' yard at Clydeholm, both being in course of construction in terms of an agreement between the petitioners and the Lloyd Sabaudo Societa Anonima Di Navigazione of Turin.

The petition set forth as follows:—

That by agreement between the petitioners on the one part and Messrs The Lloyd Sabaudo Societa Anonima Di Navigazione of Turin on the other part, made at Genoa on 11th February 1907, and ratified at Sunderland on 11th March 1907, the petitioners agreed to build and sell, and the purchasers, the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company, agreed to purchase, two new twin-screw steel steamers to be designed Nos. 468 and 469. The said agreement contained, among others, the following clause, viz. [quotes clause 7, infra].

On 29th October 1907 Sir James Laing & Sons, Ltd., carrying on business at Deptford Yard, Sunderland, in the county of Durham, and having their registered office at Deptford Yard aforesaid, on the dependence of a summons at their instance against the said Lloyd Sabaudo (Societa Anonima per Azioni), signeted 26th October 1907, arrested—(1) the vessel No. 468 mentioned in the said agreement, at present lying in the graving dock at Glasgow, belonging to the Clyde Navigation Trustees; and (2) the vessel No. 469, also mentioned in the agreement, at present in the petitioners' shipbuilding yard; and (3) in the hands of the petitioners a sum of £221,000, more or less, stated to be due by the petitioners to the said Lloyd Sabaudo, with all goods, gear, etc., in their hands, belonging to the said Lloyd Sabaudo.

The said ship No. 468 is due to leave the said graving dock not later than the morning of Wednesday the 6th November 1907, in order to undergo her trials off the port of Greenock, as provided for in Article 7 of the Agreement above set forth, and to leave the Clyde not later than Friday the 8th day of November 1907, so that after her official trial at Genoa she may be delivered to and accepted by the Lloyd Sabaudo Company at Genoa ready to proceed on voyage, after time for loading, etc., by the 25th of November 1907. The ship No. 469 will, the petitioners anticipate, be completed about the month of January next. In terms of the said agreement, the said two ships are the property of the petitioners.

The petitioners are not indebted in any sum to the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company, nor have they any goods, gear, etc., belonging to that company.

On 4th November 1907 answers were lodged for the said Sir James Laing & Sons Ltd. in the following terms:—

Admitted that the respondents, on the dependence of a summons at their instance against the Lloyd Sabaudo Company, have arrested the two vessels mentioned in the petition, and also the sum of £221,000 in the petitioners' hands due by them to the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company, and all goods, gear, etc., belonging to said last-mentioned Company. The letters and executions of arrestments are referred to for their terms. Not known and not admitted as to the date or dates on which the vessel No. 468 is due for her trials or to leave this country. Quoad ultra, the statements in the petition are denied, under reference to the agreement mentioned for its terms.

Explained that the summons at the instance of the respondents against the Lloyd Sabaudo Company concludes for payment to the respondents of sums amounting in all to £220,091, 19s. 4d. due by that Company to the respondents as the balance of the purchase price of three steamers built for and sold and delivered by the respondents to that Company.

Explained further, that by the agreement between the petitioners and the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company it is provided that the purchase price of the said vessels, Nos. 468 and 469, should be payable and paid by cash instalments at successive stages of their construction, all as therein set forth. It was further provided that the vessels should be constructed under the inspection and superintendence of a representative to be appointed by the purchasers. The above provisions of the contract have been duly carried out, and, in particular, the purchasers have made payment to the petitioners of the stated instalments as these became due. The amount of said instalments so received by the petitioners, viz., £221,000 or thereby, is presently in the hands of the petitioners. The respondents aver that under said agreement between the petitioners and the Lloyd Sabaudo Company, it was the intention of parties, and it was agreed, that the property of the vessels under construction should vest in the purchasers during the progress of their construction, and that the property in said vessels, so far as constructed, is presently vested in the Lloyd Sabaudo Company. Said Company are not called hereto as respondents.

In these circumstances the respondents submit that the petition is incompetent and ill-founded, and should be dismissed. In any event, the respondents maintain that the arrestments should be recalled or loosed only on caution being found or consignation made to the full extent of the respondents' claims against the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company.

The agreement referred to in the Petition and answers contained inter alia the following clauses:

7. The vessels when completed to have steam trial or trials at sea off the port of Greenock and adjacent coast. The cost of such steam trial or trials shall be at the builders' expense, they finding crew for the safe navigation of the vessels and for the engine department, also coal and engine stores, but the purchasers shall provide any cargo which they consider necessary for the trial or trials, and shall pay any expenses incidental to loading same.

Delivery to be considered completed after the satisfactory official trial provided for, as follows:—

After the steam trial off the coast of Greenock, mentioned above, the boats are to again undergo the official trial off the Italian coast, but all the cost of transporting the ships from Greenock, the costs of the official trial, including insurance, coals, oils, stores, port and harbour dues, and any further expenses attached thereto, to be borne by the purchasers.

The vessels will not be considered as delivered to, and finally accepted by, the purchasers until the said ships have passed the official trial trip in Genoa, have been approved in Genoa by the Italian Emigration Authorities, and all conditions of the contract have been fulfilled

8. On completion of each of the steamers at Greenock upon the terms and conditions aforesaid, the builders shall, in exchange for the purchase money due to them up to and including delivery instalment, and for a bank guarantee for the final instalment, hand over to the purchasers or their representative, the builders' certificate, British Lloyd's certificate and classification, Suez canal certificate, also chain and anchor, and other certificates as usual or necessary, or shall give an undertaking to hand over such certificates to the purchasers as soon as they are respectively received.

9. The builders shall pay the British Lloyd and Registro Italiano classification fees, Italian Board of Trade measurement fees, and the launching dues if any, as usual.

10. The purchasers are entitled to appoint an expert to superintend the construction of the vessels and the machinery; and it is hereby agreed that no alterations or extra work are to be made or done or charged for without the consent in writing of the said purchasers, per their representative, specifying the extra sum to be paid, and the additional time agreed, for such alteration or addition.

This clause is subject to special clause of the specifications.

11. The steamers shall be at the risk of the builders until they finally leave the Port of Greenock, up to which date the builders shall keep them insured against fire and other risks to an amount equal to the purchase money paid in advance.

The Sale of Goods Act provides as follows:—

Sect. 17. Property passes when intended to pass.—(1) Where there is a contract for the sale of specific or ascertained goods the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred.

for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer.

Rule 2. Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods and the seller is bound to do something to the goods for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until such thing be done or the buyer has notice thereof.

The case was heard in the Summar Roll on 5th November.

Argued for Respondents: The petition was incompetent and should be dismissed. The arrestee is not entitled to sue for the recal of arrestments used in his hands on the averment that the subjects arrested are his own property and not that of the common debtor without clear prima facie evidence in support of that averment. Where, as in the present case, the question is doubtful, the appropriate method of establishing the true ownership is in an action of furthcoming (Vincent v. Chalmers, 1877, 5 R. 43; Brand v. Kent, 1892, 20 R. 29; Duffus, 1857, 19 D. 430; Bildstein & Bock, 1872, 9 S.L.R. 512).

In the present case it was clear from the terms of the contract that the property had vested in the Italian purchasers during construction by the payment of cash instalments after inspection by the representative of the purchasers (Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14204, Bell Com., 7th ed., Vol. I. p. 189; Orr v. Tullis, 1870, 8 M. 936, per Lord Neaves at p. 950; Stewart & Co. v. Dobie, 1879, 7 R. 396 at pp. 400 and 409; M'Bain v. Wallace, 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 106, per Lord Watson at p. 116; Seath v. Moore, 1885, 12 R. 260, and 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 57, per Lord Watson at pp. 62, 64 and 65; Reid v. Macbeth & Gray, 1904, 6 F. (H.L.) 25).

Argued for the Petitioners: The petitioners were entitled to immediate recal of the arrestments. According to the terms of the contract the property of the ship must be held to be in the builders. This was a contract for the sale of a specific article, viz., a completed ship (Reid v. Macbeth & Gray, cit.). The ship in terms of the contract was not completed when arrested. The contract must be construed according to the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act. By that Act the intention of parties, as read from the contract, regulates the point of time at which the property of the article sold is to pass. If the parties do not clearly indicate their intention on this point the ordinary rules of the Act will apply to the construction of the contract. According to these rules, it must be held that there was in the present case no intention to transfer the property in the ships before delivery (Sale of Goods Act, sects. 5 (1), 16, 17, 18, 62 (1)).

The authority of the rule attributed to Simpson's case, and followed in subsequent cases, has been displaced by the observations upon it of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson in Seath v. Moore, cit. See also Wylie & Lochead v. Mitchell, 1870, 8 M. 552.

The Court recalled the arrestments without caution.

The Lord President.—My Lords, Sir James Laing & Sons Ltd., an English registered company, having an alleged claim against an Italian company, called the Lloyd Sabaudo Societa Anonima Di Navigazione of Turin, arrested two ships which were being built for that company by Barclay Curle & Co. Ltd., a Scottish company, the said ships being in their yard in the Clyde; and the present petition is a petition at the instance of Barclay Curle & Co. for the recal of the said arrestments, Barclay Curle & Co. averring that the ships at this present moment are theirs, and do not as yet belong to the Italian company, although they are admittedly being constructed upon the orders of that company. So far as one of the ships is concerned it is very near delivery. All that it still requires is to pass its trial in the Clyde, and afterwards to pass a trial at Genoa.

My Lords, the authorities upon this matter are not very numerous, but I think it is well that we should on this occasion lay down, with perhaps somewhat more precision than has hitherto been employed, the rules which I opine must obtain as to the recal of arrestments. Two cases were quoted to us in somewhat recent times—the case of Vincent v. Chalmers, 1877, 5 R. 43, and the case of Brand v. Kent, 1892, 20 R. 29. Those were both cases where the petition for recal was presented by a third party—and by a third party I mean one who was neither the arrestee nor the common debtor—and it was laid down in these cases, and I have no doubt whatsoever laid down perfectly rightly, that such questions as he wished to raise could not be raised and determined in a petition for the recal of arrestments. If a creditor, whom we will call A, arrests in the hands of the arrestee B in respect of the debt of the common debtor C, it may very well be that the thing or the debt arrested is not really due to C, but is due to somebody else, and if that somebody else, D, wishes to raise the question, he cannot raise it by a petition for the recal of the arrestment; he must raise it by some other appropriate form of process. As to that law I do not think there is any doubt. There is as little doubt that the common debtor may always petition for the recal of the arrestments upon the ground that they are nimious and oppressive, and that these arrestments may be recalled, in some cases simpliciter, but much more generally on caution.

But there remains the case with which we are going to deal—the case of where the person who wishes to get rid of the arrestment is the arrestee. There have been cases where the arrestments were recalled at the instance of the arrestee, and in particular we had cited to us the case of Duffus in 19 Dunlop, p. 430. The facts in Duffus's case were these. A ship was arrested as belonging to B. At the moment of the arrestment the ship was registered in the name of A, and A petitioned for the recal of the arrestment. It was argued for the arrester that the ship really belonged to B. Historically it had belonged to B, because it had been registered in B's name before it came to be registered in A's name. Their Lordships' held, and I think quite rightly, that that question could not be tried in that process; that they were bound to take the register as it stood, as being the proper evidence of title to a ship; and that, consequently, as the ship, according to the register, belonged to A it could not be arrested as if it had belonged to B. But I am bound to say, with great respect, although I think the judgment is perfectly right, I do not think that the criterion as laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk in that case can, on further consideration, be supported. His Lordship there makes a distinction between moveables to which there is no written or statutory title, and moveables to which there is a written title, and he says: "In the ordinary case of moveables, to which there is no written or statutory title, it is no objection to the competency of an arrestment that the arrestee says he has no funds of the common debtor, or that the same thing belongs to himself by virtue of preference, compensation, or otherwise. For, in a furthcoming, he can appear and assert and make good his right; and if he is confident of his right to the money, may use it in the meantime." But then, he says that when there is an actual written title, "no arrestment can competently be used, according to rules applicable to such diligence, in direct contradiction to that title."

My Lords, I am afraid that distinction won't do, and for this reason. So long as the thing arrested is a claim for money or a debt, it is quite true, as his Lordship says, that in a furthcoming the arrestee can appear and make good his right, and, in the meantime, no prejudice is created. The arrestee cannot be made to pay the alleged debt till the furthcoming, and, in the meantime, his general funds are laid under no embargo. It is quite obvious that that is not so in the case of a corporeal moveable, and for this very good reason that, if a corporeal moveable is arrested, and the arrestee wishes to say that it is his own, the arrestee has no power of either starting himself, or getting others to start a furthcoming; and accordingly, if he had not some other way of getting rid of the arrestment, he would be in this uncomfortable position that a nexus would be upon the subject which would put him in danger to deal with it, and, at the same time, he would have no possible means of starting a furthcoming in which he could appear to vindicate his right. It seems to me that the true distinction is between the arrestment of debts or sums due and the arrestment of corporeal moveables. In the case of the arrestment of debts or sums due, I think that the rule as laid down by Lord Justice-Clerk Hope holds perfectly good. There is no reason why a question of whether a sum is due or is not due should be taken up in the inconvenient form of a petition for the recal of arrestment, and for the very simple reason that the arrestee is not in any way hurt or damnified by waiting until a furthcoming is raised. An arrestment in the hands of A of all monies due by him to B does not put a nexus upon any particular money in A's hands, it does not prevent A from going on with his business, and using any money that he has got; it only attaches such sum as A is due to B, and it leaves A perfectly free in the furthcoming that is directed against him to say that he is due no sum to B. As your Lordships will remember, a furthcoming really first of all defines the sum that is due by the one to the other, and then it transfers it for the benefit of the creditor, who has made the arrestment, by way of adjudication. Accordingly, as long as it is a debt, there can be no expediency in trying to unravel these questions in a petition for recal, and there can be no harm in allowing them to stand over until a furthcoming is raised, if it is ever raised.

But when it comes to a corporeal moveable then the position seems to me quite different. When a corporeal moveable is arrested in the hands of A as truly belonging to B, and A wishes to say that it is his own and not B's at all, then, I think, he has an immediate interest to get that question decided. What would then happen I think depends upon circumstances. It may be that A, the arrestee, admits that the article in question belongs truly to B, but at the same time says that he has certain claims over it. Take, for instance, the case of a person who has had a corporeal moveable entrusted to his care for the purpose of performing some operation upon it, and has a good lien upon it for his charges—in such a case as that the question of how much he is entitled to by way of lien could perfectly well be tried in the furthcoming. There you have practically the admission of the arrestee that the subject does belong to somebody else, and is therefore well arrested, subject only to the fact that he has certain claims upon it. But where he makes no admission of the sort, it seems to me that the general position is that the possession of a moveable is prima facie evidence that it is his property—that is to say, it is prima facie evidence except with regard to a certain class of people, such as warehousemen and so on, whose business it is to have in their possession the property of others. Accordingly, it seems to me that if a person arrests a corporeal moveable in the hands of somebody else, alleging it to belong to a third person, he has got at least to make a prima facie case for saying so; and if he cannot make a prima facie case then it seems to me that the arrestee, who has had the corporeal moveable in his hands arrested, is entitled to say: "No prima facie case has been made out, therefore I am entitled to have the arrestment recalled." But when a prima facie case is made out, then I hesitate to give any general definition, because I think each case will depend upon circumstances; it will depend upon circumstances in each case whether there should be an immediate determination of the question, or whether there might not require to be an enquiry—I mean that, although I think a petition for recal of arrestments is always, so far as may be, a summary process, yet I can imagine a case in which it would be right to have an enquiry.

Barclay Curle & Co. Ltd. v. Sir James Laing & Sons Ltd.

The Lord President.

Now, my Lords, applying these doctrines to the present case what I find is this—an uncompleted ship, that is to say, a ship that has not come into the position of being registered, when, of course, the proper title is the title of registration, but is still in the builders' yard. Prima facie, it seems to me that ship belongs to the builders. Accordingly, if any one arrests the ship upon the ground that it does not belong to the builder, but that it belongs to somebody else, I think he is bound to give a prima facie reason for that assertion. In this case the respondents table what they say fulfils my desire. They table the contract under which, admittedly, the ship is being built; and accordingly this case is one of those cases where it is possible to give a judgment without further enquiry. We have here, admittedly, the document on which, and on which alone, the transference of the ship from the builders, who created it, to the third party, to whom it is now said to belong, depends.

Accordingly the question of whether this ship should be allowed to be arrested, as it has been, or whether the arrestment should be recalled, seems to me to turn upon the interpretation of the contract. I think the onus, so to speak, rests upon the person who wishes to show that the ship belongs, not to the builder to whom it would what I call naturally belong, but to someone else. We have the contract before us, and that brings one to the consideration of that branch of the law which has been much discussed in recent years, I mean the branch of the law which was illustrated in the case of Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14,204. I do not think it is necessary for your Lordships to try to add anything more to the elucidation of what was really originally decided in Simpson v. Duncanson. Probably a sufficient word, if not the last word, has been said about it in the judgment of Lord Watson in Seath v. Moore, 1886, 13 R. (H.L.) 57. One cannot help feeling that probably the doctrine of Simpson v. Duncanson had its origin in an endeavour to secure an equitable result in the teeth of what at that time was the very strict Scottish doctrine of the transfer of property, because there is no doubt that at the time of Simpson v. Duncanson you might contract in what terms you pleased — you might contract that property should pass—and yet it was impossible to make the property really pass without delivery, I mean delivery in the fullest sense of the word, including all forms of what may be called constructive delivery. But all that has now been altered. It was altered to a large extent by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. cap. 60), although, as has been often pointed out, that Act did not really alter the true conception of where the property was, but merely interfered with the right which sellers and purchasers in old times would have had. But the whole matter has been really altered by the Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 71), and now it is quite clear that by the law of Scotland if people choose so to contract they can pass the property of a thing which is being sold without delivery. That being so, it seems to me clear, and I think it should be clearly laid down, that if people want these consequences to happen they must really say so. There is not the slightest difficulty in so framing a contract, if it is wished, as between a shipbuilder and the person who is buying the ship, that the property in a gradually constructed ship shall be held to pass at certain stages; but if so, I think it must be clearly said.

My Lords, in the contract under discussion not only is that not clearly said, but I think the other thing is said. I think that the only sale that is found in this contract is the sale of a completed ship. It seems to me to resemble in that respect the contract in Reid v. Macbeth & Gray, 1904, 6 F. (H.L.) 25. Accordingly I am of opinion, upon the construction of this contract, that the property of the ship was not passed from Barclay Curle & Co., to whom undoubtedly it originally belonged, to the purchaser bit by bit as it came into existence. That question we cannot decide in this process, as in a question between Barclay Curle & Co. and the Italian purchaser, but we can decide it to the effect of saying whether the arresters have made out a prima facie case. I hold, accordingly, that the arresters here have not made out any case for the ship being the property of the common debtor, and that the arrestments fall to be recalled.

Lord M'Laren.—I have followed with much interest the exposition of this branch of the law given by your Lordship in the chair. I shall not attempt to go over the ground again, because I feel quite sure the various points of the case could not be put more clearly. But having regard to the large sum of money involved in this case, it may be right that I should state my opinion upon the point in which the parties to this dispute are chiefly interested. First, I think a distinction, a clear distinction, may be drawn between the arrestment of a seagoing ship, under maritime law, and such an arrestment as we are here dealing with. In the ordinary case of the arrestment of a ship within the jurisdiction—it may be in a harbour afloat—there is no arrestee. The ship is simply arrested by description for a debt of the owners, and this particular form of arrestment was, I think, originally confined to the Admiralty Courts, who exercised jurisdiction in rem. But this is a case of an arrestment of a ship which, although finished—because I think she was to make her trial trip yesterday or to-day—is still in the hands of the builders, physically undelivered. In such a case, and it may be in the case of other corporeal moveables, if the builder of the vessel admits that it is not his property, if he admits that according to his contract it has passed to the purchaser, he would not be in a position to raise any objection to the arrestment, and we should not have the case that is now before us. But if he says that this ship is his property I see no reason why he should not be allowed to determine that question in a petition for the recal of arrestments, because I do not see how it can be determined in any other process; and even if it could, he is put to the inconvenience of having his property meantime under an embargo until the issue of a case which it is supposed will determine the question of right. Accordingly, where the person in whose hands the ship is arrested, in this case the builder, claims that the ship is his own property, then, agreeing with your Lordship, I should hold that his possession, physical possession, raises a certain presumption in favour of his claim, and that it lies with the arresting creditor to show by the contract or documents of title that the true ownership is vested in the common debtor.

In this case, when we examine the contract of sale under which this ship was built, and apply to it the principles of the Sale of Goods Act under which this particular principle of the law of England was practically extended to Scotland—that property may or may not pass to the purchaser according to the wishes of the parties—I say, when we apply that principle to this case, then, as a matter of intention, I see no reason to doubt that it was the wish of both the seller and the purchaser that the ship should remain the property of the seller until payment of the penultimate instalment of the price and the completion of the trials. If it had been intended that there should be partial transfers of the property at the successive stages of payment of the instalments, it would have been easy to express that in the contract of sale. As it was not expressed, I presume that the parties did not desire that the property should pass in stages, but that on the contrary the Italian company, being perfectly convinced of the ability and willingness of the builders to fulfil their obligations, were content to wait until the ship was ready for use before claiming or desiring delivery. For these reasons I agree that these arrestments should be recalled; and I only add that this is not a case where they should be recalled upon caution. That is one reason why it has been necessary to consider the matter as one of contract right, because the idea of finding a cautioner for £200,000 is altogether absurd.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree entirely with all your Lordship has said, and I have only a few words to add. I think it is very material to observe in the outset that the arrestment we are asked to recal is a real diligence, that is to say, it is a diligence affecting two vessels specifically described in the petition by numbers and description, and has the effect of laying an embargo upon these ships, so that, whatever the interests in the property of the ships may be, they cannot be removed from the dock and shipbuilding-yard in which they are at present. That this is a totally different thing from the arrestment of a debt, and that the true owner of the ship has a perfectly good interest and a good title to say that the arrestments should be recalled, so that he may deal with his own property in the ordinary course of his business, is, I think, for the reasons your Lordship has already given, perfectly clear. I do not think that we can in this process decide any question of right as between the petitioners and the firm for whom they were building the ships, so as to form a res judicata as between these two parties, and for this plain reason that the competing interest or competing right, if there be any such right or interest, is not really represented by any of the parties to this process. If the ships do not belong to Barclay Curle & Co., and do belong to the Italian Society, the Italian Society is not here, and therefore we cannot decide the question of property. But I think we can decide whether the ship can be effectually arrested as the property of the Italian company, and, if it cannot, then the arrestments must be recalled.

My reason for deciding that question in the way your Lordship has explained is put, I think, briefly, and also very clearly and decisively, by Lord President M'Neill in the case of Duffus, 1857, 19 D. at p. 442. His Lordship's opinion does not proceed upon the distinction taken in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk upon which your Lordship has commented. The Lord President says: "The case of a ship is a peculiar one. It is peculiar as affects the nature of the property itself, and peculiar also as regards the nature of the title to that property. It is peculiar as to the manner in which the arrestments, once laid on, are to be followed up. Therefore, it is a case in which we are not to be led into the ordinary course of in dubio requiring caution. We must see our way more clearly in regard to the arrestment of a ship than in the ordinary case of arrestment"; and then he says that in such a case persons outside the jurisdiction ought not to be required to find caution. The doctrine with which he starts is, that in reference to this very peculiar arrestment, we must see clearly that the thing arrested is really subject to the diligence. Then he goes on to consider the question of title, and he says that upon the face of the title the ship is not the property of the common debtor for whose debts it is proposed to arrest it, and that the Court ought not to enter into an enquiry for the purpose of subverting the inference from the prima facie condition of the title. He says:—"If we were to enter into an enquiry as to the nature of the right in this ship, and to have proof of the facts adduced from Halifax, and then to enquire as to the law of that country and its effect upon this transaction, we would in effect expose these petitioners to all the evils which could arise from this vessel being detained till an ordinary action should dispose of this question." Therefore he declined to enter into that question for the purpose of setting up a right to use diligence against the prima facie fact of the title of property in the ship.

Barclay Curle & Co. Ltd. v. Sir James Laing & Sons Ltd.

Lord Kinnear.

Now, although we have here a ship that has not yet arrived at the stage at which we can have the same kind of prima facie title as in the case of a registered ship, yet the principle upon which the Lord President proceeds appears to me to be perfectly applicable, because we have in this case clear prima facie evidence of property in the petitioner and not in the common debtor. I agree with your Lordship that if it had not been for the Sale of Goods Act we might have had some difficulty in considering how far the question of property in a ship might or might not be affected by the decision of the case Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14,204, and of subsequent cases. The authority of Simpson v. Duncanson has been very much shaken, if not completely destroyed, by the observations that have been made upon it in the House of Lords, and it is extremely difficult to ascertain from the state of the record what was really decided. But the conclusive consideration, to my mind, upon that branch of the argument is that the law affecting the completion of rights of property by a contract of purchase and sale has been entirely altered by the Sale of Goods Act. At the date of that decision the law was that property could not pass without delivery, and the Court had to consider whether there had been, or had not been, something equivalent to delivery, in a case where it was plain upon the face of the facts that no actual delivery had taken place. Now, that is not the law. We have to seek the law as to the transference of property upon a contract of purchase and sale from the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, and that makes it clear that the question is one of intention upon the contract. What is the intention of the contract? The particular rule of the Sale of Goods Act which is said to apply, besides the general provision that the intention of parties as to the time at which the property of the goods is to pass to the buyer, is to be determined by the contract, is rule 2 of sect. 18, that unless a different intention appears from the terms of the contract, "where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods and the seller is bound to do something to the goods for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until such thing be done and the buyer has notice thereof." Now it appears to me that the operation of that clause in the particular question in hand is this, that where a contract has been made for the sale of a ship which is still in course of construction, although the ship may be so specifically identified as to fix it as the subject of the particular contract, still no property passes until it is in a deliverable state, or, in other words, until it is either delivered in a finished state or is so completed as to be ready for delivery, and is approved of by the buyer upon notice to him. Applying that rule to the terms of the particular contract in hand, I agree with your Lordship that upon the face of the contract there was no intention of delivery until the ship should be completed and sent to Genoa. Therefore there is under the contract no delivery, and the property still remains in the hands of the shipbuilder.

I do not depart from the observation with which I began, that we cannot decide the question of property as between the shipbuilders and the company with whom they had the contract; but we can decide, and I think we ought to decide, that there is a prima facie right of property in the shipbuilders, and that they ought not to be subjected to the extreme hardship and inconvenience of having their ship stopped in dock at the instance of a creditor of the firm for whom they are building, who cannot instantly verify that firm's preferable title to the ship. I agree especially with the observation made by Lord M'Laren, that to make it a condition of recalling the arrestments in this case that the shipbuilders should find caution would be altogether unjust and unreasonable. Therefore I agree that the arrestments should be recalled, so far as regards the ship, simpliciter.—7th November 1907.

Church — Glebe — Application for— Burghal-Landward Parish — Held That the Minister of the Parish of a Royal Burgh Which Included a Landward District Outwith the Burgh Boundaries Was Entitled to a Glebe—Acreage of Landward District Necessary to Make a Parish Burghal-Landward—Cumming and Others (Heritors of Arbroath) v. Thomson (Minister of Arbroath), 1883, 20 S.L.R. 781, Distinguished.

On 27th March 1906 the Rev. George Alpine, minister of the parish of Dumbarton, presented a petition to the Presbytery of Dumbarton praying the Presbytery to design and set apart a glebe from the lands surrounding the manse. Following upon this petition, the Presbytery, after certain procedure, on 16th May 1906 designed and set apart 5·03 acres of land adjoining the manse, and forming part of the lands of Aitkenbar and Overtoun. Against this deliverance the heritors and a committee appointed by them appealed to the Sheriff-Substitute (Blair), who on 1st February 1907 pronounced decree finding that Dumbarton was a burghal parish, and that the minister thereof was not entitled to a glebe, and recalling the presbytery's deliverance. The Rev. George Alpine appealed against this interlocutor.

On 12th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced decree, recalling the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor; finding that Dumbarton was a burghal parish with a landward district annexed, and that the minister was therefore entitled to a glebe; recalling the deliverance of the Presbytery designating a glebe; and remitting to David Rankine, Esq., C.E., to inspect the lands in the parish of Dumbarton, and report to the Court where four contiguous acres of arable land could be most readily found in the parish nearest to the church and manse.

Lord Mackenzie.—The question, whether the minister of the parish of Dumbarton is entitled to a glebe or not, depends upon whether the parish is to be considered burghal-landward or burghal. If it is burghal-landward he is entitled to a glebe. If it is burghal, he is not.

In the argument for the heritors it was conceded that prior to the Act of 1644, cap. 31, the ministers of all parishes had similar rights as regards glebes. That Act contains an exception which is expressed in the following words:—"Borrowstoun Kirks being always excepted." In the Act of 1663, cap. 21, the expression is "except such ministers of royal burghs who have not right to glebes." The passage in Ersk. Inst., II. X. 59, dealing with the matter is to the following effect: "But the ministers even of royal boroughs, where any part of the parish lies in the country, have right to a glebe." This passage has been founded on in previous cases, and also in the present, in support of the contention that though the parish consists simply of a royal burgh, neither more nor less, yet if within its bounds there are fields and farms where, as it has been put, "the corn grows and the lark sings," then there is sufficient to entitle the minister to a glebe. This was not the view taken by Lord M'Laren in the Arbroath case in 1883—Cumming and Others (Heritors of Arbroath) v. Thomson (Minister of Arbroath), 20 S.L.R. 781. It was there held that although there were 800 acres of arable land in the parish but within the charter of erection of Arbroath into a royal burgh, yet as there had been no disfranchisement of any part of the lands of the royalty, the so-called landward district remained as much a part of the royal burgh as it ever had been.

It was argued for the minister here that the present case could be distinguished from the case of Arbroath in regard to a number of particulars. The views expressed by Lord Medwyn in Auld v. Magistrates of Ayr, 1828, 6 S. 1087, were pressed as warranting the conclusion in the present case, that the existence of a landward district, though within the bounds of the royal burgh, was sufficient to take away from the parish its burghal character. Lord Medwyn's views were, however, undoubtedly obiter. They were not necessary for the decision in the Ayr case, as admittedly Alloway, a landward district which formed part of the parish, had never been within the bounds of the royal burgh of Ayr. Lord M'Laren in the Arbroath case having the decision in Auld v. Magistrates of Ayr fully before him, intended to decide, and did decide the general question adversely to the contention of the minister in the present case.

The question here, as it appears to me, is whether there are not sufficient grounds for deciding the case in favour of the minister without in any way impugning the judgment in the case of Arbroath. If any substantial part of the parish, not within but outside the boundaries as defined by the charter of erection of the burgh of Dumbarton, lies in the country, so that it can be regarded as a landward district, the dictum of Erskine, as limited by the decision in the Arbroath case, would apply, and the minister will be entitled to a glebe.

The only charter in favour of the Burgh of Dumbarton which defines the boundaries of the Royalty is the one granted by James VI. in 1609. The heritors contend that this is not, strictly speaking, a charter of novodamus, but rather one of confirmation, ratifying all previously existing grants. It is not possible, however, from any previously existing grant, to identify the extent of the subjects which were erected into the royal burgh of Dumbarton. The original charter by Alexander II. in 1222 throws little light upon the matter, because it merely states that the King had "created a burgh at my new castle of Dumbrittan." The only title therefore in which the boundaries of the Royal Burgh of Dumbarton are defined is the charter of 1609. It is important to observe that by that Charter there is confirmed to the bailies, councillors, burgesses, inhabitants and community of the Burgh of Dumbarton and their successors the common lands of the burgh "within the special bounds and marches thereof in terms of their annual perambulation," of which they then were in peaceable possession. Then follows the description of the lands. It is a fair inference that the magistrates considered in 1609 that the territory of the burgh was limited by the bounds and marches marked out in their annual perambulation.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie.

Alpine v. The Heritors of Dumbarton.

It was admitted by the heritors that the whole lands in the parish are not within the bounds of the Royal Burgh as defined by marches in the charter of 1609. No attempt was made on either side to shew what the precise line of the burgh boundary is. It is therefore not necessary to go into the evidence as to this, or to refer to the title to the fishings. It was conceded by the heritors that the lands which are within the parish but outside the boundaries as so defined are the lands of Kirkmichael. It is impossible these can be contained in the charter of 1609, because parts of the subjects which that charter bore to grant out are described as "Mercheand withe the said Williame Sempillis land of Kirkmichael on the north." If the subjects included in the charter of erection are described as bounded by other lands on the north, it necessarily follows that these lands are excluded. This makes it difficult to believe that the charter of 1609 ratified a previous grant to the burgh of these excluded lands. The lands of Kirkmichael so excluded from the description in the charter of 1609 are agricultural subjects of indeterminate extent. They extend, according to the admission of the heritors, to 300 acres. The minister puts their extent at more. It may be taken, however, at 300 acres.

The position of matters, therefore, is this: In 1609 a charter was granted to the royal burgh of Dumbarton by the Crown, which contains a description specifying what lies within the royalty, and this excludes the lands of Kirkmichael.

The heritors seek to meet this difficulty by contending that, although they cannot point to any title in favour of the burgh which expressly contains the lands of Kirkmichael, yet, as there is in the Crown titles of third parties a reference to the lands of Kirkmichael as within the liberty or within the territory of the burgh, this is sufficient to make them part of the burgh in a question with the minister. It is open to observation that no title has been referred to after the date of the Charter of 1609 that makes mention of the lands of Kirkmichael as being situated within the liberty or territory of the burgh. Even if the inference from the earlier titles were that the lands of Kirkmichael had at one time formed part of the territory of the burgh, it is evident from the terms of the Charter of 1609 that the Bailies who perambulated the bounds at that date, and who, it may be presumed, were the persons best acquainted with the boundaries of the burgh territory, did not consider that they then formed part of the Royal Burgh. This is not explained by suggesting that they had previously disposed of the property of these lands. It was of importance for them to preserve the original boundaries of the royalty unimpaired as regards jurisdiction and other matters.

Three titles are founded upon, earlier in date than the Charter of 1609, which are said to show that the lands of Kirkmichael did in 1609 form part of the Royal Burgh, and have continued to form part thereof down to the present date. These are No. 15/6 of Process, a letter of Gift by King Robert the Bruce in favour of William Fleming dated in 1321 of the land of Kirkmichael, which is described as being within the liberty of Dumbarton; No. 15/7 of Process, a Crown Charter in favour of Robert Hamilton of Fulwood, dated in 1465, in which the lands of Kirkmichael with pertinents are described as "lying within the territory of our Burgh of Dumbarton"; and No. 15/8 of Process, a Crown Charter in favour of Robert Sempill of Fulwood, dated in 1502, where the lands of Kirkmichael with pertinents are again described as "lying within the territory of our Burgh of Dumbarton." Counsel for the heritors admitted in argument that these two Crown Charters placed the title of Kirkmichael in an anomalous position. Whether they were kirk lands, as the name would suggest, and whether this had anything to do with it, does not appear. These are charters by the King of subjects said to be held burgage. A reference was made to Dallas's Styles, p. 527; but the Charter printed there shows that the lands had returned to the King on account of bastardy; (I apprehend a similar form would be followed in the case of escheat) but except in such cases, which I may call rather an interruption than a continuance of the title, the only way by which, so far as I am aware, subjects once held burgage, could return to the King to be granted out would be by resignation. I do not overlook the statutes by which castles and lands were annexed to the Crown, but except in certain cases these were inalienable. It was contended for the heritors that they had in these charters what was of importance for their argument, namely a declaration under the hand of the sovereign that the subjects "are situated" within the territory of Dumbarton. If this is pleaded to the extent the heritors desire to carry it — that the tenure of the subjects was at that date properly burgage,—then there should have been in gremio of the charter a narrative shewing how the lands had returned to the King. Reference is made in the Charter of 1502 to the fact that the lands of Kirkmichael had been resigned in the hands of the Bailies of the Burgh of Dumbarton. So far, however, from this being the warrant upon which the Crown Charter proceeds, it is mentioned, as I read the charter, in order that its validity may be repudiated. The King grants and ordains that no prejudice or injury should be engendered or accrue to the Crown grantee or his heirs through any resignations made by the deceased father of the grantee, nor by the grantee himself, in the hands of the Bailies of the Burgh of Dumbarton, nor through infeftments and sasines granted thereupon by the Bailies, and that the King would not pursue the grantee or his heirs to the injury of himself or his heirs on account of the said resignations, infeftments, and sasines. It is difficult to reconcile this with the theory that, at the date of the Charter, the lands of Kirkmichael were held burgage. It was said that the practice was lax at this time, and reference was made in this connection to the Act 1567, cap. 27. That Act, however, proceeds on the preamble that great hurt was done within burgh by giving of sasines privately without any bailie and common clerk of burgh, and ordains that no sasine should be given within burgh of any land or tenement but by one of the Bailies of the Burgh and the common clerk thereof. The sasines following upon the resignations referred to in the Charter of 1502 are referred to as having been granted by the Bailies of the Burgh, and therefore would not be open to the objection contained in the preamble of the Act. The fact that there was an old controversy whether burgesses are individually Crown vassals, or whether the corporation or whole body of the town is the vassal, the individual burgesses holding of the Crown only as members of the corporation, does not aid the argument for the heritors. Their argument is not that these charters are consistent with a previously existing burgage history of the subjects. They found on them as instructing that the subjects are burgage. The reddendo in each of these charters bears to be in the one case the services, and in the other the services and duties due and customary from the said lands. Upon this it was maintained for the heritors that such a reddendo was applicable to ward holding, and therefore supported their arguments that the holding was burgage; and further, that the reference to custom shewed that the grant was not a new one. These titles are used as evidence to shew that the lands of Kirkmichael must have been included in the charter of 1222. I do not think the evidence of this is sufficient. Further, I am of opinion that the conveyancing history of the lands of Kirkmichael is inconsistent with the idea that in 1609 they were held burgage or formed part of the royalty of the burgh. This view is, in my opinion, confirmed by a reference to the deeds after 1609 relating to the lands of Kirkmichael. The first of these is No. 15/9 of process, which is a retour of special service of William Sempill in the lands of Kirkmichael, dated in 1641. In this the lands of Kirkmichael are not described as lying within the territory of the burgh of Dumbarton, but as lying in the parish of the burgh of Dumbarton. The reference to the territory of Dumbarton had then dropped out of the description. It appears from the evidence of Mr George Scott that from the date of this retour in 1641 there is not in any of the titles which he had examined, any reference to the situation of Kirkmichael as being either in the parish or the burgh territory. I should have observed that I do not think the expression in the retour of 1641, the parish of the burgh of Dumbarton, can be founded on with much effect by the heritors. It was maintained that this negatives the idea of there being a parish of Dumbarton apart from the burgh. I think it just leaves where it was the question whether there was a landward district annexed.

For the reasons above stated I feel bound to come to a different conclusion to that reached by the learned Sheriff-Substitute, who has bestowed great pains upon the case. I am unable to hold that Dumbarton is merely a burghal parish.

The charter of 1609 must, in my opinion, be taken as the measure of the rights of the burgh. There is, outside the limits of this charter, an area of agricultural land of sufficient extent to be called a landward district. It was contended that this area was so small relatively to the rest of the parish that it could not be held to constitute a landward district. The dictum of Erskine, however, is that where any part of the parish lies in the country, the minister, even of a royal burgh, has right to a glebe. In the case of Auld, the obiter dictum of the Lord Justice-Clerk is: "I have always understood a burrowstoun kirk to mean that of a burgh where there is no country district"; and the views which were expressed, also obiter, by Lord Medwyn were to the same effect. If the views of Erskine, and the dicta of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn, were to be applied here, the existence of the lands of Kirkmichael in the parish would entitle the minister to a glebe.

In the Arbroath case Lord M'Laren expressed the opinion that these dicta could not be applied in the case of agricultural land within the charter of erection. This, however, is not the case with the lands of Kirkmichael, which are not within the royalty. I do not overlook the fact that in the Arbroath case there were about five acres in a similar position. This extent of land could not be held to be a landward district, and was not in that case represented to be so. Lord M'Laren's view was that it is the tenure that must determine the liability of the parish to provide a glebe. If the test of tenure be applied, I am of opinion, as already stated, that there is no evidence in the titles that the lands of Kirkmichael were held burgage in 1609. If the heritors had been able to shew that these lands were contained in the original charter, and if they were still described as lying within the territory of the burgh, then, though the holding was now direct of the Crown, these facts might have been sufficient to prevent their being held to be a landward district. This is dealt with by Lord Medwyn in the Ayr case. Here, however, I am unable to take the view that the heritors, upon whom the onus lies, have established that Kirkmichael was ever anything but a landward part of the parish.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Mackenzie.

Alpine v. The Heritors of Dumbarton.

If the test to be applied is that of tenure, it is not necessary to go into the various other points which were argued. I have given these all due consideration in regard to the position of the heritors and their relation to the church, manse, and glebe; the ownership of the teinds of Kirkmichael by the burgh, which is explained by the grant of patronage which they held; and the payment of stipend from the teinds of the lands within and outside the boundaries in the charter of erection. It is apparent that no distinction was made between Kirkmichael and agricultural subjects which were within the royalty, and the argument for the minister is thus weakened. The lands of Kirkmichael have, however, in my opinion, the necessary incidents of a landward district attaching to them.

As regards the plea of acquiescence, the facts are that the successive ministers have since 1632 had something in lieu of a manse, and since 1763 something in lieu of a glebe. When, however, the history of these matters is enquired into there is not, in my opinion, sufficient to support this plea.

The argument that the charter of 1609 was ultra vires it is not necessary to consider. I may, however, say that I do not think this sound. The saving clause in the ratifying Act may be held to apply to matters of private right. It could not affect the public law. I am unable to see how an Act passed in 1644 could disable the King from granting a charter in 1609.

Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the minister is entitled to a glebe.—12*th November* 1907.

PROCESS—PURSUERS—TITLE TO SUE—EDUCATION—ALLEGED DEFAULT OF GOVERNING BODY OF EDUCATIONAL TRUST—ACTION OF INTERDICT BY PUPILS APPLYING FOR BURSARIES AND THEIR FATHERS AND ADMINISTRATORS AT LAW—REMEDY PROVIDED BY STATUTE TO PERSONS HAVING A VESTED INTEREST IN THE ENDOWMENT—THE EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) ACT 1882 (45 & 46 VICT. CAP. 59), SECT. 46.

This was an action of suspension and interdict by certain pupils of Caledonian Road School, Perth, and Perth Academy, who were applicants for "Duncan Bursaries" for sessions 1907 to 1908, and their fathers and administrators in law, seeking to have the Perth Educational Trust and its Governors interdicted from awarding the "Duncan Bursaries" for said session until the parties entitled thereto had been ascertained by a competitive examination duly intimated by advertisement in terms of clause 26 of a scheme under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act 1882, for the administration of the endowments known as Sharp's Institution, etc.; and in particular to have the respondents interdicted from (1) fixing the value of said bursaries at less than the annual sum of £5 each, in addition to the annual fees payable by the bursar; and (2) giving a preference to pupils of promise who desire to complete the curriculum of Sharp's Institution.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia, no title to sue, and argued that the complainers, being persons having a vested interest in the endowment in the sense of sect. 46 of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act 1882, had a remedy provided to them by that section, and were bound either to make use of that remedy as the sole means of achieving their purpose, or at any rate to exhaust that remedy before applying for interdict.

The complainers argued: (1) that no remedy was conferred on them by the statute of 1882; and (2) that if it were, it was not an exclusive remedy which could bar them from proceeding by interdict.

Sect. 46 of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act is in these terms:—

If the governing body of any educational endowment fail to give effect to the provisions of any scheme approved under this Act, or of any provisional order made and confirmed under the Endowed Institutions (Scotland) Act, or the Endowed Institutions (Scotland) Act 1878, it shall be lawful for the Scotch Education Department, upon the application of the town council of any burgh directly affected by such scheme or provisional order, or of the school board, or of any ratepayers (not less than twenty) of any burgh, or parish, or place directly affected thereby, or of any person or persons having a vested interest in the endowment or any part of it, and after such enquiry as they shall think proper, to send a requisition to such governing body, requiring them to give effect to the provisions of the scheme or provisional order; and the governing body shall comply with the said requisition without undue delay, and, if they fail, may be summarily compelled to do so by the Court of Session, on a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate.

There was also an argument before the Lord Ordinary on the merits of the complaint, and in his opinion the Lord Ordinary expressed his view thereon, favourably to the complainers; but his Lordship decided the case on the preliminary plea, and held that the complainers had no title to sue.

Lord Guthrie.—The respondents plead no title to sue. They admit that the complainers have sufficient interest to entitle them to be heard against the decisions of the respondents which are complained of. But they allege that the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act of 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. cap. 59), sect. 46, provides a remedy for the complainers, not utilised by them, and they maintain that no other remedy is open to the complainers, or otherwise that the complainers cannot come to the Court until their statutory remedy has been exhausted.

The complainers reply, first, that no remedy is conferred upon them by the statute of 1882; and second, that in any case their right to come to the Court is not excluded by the statute.

I construe sect. 46 in accordance with the respondents' argument. I reckon the complainers among the "persons having a vested interest in the endowment," reading vested, not in its technical sense, which it cannot mean, but as equivalent to direct. If so, it seems to me that the case falls within the rule laid down by Lord Tenterden in Bridges, 1831, 1 B. and A. 847,859, "where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner, we take it to be a general rule that performance cannot be enforced in any other way." That rule was otherwise expressed by Lord Halsbury in Pasmore, 1898, A.C. 387,394, "where a specific remedy is given by a statute, it thereby deprives the person who insists upon a remedy of any other form of remedy than that given by the statute." The substance of the rule has been enforced in many Scotch cases, such as Aberdeenshire Trs. v. Knowles, 1811, Hume 262; Portobello Magistrates v. Edinburgh Magistrates, 1882, 10 R. 130, 137 per Lord Justice-Clerk; Denny v. Board of Trade, 1880, 7 R. 1019, per Lord President 1025, foot. If it be contended that either the statute as a whole, or public policy, warrants a departure from the general rule, I answer in the words of Lord Macnaghten in Pasmore, 1898, A.C. at p. 397: "Whether the general rule is to prevail, or an exception to the general rule is to be admitted, must depend on the scope and language of the Act which creates the obligation, and on considerations of policy and convenience. It would be difficult to conceive any case in which there could be less reason for departing from the general rule than one like the present."

I heard an argument also on the merits of the complaint tabled by the complainers against the actings of the respondents. I may briefly indicate my view.

The complainers object to the prospectus issued by the respondents in April 1907 in connection with the Duncan bursaries, in so far as it, first, does not prescribe competitive examination; second, intimates that in selecting bursars the respondents will give a preference to those pupils who propose to attend Sharp's Institution rather than the Perth Academy; and, third, fixes the amount of the bursaries at £9 each including the bursar's fees.

I think the complainers are right on all these points.

In regard to competition, the Scheme says in so many words that the bursaries shall "be awarded by competitive examination." I attribute the omission for the first time from the prospectus of any reference to competition to the respondents' resolution to hold themselves free, whatever qualifying examinations they may insist on, to dispense with the open competition which the Scheme contemplated and which has been in use ever since the approval of the Scheme in 1889. This seems to me contrary to a sound construction of the 26th clause of the Scheme.

As to the respondents' resolution to give a preference to those pupils of promise who desire to complete the curriculum of Sharp's Institution, I think this contravenes the true meaning of clause 26 of the Scheme. The clause has evidently been bungled. After the words "to complete the curriculum of the said Institution," should probably have come "or of the Perth Academy." But the contrast in the last sentence makes the matter clear. Bursaries can only be held at schools other than Sharp's Institution and the Perth Academy, with the consent of the governors. It follows that they can be held at whichever of these schools the bursars prefer, without any right of interference on the part of the Governors.

The third point relates to the amount to be paid to each bursar. The prospectus says, "The Governors offer eleven bursaries of £9 each, to include fees of the bursar." This does not carry out the scheme of clause 26, which provides: "These bursaries shall be of the annual value of not less than £5, and not more than £10, in addition to the fees payable by the bursar." The prospectus, on the other hand, offers a lump sum of £9 which it calls a bursary. It is not a bursary. It is a combination of a bursary and of an assumed sum for fees. But the Governors are bound to fix the amount or amounts of the bursaries, and to pay the fees in addition, however much they may amount to. The result of the prospectus is to prevent any bursars attending any but the earlier classes in Perth Academy, and thus by a roundabout method to limit the choice of the students to Sharp's Institution.—16*th November* 1907.

194. Hay's Trustees v. Baillie and Others.

Trust — Constitution — Uncertainty — Direction to Trustees to Divide Among "Such Societies of a Charitable or Benevolent Nature as They Should Select" Held Void From Uncertainty.

This was an action of multiplepoinding at the instance of the trustees of the late Mrs Hay of Holmwood, Uddingston, in which they sought to have it determined whether the bequest of residue in Mrs Hay's will was valid or void from uncertainty.

The facts of the case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary held the bequest void from uncertainty.

Lord Johnston.—The late Mrs Hay of Holmwood, Uddingston, directed her trustees to apportion and pay over the free portion of the residue of her estate "to or amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions" as in their discretion they should think proper, but always to the exclusion of Roman Catholic societies or institutions. The validity of this bequest is challenged by the testator's next of kin, who maintain that it is void on the ground of uncertainty, in respect that though "charitable" has, since the case of Crichton, in 1828, 3 W. and S. 329, been recognised as sufficiently descriptive of a class of objects or institutions to receive effect in discretionary bequests of this nature, the alternative word "benevolent" is not so descriptive and has not been so recognised.

The trustees who support the bequest did not, I think, go the length of maintaining that "benevolent" and "charitable," taken by themselves as words in common use in the English language, are identical in meaning. But I think I may state their contention as embraced in these three propositions:

First, that in the collocation of words used by the testatrix the disjunctive "or" must be read as equivalent to the conjunction "and."

Second, that "benevolent" is identical with "charitable," or at least is used by the testatrix as equivalent to "charitable," so that the use of both words is a mere redundancy or surplusage.

Third, that the law of Scotland shews such favour to charitable bequests, that to give effect to the bequest it will read "benevolent or charitable" as intended to express no more than "charitable"; in fact, appeal is made to the principle of benignant interpretation of charitable bequests.

Taking these points in their order:

First, it is true that the conjunction "and" is sometimes read as having the same effect as the disjunctive "or." I cannot better illustrate this construction than by comparing the two cases of Cobb's Trs. (1894), 21 R. 638, and Williams v. Kershaw (1835), 5 Cl. & F. 111. In Cobb's case the words were "useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions"; in Williams v. Kershaw there were "benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes." In the former case the three adjectives were capable, in natural combination, of qualifying the same institution, and there was no call therefore to read the "and" as otherwise than conjunctive. Whereas in the latter case the three qualifications were not naturally found combined in the same institution, and therefore, to give a reasonable interpretation to the adjectives in combination, it was necessary to read the "and" as distributive and not conjunctive, and that necessity is the only justification of the interpretation (see Lord Rutherfurd Clark in Cobb's case at p. 641).

But where the distributive "or" is used there can never be the similar necessity for interpreting it as conjunctive. If the qualifying adjectives are mere equivalents, it does not matter whether they are connected conjunctively or disjunctively. If they are not mere equivalents, but being distinctive in meaning, are capable of alternative use, there is no necessity to construe the distributive "or" in any other than its natural meaning, and every reason for construing it in that meaning. And this, I think, will apply even though the adjectives disjunctively used have in part a common sense, that is, to a certain extent overlap.

I cannot therefore read "or" as equivalent to "and". No instance was quoted to me in which this has been done.

Nor do I think it possible to accept the argument in an alternative from, viz., that the terms "benevolent" and "charitable" are merely exegetical of one another. So to read them would be to go against a cardinal canon of interpretation of such documents. It would be to deny to each word its natural and ordinary meaning, without any compelling reason. Presumably where a testatrix says benevolent she means benevolent, and when she says "or charitable" she means something different from benevolent. Moreover, which word is exegetical of the other? It must be contended that it is "charitable" which is exegetical of benevolent, as the latter comes first—as if the lady had said "benevolent," and then caught herself up, seeing that she had used too wide a word, and added, "by which I mean charitable." I cannot think it possible to put such a gloss upon the words, without finding an intention for her by my own surmise, and not from the words she uses.

Second, is "benevolent" equivalent to "charitable"? I think not. I think it may be said that everything which is "charitable" is "benevolent," as the less is included in the greater. But I do not think that everything "benevolent" can be included in the term "charitable," whether that term be used in the more technical English sense or in the less technical Scottish sense. On the contrast between the two words I refer to Lord Bramwell's judgment in Pemsel's case, L.R. [1891], A.C. 531.

I approach this question from the point of view expressed by Sir William Grant, M.R., in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, (1804) 9 Ves. 399, where he says: "The question is, not whether the trustee may not apply it upon purposes strictly charitable, but whether he is bound so to apply it." This has been repeatedly stated by other judges, and can not be controverted. If, then, "benevolent" covers more than charitable, though the trustees might confine themselves to what was strictly charitable, that would not support the bequest if they need not so restrict themselves, and might apply the funds committed to them to what is benevolent but not charitable. And if benevolent is not descriptive of a particular class of which the law can take cognisance, the bequest must, according to the well-established rule, fail.

The term "benevolent" has occurred in a number of cases in Scotland and England (1) by itself, (2) along with "charitable" or other terms used conjunctively, and (3) along with "charitable" or other terms used disjunctively. Where used by itself and where used disjunctively it has been rejected as indefinite, but where used conjunctively it has been sustained as not vitiating the bequest, provided its colleague is sufficiently definite on the ground that if a purpose is, for instance, charitable and therefore in the eye of the law definite, it does not render it indefinite that it must be not only charitable but also benevolent—ça va sans lire, though the converse may not hold true.

But before referring to the cases, a word as to the applicability of English cases in this question. I shall, under the third head, have to consider the specialties of the English law with regard to charities. But I find nothing in it which precludes English authorities on this particular aspect of the question being received in Scotland. Both in England and in Scotland "charitable" is accepted as in the eye of the law sufficiently descriptive of a particular class of purposes to be definite. There may be a question whether the limits of the class are quite the same in the law of the two countries, and I think, notwithstanding a certain generality of statement on the subject sometimes found, that they are narrower in Scotland rather than the reverse. But I apprehend that the question whether another descriptive term not "charitable" is sufficiently definite, or is too indefinite to be recognised, is the same question, whether it arises in Scotland or in England, and I am therefore prepared to accept English decisions on that point, not as authorities indeed, but as guides which I should hesitate to discard.

(1) In James v. Allen (1817), 3 Mer. 17, the word "benevolent" was used by itself, and Sir William Grant, M.R., holding that "though many charitable institutions are very properly called 'benevolent,' it is impossible to say that every object of a pious benevolence is also an object of true charity," determined, that as the property might consistently with the will be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust was too indefinite for the Court to execute, and could not receive effect. I acknowledge that by "charitable purposes" he means those purposes "specified in the statute of Queen Elizabeth," or that have been held to be within the analogies of that statute; but, as already stated, I find these purposes at any rate no narrower than the term "charitable purposes" as understood in Scotland.

In the preceding case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham, supra, where the expression used was "objects of benevolence and liberality," the same conclusion had been reached. Sir William Grant, M.R., points out, what is as true in Scotland as in England, that the general rule is that every trust must have a definite object, but that this doctrine does not hold good with regard to trusts for charity. "It is well settled," he says, "upon authority which it is too late to controvert, that when a charitable purpose is expressed, however general, the bequest shall not fall on account of the uncertainty of the object," and the words might since the case of Crichton, supra, have been used by a Scottish judge. But then, he asks, "is this a trust for charity? Do purposes of liberality and benevolence mean the same as objects of charity?" and these questions he answers in the negative.

There is a further passage in Lord Eldon's judgment in that case which has an important bearing on the present. "The principle upon which that trust [referring to Browne v. Yeall, referred to in 7 Ves. 50] was ill declared, is this.

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

Hay's Trustees v. Baillie and Others.

As it is a maxim that the execution of a trust shall be under the control of the Court, it must be of such a nature that it can be under that control so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the Court; or if the trustee dies the Court itself can execute the trust; a trust, therefore, which in case of maladministration could be reformed; and a due administration directed, and then, unless the subject and the object can be ascertained, upon principles familiar in other cases, it must be decided that the Court can neither reform maladministration, nor direct a due administration. That is the principle of that case." Now, although the Court in Scotland has not developed its Chancery jurisdiction on such precise and perhaps technical lines as has that in England, and although it has not been so ready to interfere in trust matters as the Court of Chancery does, by way of suits for administration and other uses (see Lewin on Trusts, ch. 24, sect. 2 (15) and (16), 11th ed. p. 753; and compare the Irish case of Hagan v. Duff (1889), 23 L.R. Ir. 516), it does intervene in its own way to correct abuses, prevent diversion, and settle and alter schemes; and I conceive that the principle enunciated by Lord Eldon is just as applicable in Scotland as in England, and that the reason why a trust for an indefinite purpose is refused effect in Scotland as in England, is just because the Court could not control its execution if called upon.

(2) Again, "benevolent" and "charitable" in conjunction have been sustained on the ground that the "charitable" bequest was not vitiated by the farther qualification of "benevolent;" as in Hill v. Burns (1826), 2 W. and S. 80; Millar v. Black's Trs. (1837), 2 S. and M. 866; Cobb's Trs. (1894), 21 R. 638; In re Best [1904], Ch. 354; and compare In re Sutton, L.R. (1885), 28 Ch. D. 464), where "charitable" is qualified by "and deserving." With reference to the case of Cobb, I am bound to notice that Lord Trayner would appear to regard "benevolent" and "charitable" as synonymous. But I can hardly consider what he says as a judgment to that effect, but rather as the acceptance of an assumed admission. I say assumed, because I think the argument was misconceived, and that no such admission was made. It was admitted that, standing the authority of Hill v. Burns, supra, no objection could be maintained to the expression "benevolent and charitable" in conjunction. Such argument as could be submitted was based on the adjection of the word "useful," upon which necessarily the whole stress was laid in support of the contention that the "and" should be read distributively.

(3) Where "benevolent" has been connected by the distributive "or" with "charitable," the effect has been held to be destructive of the definitions of the trust purpose (Williams v. Kershaw, 1835, 5 C.L. 1 F. 111; In re Jarman's Estate (1878), L.R. 8 Ch. D. 584; In re Rilands (1881), W.N. 173).

In these cases the same conclusion of indefiniteness or failure to particularise the class intended to be benefited was reached, which led to the judgment in the analogous cases of Ellis v. Selby (1836), 1 M. and Cr. 286, where the expression was "charitable or other purposes"; Duncan v. Blair, 1900, 3 F. 274 and 1901, 4 F. (H.L.) 1, where the expression was "charitable or public"; and Grimond's Trs. (1904), 6 F. 285 and (1905), 7 F. (H.L.) 90, where the expression was "charitable or religious."

Grimond's case is, I think, of special importance, as the last pronouncement of the House of Lords on the subject, and because the Lord Ordinary and the majority of the Inner House were in different ways prepared to give that restricted meaning to "religious" which would have made it, in their opinion, at least, as definite as "charitable," and which, had the judgment stood, would have justified such a restriction of "benevolent" as would have made it synonymous with "charitable."

My own opinion is that "benevolent" is a word of too wide meaning to be descriptive of a particular class of objects, and I find confirmation of this opinion in the English cases cited.

(3) Is there in Scotland such favour to charitable bequests that the Court will, to give effect to a testator's beneficent intention, read charitable so wide as to be equivalent to benevolent, or so restrict "benevolent" as to be equivalent merely of "charitable"?

Much has been said of the difference in Scottish and English law in the use of the word "charitable," and it is maintained that in England the word has a narrower and technical and in Scotland a wider and more liberal meaning. I admit that it has in England a technical meaning, but if not the same in result, I think it is wider rather than narrower than that which it has in Scotland.

In contrasting the law of England and Scotland I am unable to follow the reasoning of one of the learned judges in Cobb's case, supra, when he says that "nothing can illustrate more strongly the vital distinction between the two systems than to contrast the English cases of Williams v. Kershaw, supra, and In re Jarman's Estate, supra, with the judgments of the House of Lords sitting as a Court of Appeal from Scotland in Hill v. Burns, supra, and Miller v. Black's Trustees, supra." I have endeavoured to trace this contrast without success. The different result arrived at in these cases by the Courts of the two countries depend upon no distinction between their two systems of jurisprudence, but merely on the fact that the English Courts were dealing with terms actually or constructively distributive, and the Scottish Courts with terms actually conjunctive. But for this fact there would, I am satisfied, have been no difference in the judgments.

In England the expression "charitable" derives its meaning from the Act of Queen Elizabeth passed to provide a control over maladministration of charities. That Act has received from the Court a wide interpretative application, in the same manner as our Triennial Prescription Act has received. And it covers charitable purposes of the eleemosynary character, educational purposes, religious purposes and certain public purposes, such as supply of water to a locality, building of sea dykes, etc.; but subject to this condition that each and all of these purposes must be public and not private in their purview, an excellent example of which is the case of Cocks (1871) L.R. 12 Eq. 574 (585). It is clear that some of these purposes would be benevolent but hardly charitable in any ordinary sense, and I think that there can be no doubt that trustees in Scotland with a discretionary power to apply funds to charitable purposes would be restrained from applying them to some of these.

In Scotland, on the other hand, there is no statutory foundation for the interpretation and no statutory jurisdiction conferred on the Court. But I think much has been borrowed from England. Apart from decision, it has often been stated from the Bench that "charitable" is indefinite in itself, and but for favour to charity would never have been accepted as descriptive of a sufficiently particular class of objects. But two leading decisions made it a vox signata in Scotland, and thenceforth determined that it must be accepted as sufficiently particular.

In Hill v. Burns, 1826, 2 W. and S. 80, the main question at issue was whether a testator could invoke the alienum arbitrium to any effect, in the distribution of his estate. On a review of prior Scottish cases Lord Gifford deduced the conclusion that the law of Scotland was more liberal in the construction of charitable than of other bequests, and held that the above position had been accepted. He then sustained without further reasoning, a bequest in favour of institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes established, or to be established, in or near Glasgow.

In Crichton's case, 1828, 3 W. and S. 329, Lord Lyndhurst, after laying down the proposition that to admit of discretion being conferred on trustees, the object of their discretion must be a particular class, decided that "charitable" by itself must be accepted as sufficiently particular. And that has been the law of Scotland ever since. But in determining this he had no direct authority except Hill v. Burns, supra, and it is clear that he went a good deal beyond it, and, I cannot help thinking, was much influenced by his English Chancery experience.

But though Crichton's case is the rule of Scottish law it does not determine what the limits of "charitable" are, and it does not follow from that decision that the favour for charity which has induced the Court to accept "charitable" as definition of a sufficiently particular class of objects, will further induce the Court to give to "charitable" a loose and vague meaning, so as to cover anything which may be classed as benevolent.

This subject has been matter of discussion in two later cases—in Baird's Trustees (1888), 15 R. 682, and Pemsel's case, L.R. [1891], A.C. 531. In the former case in Scotland the opinion of the Court was that "charitable" must, in interpreting the section of the Income Tax Act which gives relief to charitable institutions, have the meaning which they conceived it to have in the class of cases with which I am dealing, viz. the restricted sense of eleemosynary or material relief to physical necessity.

In the latter case, when the same question under the income tax had arisen in England, opinions were expressed that too narrow a view had been taken by the Scottish Court in Baird's Trustees, supra, and that whatever the term charitable might cover, if it required to be interpreted in applying a bequest such as that in the present case, the statutory meaning of the expression was much wider than they had assumed. Perhaps the most general definition of the view of the majority of the Court—for Lord Halsbury (L.Ch.) and Lord Bramwell dissented—was that given by Lord Herschell, to the effect that charity included even in Scotland anything done in relief of human need, whether physical, educational, or religious.

It has yet to be determined in a proper case of the application of such a bequest in Scotland as distinguished from a case under the Income Tax Acts, whether the view of the First Division in Baird's Trust, or that of the majority of the House of Lords in Pemsel's case, is the correct view. But in no event is there any ground for saying that "charity" and "charitable" in Scotland can receive a wider signification than it has received in England, or than Lord Herschell's attempted definition in Pemsel's case, and that is, I think, and on the authorities I have cited, very far short of benevolent.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that I must hold this bequest void from uncertainty.—14*th November* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Defenders reclaimed and argued: (1) Mr Buckley did not "deposit" his bag "expressly for safe custody." All he did was to give it to the "Boots" without saying anything to him or to either of the defenders about looking after it. (2) The bag was not lost through the "fault" of the defenders. By the Act of 1863 the onus of proving fault was put on the pursuer, and he had not discharged that onus (Medawer v. Grand Hotel [1891], 2 Q.B. 11; O'Conner v. Grand International Hotel Co., 1898, 2 Ir. R. Q.B.D. 92; Moss v. Russell, 1884, 1 Times, L.R. 13; Marchioness of Huntly v. Bedford Hotel Co. Ltd., 56 J.P. Rep. 539).

Argued for Respondents: (1) There was a deposit "expressly for safe custody." Mr Buckley had visited the hotel some seventy times in all, and each time put his bag in the office. It must have been put there for "safe custody" in terms of the Act, and it was not necessary for him to say so each time he handed it to the office, as the defenders knew it was valuable and that it was handed in to be taken care of. He was following the invitation in the notice exhibited in the hotel to leave valuables in the office. The notice referred to the Act of 1863, and could mean nothing else than that the defenders would, in terms of that Act, accept responsibility for valuables left in the office. (2) The bag was lost through the "fault" of the defenders. The onus was on the defenders to prove there was no negligence (Taylor on Evidence, sect. 376). The defenders got the bag and did not return it, and it was for them to prove there was no negligence. The facts were known only to the defenders, and the pursuer could not be expected to prove negligence when he could not know the facts (Bell's Com., 7th ed. Vol. I. p. 495, Note 3). There was negligence on the part of the defenders, apparent from the proof. It was either in the "Boots" in not telling the defenders the bag was handed to him to look after, or in the defenders in not keeping a proper watch on the bag (Watson v. North British Railway Co., 1876, 3 R. 637; Bell's Prin., sects. 167 and 170).

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and found the defenders liable in damages to the amount of £30, which had been tendered by the defenders, and, quoad ultra, assoilzied the defenders.

Lord M'Laren.—The pursuer in this case, who is a manufacturing jeweller in Birmingham, employed Mr Buckley as a traveller to assist in the sale of his goods, and the claim is made against an innkeeper in Edinburgh with whom the traveller lodged, in respect of the loss of a bag containing jewellery to the value of about £1900. The traveller had been in the habit of resorting to this hotel on his visits to Edinburgh, and seems to have been known to the proprietors of the hotel, the Messrs Pickett, as well as to some of their servants. His bag, containing samples of jewellery, was of a different description and pattern from the ordinary tourist's bag, and was easily recognised as a receptacle used for trade purposes. On the day in question the traveller on arriving at the hotel was met by the porter, who took the bag out of his hand along with another bag in which he carried his personal effects.

At the same time one of the Messrs Pickett, who was in attendance in the bar-room—there was a bar-room and a private sitting-room with inter-communication—came forward to book a room for the traveller, telling him at the same time that he would find two of his friends in the coffee-room. While this colloquy was proceeding the porter deposited the bag in the bar-room, not exactly in the spot where the traveller had been in use to put it on former visits, but substantially in the same position and with the same protection from interference by outside persons. The traveller went out in the course of the afternoon and returned again, and after spending some time in the smoking-room he purposed retiring to rest, but before doing so he came to the bar-room and asked for his bag, because he thought it would be safer to have it in his bedroom. The bag was then found to be missing. I think it is common ground that the theft was committed by three professional thieves who had taken up their quarters as visitors at the hotel, apparently with some knowledge about the jeweller's traveller, and with the intention of appropriating his bag. The bag may have been taken during the absence of the Messrs Pickett from the bar-room where it was left, although their rule was that the office should never be left unoccupied, or it might be while the proprietor in charge was engaged in conversation by one of the confederates while another slipped round behind his back and walked off with the bag. The Act of Parliament limits the liability of innkeepers to the sum of £30 except under two conditions. One of the exceptions is that negligence is proved, and the other exception is where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

In this state of the facts it is maintained for the pursuer (1) that the placing his bag in the bar-room was equivalent to a deposit of the bag expressly for safe custody; and (2) alternatively that the bag was stolen in consequence of the negligence of the innkeeper. I am not satisfied that either of these grounds of liability is made out.

As to the first ground of action, I think that we must ascribe some definite meaning to the word "expressly." Without elaborating the suggested distinction, it may suffice to say that the statute contemplates that the innkeeper is to be liable for loss if it is made clear to him, when the property is deposited, that he is charged with the duty of safe custody, a duty which the innkeeper is not at liberty to decline, if he is invited to undertake it. I think the statute also contemplates that there may be a deposit of property which is not for the expressed purpose of safe keeping or safe custody, and that in such a case, if the property is lost or stolen without fault on the part of the innkeeper, his liability would be limited to the sum of £30. If my second proposition is disputed, and if the liability of the innkeeper is to be just the same whether the purpose of safe keeping is or is not expressed, that is equivalent to saying that the word "expressly" has no definite meaning; is in other words a mere expletive. But I am not prepared to treat the word "expressly" when used in a statute as a redundant expression, first because this would be contrary to what I think is a sound principle of construction, that in general every word in a statute must receive its ordinary meaning; and secondly because I think it may very well have been in the view of the legislature that a guest might be content to leave his property in the charge of the innkeeper trusting that he would take reasonable care of it, without seeking to put the innkeeper under the special responsibility that follows from a deposit for the express purpose of safe custody. In this connection I may point out that under the statute, if the innkeeper is charged with safe custody he may request the guest to put his property in a box which the guest is to lock and seal. This might not be convenient to the guest; and if the guest is a commercial traveller who wants his bag three or four times in the course of a day, it may very well be that rather than be at the trouble of having his bag locked and sealed every time he returns from a visit, he would be content to leave it in the office without going through these formalities, believing that his bag was secure against all probable risks in the innkeeper's hands.

On the facts of the case it is plain enough that the bag was put into the bar-room by the hotel porter without anything being said by word or sign as to the purpose for which it was left there; and Mr Reginald Pickett, the partner in attendance, who seems not to have observed the placing of the bag in the bar-room, had no opportunity of requiring that the bag should be put into a box and locked and sealed. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer did not take the necessary step for bringing himself within the second exception of the statute, because he did not bring to the notice of Mr Pickett that he meant to charge him with responsibility for the safe custody of the bag. The fact that Mr Buckley went to the office for his bag late on Saturday night, in order, as he says, to take it to his bedroom, is, as I think, absolutely inconsistent with his case under this head. He did not need the bag until Monday morning, and if he understood that he had deposited it in terms of the statute, he had no occasion to take it to his bedroom, and I can only explain his doing so on the supposition that Mr Buckley considered the bag was lying in the office at his own risk, barring such negligence as would make the innkeeper liable in compensation. This was also the view of the other party, because neither of the Messrs Pickett knew that the bag was there, and cannot therefore be supposed to have entered into an express contract of safe custody regarding it.

Passing to the first exception of the statute, which I consider in the second place, I, of course, assume in this branch of the case that the bag was not expressly deposited for safe custody, but was simply put into a room which was under the control of the partners. This does not relieve the defenders from the obligation of taking all reasonable care of the property entrusted to them. The question then is, whether reasonable care was taken, or whether the property was stolen through the "default or neglect" of the innkeeper. The Lord Ordinary observes that the effect of the Act of Parliament was "to throw the onus upon the guest, whose property had disappeared in the innkeeper's custody, to prove that it had so disappeared through the default or negligence of the innkeeper or his servants," failing which proof the liability is limited to the sum of £30.

To this statement of the law, I give my unqualified adhesion. But then, if this statement is anything more than an unmeaning generality, it means this: that you do not fix responsibility on the innkeeper by proving that under the ordinary conditions of hotel business, the property disappeared.

If the guest, as a condition of recovering damages, undertakes the onus of proving negligence, he must be able to say in what the negligence consisted,—what is the duty to him which the innkeeper failed to perform. If he can only say, as the Lord Ordinary has said, in his review of the facts, "that the bag in question was stolen, and that it could not have been stolen but for the negligence of the defenders or their servants," this appears to be only another way of saying that the onus of proving reasonable care lies on the defenders, and that in the absence of evidence as to the cause of the disappearance of the property negligence is to be presumed. I cannot help thinking that in formulating the ground of judgment which I have just quoted, the Lord Ordinary had lost sight of the sounder statement of the criterion of responsibility which he developed in the first part of his opinion It is common ground that the bag was stolen by persons who had obtained admission to the hotel as guests, and I am not prepared to affirm that the fact that property left in the innkeeper's apartments was stolen is conclusive evidence of negligence on the part of the innkeeper.

It was argued to us that there was positive evidence of negligence, because the door of the bar-room was occasionally left unlocked, and only closed by the latch. Now, I think the care which an innkeeper is required to take of the property of his guest, will depend on the part of the house in which the property is left.

If a bag is left by the guest in the coffee-room, the innkeeper is responsible for the reputed honesty of his servants, but as these servants must occasionally leave the room, it would be hard on the innkeeper to say that he is to be responsible if the bag is stolen while the room is unguarded. In the case of goods left in a bedroom or in a private sitting-room, perhaps some higher degree of care may be exigible, but in no case can the care required by law be greater in degree than is consistent with the management of a hotel in the ordinary course of business. The bar-room, and Messrs Pickett's parlour which opened into it, were probably the safest places in the hotel for leaving valuables (assuming that it was not intended that they should be put into the hotel safe), because it was their practice not to leave these rooms unoccupied. But it is one question to consider what was the usual practice, and quite another question—what did the innkeeper bind himself to do in order to keep his guests' property safe? I cannot accept the suggestion that by merely receiving the pursuer's bag Messrs Pickett undertook as a duty to the pursuer that so long as he remained in the hotel they would never for one instant leave these apartments unguarded. I do not see how the business of a hotel could be carried on under such conditions; and if such a condition had been proposed to them I think the defenders would have replied, "We cannot bind ourselves that one of the family shall always be in these rooms, but if you wish to be absolutely secure, we will put your jewellery into the safe and undertake responsibility in terms of the statute."

On this part of the case my opinion is that the defenders, by receiving the bag without express instructions, only undertook to take such care of it as was consistent with the primary purposes to which these rooms were appropriated, viz., for the administrative business of the hotel; and I see no evidence of neglect on their part. They had no reason to suspect dishonesty on the part of the inmates of the hotel, and the fact that a gang of thieves, who were watching their opportunity to steal the bag, succeeded in purloining it when the innkeeper was either engaged at the bar or momentarily out of the room, does not, in my judgment, amount to evidence of negligent performance of the innkeeper's duty to his guests. I have not commented on the authorities which were cited, but I consider that the judgment I propose is consistent with the judgment of the Appeal Court in Medewar v. The Grand Hotel, 2 Q.B., 1891, p. 11, because in that case the judgment was for the defendant when the alleged negligence was only inferential and not supported by positive proof.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor under review should be recalled and the defenders found liable in damages to the extent of £30 and quoad ultra assoilzied.

Lord Pearson.—The Innkeepers' Liability Act of 1863 altered the common law by restricting their liability for the property of their guests to £30, except in two cases, namely, (1) where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; (2) where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

In those two cases the liability of the innkeeper is still a total liability.

I am not sure that the Lord Ordinary has sufficiently distinguished these two cases, for he says, "The case mainly insisted in was, that the goods having been put into the defenders' custody for safe keeping, and having been stolen through the negligence of the defenders or their servants, they are liable to compensate the pursuer for his loss." But clearly they are separate grounds of liability, and must be considered separately.

I take first the second case, under which the question is, whether the jewellery was deposited expressly for safe custody with the innkeeper; because if such an express contract is made out, the total liability of the defenders must be affirmed, whether there was negligence on their part or not. In my opinion the evidence does not establish any such deposit within the meaning of the Act. The parole evidence, taken by itself, is, I think, quite insufficient. Nor do I think the pursuer is more successful in making out a special undertaking to that effect founded on the notice which was exhibited throughout the hotel, bearing that the proprietors would not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but would "take charge of same in office," and adding a reference to the statute. That may well be construed as an invitation to make such a deposit expressly for safe custody as the Act contemplates; but it does not, in my opinion, import that the placing of the goods in the office has of itself that effect.

It remains to consider the other case mentioned in the statute, namely, where the goods are stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of the innkeeper or his servant. It was argued for the pursuer that the burden of proof under this head of liability lies upon the innkeeper, and that it rests with him to show that he took all due care to prevent the loss of the goods. I do not think that this view is sound. The burden of proof may shift in the course of the enquiry; but in the first instance it lies upon the pursuer to establish the "wilful act, default, or neglect" on which he founds. Here the goods were in the office, having been put there by the defenders' servant with the cognisance and approval of the guest; and I take it to be established by the evidence that they were stolen from the office by three very expert thieves acting in concert, in one or other of the methods suggested in the argument. The Lord Ordinary holds, and I agree with him, that there is no direct evidence of negligence. But the ground of his judgment is, that on the evidence the bag in question could not have been stolen but for the negligence of the defenders or their servants. I cannot assent to that view. On the contrary, I think by far the most probable explanation of the theft, upon the evidence as it stands, is that the thieves—who, be it remembered, were at that time accepted and treated by all concerned as honest guests in the hotel—cheated the hotel officials into a false security by some of the tricks of their trade. This being so, I think the proof of negligence fails.

Lord Ardwall.—This case raises questions of some difficulty in the interpretation of the Act 26 & 27 Vict. cap. 41, and its application to the special circumstances which have been established by the proof.

The action has been raised for the purpose of recovering from the defenders, who are hotelkeepers at the Imperial Hotel, Edinburgh, the value of a bag of jewellery belonging to the pursuer, which was stolen from the office of the hotel, where it had been deposited by the pursuer's traveller on 17th February 1906. The Lord Ordinary has found that the defenders were guilty of negligence, and has given judgment against them for £1790, 3s. 6d. I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be recalled.

The pursuer's traveller, Mr Buckley, who was well known to the defenders, and had been a frequent guest at their hotel over a period of eighteen years, had been accustomed, and was known by the defenders to be accustomed, to carry with him in addition to his ordinary personal luggage a bag of valuables consisting of samples of jewellery and precious stones for exhibition or sale to the pursuer's customers.

The usual notice as to innkeepers' liability in terms of the Act of 1863 was hung up in the hall of the hotel, but there was another notice exhibited on the wall of the corridor of the first flat of the Imperial Hotel, and it would appear also in some of the bedrooms, to the following effect:—

"The proprietors of this hotel respectfully beg to intimate that they will not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but will take charge of same in office. See extract from Act of Parliament chapter 41, Vict. 26 & 27, in entrance hall." On the occasion of Mr Buckley's visit in February 1906, when the bag was stolen, his bag of valuables was, at his sight, deposited by the "Boots" in a corner of the office, and he got the number of his bedroom and the "Boots" took his other luggage up to that bedroom. But as hereafter noticed nothing was said or done to draw the attention of Mr Reginald Pickett, who was in the office, to the fact that the bag was deposited in the office. The evidence shows that there is always someone either in the office or in the bar parlour which adjoins it, there being a glass door between the two apartments which generally stands open. The bar parlour had, however, an entrance from the public passages of the hotel by a door which is generally unlocked. There is also a door into the office from the corridor close to the "service" window.

On the occasion of the theft the person in the office (Mr Reginald Pickett) most probably had his attention distracted from the bag by one of the thieves, while the other slipped in at the door of the bar parlour and took away the bag. Probably the bag was taken away at the time that Reginald Pickett was receiving the thief's bag at the "service" window for safe custody, and it is worthy of notice that he put it down in the very place from which Mr Buckley's bag had been removed a few seconds before. It appears from Mr Reginald Pickett's evidence that this corner in the office and the bar parlour are the safest places in the hotel for putting bags of valuables, and that indeed the defenders had no other place for depositing such a bag as Mr Buckley's, although they might have put the jewels, after being taken out of the bag, in a small safe. In these circumstances two questions arise: First, are the defenders liable in respect of the second subsection of sect. 1 of the said Act. An able argument was submitted by the pursuer's counsel founded on the notice above quoted, which was said to be a direction to guests in the hotel not to leave any valuables in their bedrooms but to take them to the office, where the proprietors say they will "take charge of same." It was argued that there could be only one object in depositing the bag in question in the office, namely, to put it in safe custody, and that this was the method of putting valuables into safe custody prescribed by the proprietors of the hotel themselves, and that therefore they are barred from maintaining that valuables put into the office are not put in there expressly for safe custody or that they are not responsible for them, as they impliedly undertake to be by the said notice. I consider there is very great force in this argument, but as matter of interpretation of the statute I cannot hold that depositing valuables in an office in pursuance of such notice as I have quoted without saying a word about them to the person in charge of the office or hotel would amount, in the words of the Act, to "depositing them expressly for safe custody" with the innkeeper.

Extra Division.

Lord Ardwall.

Second. But assuming that the pursuer cannot bring his case within subsect. 2, the question still remains whether the defenders are not liable under subsect. 1, which is in the following terms: "Where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ." The question under this section is whether the bag in question was stolen or lost through the default or neglect of the defenders or their servants.

According to the evidence of the defenders themselves, the only place where valuables contained in a bag of some bulk could be so deposited in their hotel was the office and bar parlour. These were the safest places in this hotel for the custody of valuables; and further, the office was the place where the defenders invited their guests to deposit their valuables and undertook to "take charge" of them. This being so, I am of opinion that if Mr Buckley had either handed his bag to Mr Pickett to take charge of, or after depositing it in the corner, or rather seeing it deposited there, had said to Mr Pickett, "That is a bag containing valuables, and I must ask you to take charge of it," a special duty would have been laid upon the defenders, and that in the circumstances it would have been their duty not only always to have had some person in the office, but also when there was only one person there who had various duties to discharge at the service window and otherwise, that they should have taken care to have had both the doors locked so that persons could not slip in and make away with valuables when the single occupant of the two rooms was engaged in other ordinary and necessary duties. But the facts raise a very different case, for I hold it clearly established by the evidence alike of Mr Buckley, Mr Pickett, and the witness James Sim, that the bag was deposited in the corner of the office behind an ice-chest without a word being said to Mr Pickett about the matter or his attention drawn to the bag in any way whatever. It seems that when Mr Buckley and Sim entered the office Mr Reginald Pickett was taking his dinner in the back parlour and came forward just as they were entering, looked up a book and gave a number to the "Boots," and then went out with Mr Buckley to introduce him to some friend of his in the coffee-room. So little was Mr R. Pickett aware that a bag of any kind, not to say of valuables, had been deposited in the corner of the office, that when later on in the evening he went to deposit the bag, handed in by one of the thieves in the same corner, he did not know that there should have been another bag there. Then it appears from Mr Buckley's own evidence, which is corroborated by the evidence of the Picketts, that on the occasion of Mr Buckley's visits his bag of valuables was never, as a rule, given in charge to either of the Messrs Pickett or other person in the office, but was put at Mr Buckley's pleasure either in the corner from which it was stolen on the occasion in question, or beside the safe under the sideboard in the bar parlour, and then if Mr Buckley wished to take it out for the purpose of going his round of customers with it, he just went in and took it out as it suited himself; and finally at night, when it was no longer matter of convenience for him to have the bag on the first floor, and when he could watch it himself, he walked into either the parlour or the office as the case might be and took the bag up to his bedroom without apparently saying anything about it to anyone. Indeed, it was when he wished to take the bag up to his bedroom on the occasion in question that he discovered that it had disappeared. This being the regular course of conduct on the part of Mr Buckley, it can hardly be suggested that the defenders had any special duty with regard to his bag, nor did he consider it of importance to lay any such duty upon them, which perhaps might have interfered with his having such ready access to the bag as he usually seems to have had. He chose to leave the bag in one or other of the places I have mentioned, content with the amount of security that was afforded by its being out of the view of the public and in private rooms dedicated to the use of the managers of the hotel, and to which in the ordinary case the public had not access, although apparently privileged customers like Mr Buckley were allowed to come in and out without any locking or unlocking of the doors which led into the passages of the hotel.

In these circumstances I do not think it can be held that the defenders were under any duty to take the special precautions I have above alluded to, and which I think they would have been bound to take if the bag had been in any way, however informally, put under their charge, even though not "expressly for safe custody." They gave the pursuer's bag, and apparently those of other persons, what might be called house-room in any part that the customers pleased of the office or bar parlour, but they came under no obligation, express or implied, to work these two rooms otherwise than they were accustomed to do in the ordinary service of the hotel, and if customers chose to take advantage of the permission to leave their bags in these rooms and at the same time to have absolute freedom of access to them whenever they pleased, but without giving warning of any kind to the hotelkeepers that they were putting valuable property under their charge, I do not think that they can impute neglect to the hotelkeepers for not taking precautions beyond those which they usually took to exclude the public from their private rooms.

I may add that it appears to me that the principal neglect in the case was on the part of Mr Buckley in not putting his bag in special charge of the hotelkeepers. It was suggested that it was the duty of James Sim, the "Boots," to have done this when he took the bag into the office, and that he was negligent in not doing so. I cannot accept this view of the case. The "Boots" was merely the hand of Mr Buckley in carrying in and depositing his bag, and it was for Mr Buckley himself and not the "Boots" to tell Mr Pickett that he was giving the bag into his charge.

For these reasons I am unable to hold that negligence within the meaning of the first section of the Act has been proved against the defenders. I accordingly think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied with expenses.—18*th November* 1907.

The defender reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor granting decree of divorce.

1st Div.

Thomson v. Thomson and Another.

Argued for Defender: The husband had done something to promote, or at least had not prevented, the act taking place, when he might have prevented it. In that sense he was accessory to the deed. It was not necessary that he should do anything actively to make out the defence (Mackenzie's Criminal Law, Title xvii., par. 6, pp. 120, 121; Wemyss v. Wemyss, 1866, 4 M. 660; Bell's Principles, sect. 1532; Donald v. Donald, 1863, 1 M. 741, per Lord Ardmillan, p. 748). What the husband had done on the morning when his wife went to Gateshead was active incitement to adultery, considering his state of knowledge at the time. His conduct at any rate conduced to it. The words "Yes, go" were more than acquiescence, but acquiescence was sufficient (Fraser, Husband and Wife, Vol. II., pp. 1186, 1187). Counsel also referred to Marshall v. Marshall, 1881, 8 R. 702; M'Intosh v. M'Intosh, 1882, 20 S.L.R. 117; Hunter v. Hunter, 1883, 11 R. 359; Monro v. Monro, 1877, 4 R. 332.

Argued for Pursuer: In order to support this plea the husband must be a participant in or the direct cause of the wife's act. Here he did nothing either to create or contrive the occasion. It was not enough that he had in his mind suspicions as to his wife's conduct, and that he watched to see if his suspicions were well founded. It was necessary to connect the husband with the wife's act, by shewing that the wife placed reliance on something done by the husband, and this reliance must bring about the adultery. Clear proof was necessary to make out such a defence, and that was wanting here (Fraser, Husband and Wife, Vol. II. pp. 1193, 1194).

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—This is an action of divorce at the instance of the husband on the ground of adultery; the fact of adultery is admitted; and the only ground on which the wife argues that decree should not be pronounced is her plea of lenocinium. The facts on which the plea is founded are these:—The parties were married in 1898, and after a short time the marriage was not a very happy one. Both parties seem to have been in fault. The husband seems to have been unfaithful, and the wife was addicted to drink. It is quite clear that for some time previous to the events to which I am going to refer the two had lost all affection for each other; and, so far as the pursuer was concerned, he would have been pleased if the marriage relationship between them came to an end.

The defender had formed an intimacy with another person whom she had met at Perth originally, and with whom for some time she had carried on a correspondence. This correspondence does not seem to have been of a very intimate character. It was carried on for the most part on post cards. A large number of these have been recovered and are produced in the case; but they contain nothing which is not of the most innocent description. I do not think that any impression could be drawn from the post cards adversely to the parties. I also think it is the case that for some time at least the pursuer did not know that this post card correspondence was going on, although at the end he did know that his wife was receiving communications from a man whom he did not know, but about whom he had heard.

The defender had been in the habit of leaving the family home at Portobello and going away for week-end visits; and, prior to the events I am coming to, the defender had gone away for a week-end visit, and it had come to the pursuer's knowledge that she had deceived him as to the place where she had been. It is only human experience to suppose that if a man's wife says that she is going for a visit to one place and goes to another, there is some motive for her doing so, and that the motive is likely to be not a very good one. Accordingly the pursuer's suspicions were aroused. They were still further aroused by a communication which he received from his sister-in-law to the effect that his wife had received an invitation to visit or at least to go and see this acquaintance whom he did not know, and who was staying at a considerable distance. There again it is human nature to suppose that a man would have suspicions if his wife, concealing the fact from him, went to visit a man in a far-distant town, and he would think she went there for no good purpose. That his suspicions were aroused by this communication is certain, for he went to consult his agents, and made arrangements for having his wife watched. In these circumstances the defender came to the pursuer and said that she wanted to go to Stirling for the week-end and asked for money. The pursuer gave her £2. The defender had had a sort of warning from her mother, who had got an inkling of what the pursuer was about in setting people to watch his wife, and had advised her daughter not to go away, because she was being watched. This had caused an uncomfortable feeling in the defender's mind, and she asked her husband, "Should I go?" and he said, "Yes; certainly go."

The defender was watched. She went to Gateshead, and there the adultery admittedly took place. She did not come straight back from Gateshead to Portobello, but went first to Cambusbarron, near Stirling, from which place she returned home.

It was argued for the defender that these facts disclosed a case of lenocinium, and it was maintained that what was proof of lenocinium was in each case a matter of circumstances. In this case the defender relied in particular on two facts:—(1) That the pursuer gave the defender a sum of money to enable her to carry out her purpose; and (2) that he encouraged her by the expression, "Yes; certainly go."

I think I should here leave the facts and consider the law in regard to lenocinium. I do not think that the difficulties of the question can be put in more appropriate language than is done by Lord Fraser in his treatise on the Law of Husband and Wife (p. 1186). The title under which it is dealt with is Connivance or Lenocinium, and the heading of the passage is: "Not connivance if the husband watch his wife whom he suspects." Lord Fraser says: "The difficulty is to determine when a husband's conduct ceases to be suspicious and justifiable watchfulness and becomes acquiescence. The husband's suspicions may be aroused, but it is no connivance on his part though he do not disclose his suspicions to his wife. He is entitled to observe her and to track her proceedings; and it is not concurrence in her guilt because he does not tell her what he is doing and favour her with admonitions. It is possible that a hint from him as to his suspicions might have saved her; but it is not connivance though he did not utter it. It is only where the husband goes beyond this, and gives facilities for the commission of the offence, and creates opportunities, that he is held to connive and to concur. His connivance then involves criminality, because that connivance occasioned or allowed the adultery to take place." I think these words are a very accurate statement of our law, and that the difficulty arises in the application of the law to each particular state of facts. The same view is supported by the opinion of one who, though not a jurist, is considered an authority on this matter. I refer to the opinion of Sanchez, which is quoted by Lord Fraser on p. 1187 of his work, and is as follows: "Sed an liceat eo fine offerre occasionem uxori ut adulteratur?" Which question he answers in the negative: "Quia id non solum est permittere sed co-operari et positive concurrere."

Now it seems to me that two things are clear. The one is that no judge will do well by trying to frame a definition of what amounts to lenocinium, because each case really depends on its own facts, and it would be impossible to frame a definition which comprehended all cases. The other is that there must be something on the husband's part of an active character. "Co-operari et positivé concurrere," says Sanchez, and I think that is an accurate description of our law.

I am aware that in another portion of Lord Fraser's work he says that "passive acquiescence will be sufficient to bar the husband, provided it appears to be done with the intention and in the expectation that the wife would commit the crime" (p. 1186); and he quotes a passage from Lord Stowell's opinion in the case of Walker (quoted in Rogers v. Rogers, 1830, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Cas. 59) to the same effect.

It has been pointed out by Lord President Inglis in Wemyss that the English doctrine on this matter has not the same historical origin as the Scots doctrine, and one cannot, therefore, say that an English authority is to be cited as a Scots authority might be, although the two doctrines come very near one another in practical application. After all, the distinction comes to be nearly a question of words. If I may use an expression which seems like a contradiction in terms, I would say that there is a sort of passive acquiescence which is equivalent to active acquiescence. To explain, I may take an analogy from another branch of law which is very familiar to us. There are certain cases where, for instance, in the negotiations for a contract, there is a relation between two parties which puts on one of them a duty of disclosure to the other; and if he fails to discharge this duty, the contract will be set aside because of the silence of the party. There are other cases where there is no duty of disclosure. In these the contract cannot be set aside on the ground that the party did not speak. But in the colloquies between the parties there may be occasions when silence amounts to assertion or representation, and in such a case the contract may be set aside on account of this silent acquiescence. I cannot help thinking that the distinct acquiescence of which Lord Fraser speaks would have to be of that character. It is not mere passive acquiescence, but acquiescence in such circumstances as to give it an active character. That there must be something done by the husband, I cannot doubt.

Applying that exposition of lenocinium to the present case I think the facts fall short of what is necessary to make out the defence. Here was a husband who did not know the facts, but strongly suspected that his wife had gone wrong. He hears of a project on her part in circumstances in which it is probable that she would commit adultery. I do not think he was bound to disclose his suspicions; I do not think he was barred from taking steps to observe the proceedings of his wife; I do not think so much stress can be laid on his use of the words "Yes; certainly go." We know what was in the wife's mind at the time. She put the question because she thought his answer would shew whether he knew what she intended to do. She took him to mean, "Yes; certainly go to the place you say you are going to, viz. Stirling." That seems to me to fall far short of contriving the infidelity or the occasion for it. On the contrary, I believe that the matter was in dubio, so far as the defender was concerned, almost to the last moment.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to the right conclusion, and that decree must be granted.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree that the plea of lenocinium cannot be supported, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary was right in giving decree of divorce.

Lord Dundas.—I agree. I think the proof falls distinctly short of what is necessary in law to support the plea of lenocinium.—29*th October* 1907.

Counsel for defender moved for expenses, on the ground that a reclaiming note was reasonable in the circumstances, and that the wife was entitled to maintain it at the husband's expense. Counsel for the pursuer opposed the motion. Hoey v. Hoey, 1884, 11 R. 905, and Montgomery v. Montgomery, 1881, 8 R. 403, were cited.

The Lord President.—We have consulted with the judges of the other Division in this matter in order to lay down a general rule in such cases.

Where a wife has been unsuccessful in the Outer House and then presents a Reclaiming Note, the question whether she is entitled to her expenses, being again unsuccessful, must depend on whether the case was a fair one to try. What I may call the prima facie view of the case is that the Lord Ordinary is right. And therefore it is for the wife to shew that the case is a fair one to try.

In this particular case we think that the question was one which it was fair to bring before this Court, and we therefore allow the reclaimer her expenses.—22*nd November* 1907.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from

2ND DIV.

Dougall v. Provost, Magistrates and Town Council of Dunfermline.

the previous reports and from the judgment of Lord Ardwall.

On 8th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor whereby he, inter alia, found that the defenders were liable to pay to the pursuer the expenses incurred by him in the previous action (Dougall v. Lowe, cit. sup.), and also the expenses for which the pursuer had been found liable in that action.

The Defenders reclaimed and argued: (1) The pursuer was not entitled to recover the expenses of the former action even if the case were taken as an ordinary case of breach of contract. Expenses had never been recovered as damages for breach of contract except in cases where the defenders denied the breach (Straiton Estate Co. Ltd. v. Stephens, 1880, 8 R. 299; Hammond & Co. v. Bussey, 1887, L.R. 20 Q.B.D. 79; Agius v. Great Western Colliery Company [1899], 1 Q.B. 413). Here the defenders had from the first admitted the right of the public to fish. (2) The present action was laid, not on breach of contract, but on breach of warrandice. What the pursuer was entitled to claim under the warrandice was not damages for breach of contract but indemnity for eviction. That did not include the expenses of an action (Bell's Prin., sect. 895; Stephen v. Lord Advocate, 1878, 6 R. 282). [Lord Low referred to Inglis v. Anstruther, 1771, M. 16,633.] Expenses could be recovered as damages only in cases where the rule of Hadley v. Baxendale (1854, 9 Ex. 341) applied. That rule did not apply to breach of warrandice. (3) In the previous action the pursuer had raised two questions: (a) the question of the public right to fish, and (b) the question of trespass. The defenders were not liable for any damage resulting from trespass. The pursuer's present claim was truly a claim for relief, which, to be successful, must be commensurate with the original liability (Caledonian Railway Company v. Colt, 1860, 3 Macq. 833, per Lord Chelmsford at p. 848; Ovington v. M'Vicar, 1864, 2 M. 1066). This was not so here; the pursuer could not have called on the defenders to take his place in an action laid on trespass.

Argued for the Pursuer: The case must be taken on the footing that the pursuer had been evicted. The defenders were therefore in breach of contract, and were liable for all damages naturally resulting from the breach. In particular, they were liable for the expenses of the former action, if these had been reasonably incurred (Hammond v. Bussey, cit.; Agius v. Great Western Colliery, cit.; Kincaid & Co. v. Neilson & Sons, per Lord Low, 29th July 1903, unreported). There was no distinction between breach of warrandice and breach of any other contract (Ersk., II. 3, 30 and 32; Welsh v. Russell, 1894, 21 R. 769). The statement in Bell's Prin., sect. 895, was inconsistent with other authorities (Bell's Lect., 3rd ed. I. 217, 219; Straiton Estate Co. Ltd. v. Stephens, cit.). It was immaterial that the former action had been laid on trespass. It appeared from the lease that nobody was entitled to fish except those who had permits from the defenders. The defenders had informed pursuer that they had not granted permits. According to the pursuer's information, therefore, which was derived from defenders, all fishers were trespassers. It was therefore impossible to separate the question of trespass from the question of fishing, and the action had been rightly laid on trespass.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ardwall.—By lease dated 29th November and 8th December 1904 the defenders let to the pursuer the farm of Highholm, near Dunfermline, for nineteen years from and after Martinmas 1903 at the rent of £150. The farm forms part of the common good of the burgh, and is bounded on the north partly by the Loch Fitty Burn and partly by Loch Fitty, into which the burn flows. The lease contains a clause reserving to the "proprietors," which word is therein defined as meaning "the Provost, Magistrates, and Town Councillors for themselves and as representing the whole body and community of the said Burgh," the whole game and fishings on the lands let, "with the privilege of fowling, hunting, sporting and fishing on the lands hereby let by themselves or others having written authority from them." It is matter of admission that the fishings in the said burn and loch are the only fishings to which the above reservation can refer. The lease contains the usual clause of absolute warrandice.

Shortly after the pursuer entered the farm, he found that members of the community of Dunfermline, and the public generally, were in the habit of entering upon the subjects let for the purpose of fishing in the said burn and loch. He challenged them, but was met with the contention that they were entitled as members of the community of Dunfermline to fish there, and to enter on his lands for that purpose. The pursuer complained about trespassers to the defenders about March 1904, and there have been produced in process a number of minutes and correspondence, the effect of which is very clearly set forth by the Lord Ordinary in the opinion delivered by him on 8th January 1907. I entirely agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived that the pursuer was justified in reading the Town Clerk's letter of 2nd May 1905 as an intimation that the defenders were not to take any action either to establish or to negative the existence of a right in the public which "they were not disposed to question" or as to the matter of trespass, and that he must take such steps as were necessary to defend himself. The pursuer accordingly raised an action on 8th June 1905 craving interdict against certain individual defenders molesting or interfering with him in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of his lands, and from entering and trespassing on the same or injuring and destroying his crops. To this action the present defenders were also called for their interest. A proof was led in that action, and upon considering the same the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor dated 3rd February 1906, found, inter alia, (3) that the compearing defenders as "members of the said community and ratepayers in the said Burgh are entitled to enter upon and use the banks of the said burn and loch respectively so far as aforesaid (that is, so far as lying within the farm of Highholm) for the said purpose of angling; and (4) that the pursuer has failed to prove that the said defenders or any of them have trespassed on the said farm and lands or have broken down, injured, or in any way interfered with the gates and fences upon and surrounding the same, or have injured or destroyed the pursuer's crops upon the same." He accordingly assoilzied the defenders, and found them entitled to expenses.

Besides having called the present defenders for their interest in that action, the pursuer's agent, on 8th July 1905, wrote to the Town Clerk enclosing a print of the open record, drawing special attention to the defenders' averments to the effect that they had enjoyed an immemorial right and privilege of fishing in the loch and burn on the town lands, and of using the banks thereof for that purpose, and desiring to be informed whether or not these statements were substantially true. He further intimated that if the defences were sustained the pursuer would look to the town to recompense him for all loss and damage he might suffer or had suffered, and that if in the course of the process it should appear that the Town Council had done anything to derogate from their lease to him he would hold them liable to pay all the expenses incurred by him in that action and those for which he might be found liable. This was a very plain intimation that if the pursuer failed in that action he would make the claims which he does in the present against the Town Council. On 12th June 1905 the Property Committee of the Town Council had agreed to recommend that the Town Council should not enter appearance to defend the action, and on 11th July the Town Clerk replied to the pursuer's agent that "the Town Council have not at any time conferred right on the inhabitants of Townhill or others to fish in the loch and burn, but they took no steps to prevent fishing." This was a very evasive answer, and left the pursuer without any knowledge as to how long the public had been in use to fish, or whether they had or had not a legal right to do so. Again, on 2nd November 1905, the pursuer's agent wrote to the Town Clerk intimating that a proof had been allowed in the action as to the alleged right of fishing, that the pursuer did not intend to reclaim against the interlocutor allowing the proof, but would do so if the Town Council so desired at their expense. The Town Clerk answered practically that they did not intend to do anything in the matter, and subsequently they declined to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 3rd February 1906 already referred to, which has become final, and which the defenders, for the purposes of this action, admitted must be held to be well founded in fact and in law.

After intimating his claims to the Town Council, who refused to recognise them, the pursuer raised the present action, in which he concludes for declarator that he has been evicted from the full and peaceable possession of a portion of the subjects let to him by the defenders, and that he is entitled accordingly to an abatement of the sum of £30 per annum from the stipulated rent. There are then petitory conclusions: (1) for the sum of £66 sterling, being the amount of the abatement which he claims with interest at the rate of 5 per cent.; (2) for the sum of £100 sterling, being damage done to his crops and lands by persons resorting thereto for the purpose of fishing; and (5) the sum of £450, 18s. 6d. sterling, being the legal expenses for which the pursuer was found liable in the former action, and also those incurred by him in raising and prosecuting that action.

The Lord Ordinary has given decree of declarator as concluded for, but reduces the abatement from £30 to £5 per annum; and with regard to the petitory conclusions he has granted decree against the defenders for the sum of £10 sterling and interest; and in respect of the minute for the pursuer, No. 30 of process, has assoilzied the defenders from the conclusion for £100; and with regard to the third petitory conclusion he has found the defenders liable to pay to the pursuer the amount of the defenders' taxed account in the other action, and also the amount of the pursuer's accounts in that action as the same may be taxed by the Auditor of the Court, to whom he has made a remit for this purpose.

It is against the Lord Ordinary's findings with regard to the third of the petitory conclusions, namely, that for the defenders' and pursuer's expenses in the former action, that the defenders reclaim.

I entirely agree with the view that the Lord Ordinary has taken of this matter. The lands were let to the pursuer with no other reservation as regards fishing except of the right of the defenders and those having written authority from them. When he discovered that great numbers of the community of Dunfermline, without any such written authority, trespassed over his lands in pursuance of this alleged right of fishing, he naturally considered this a derogation from his rights under the lease and a partial eviction from the peaceable enjoyment of the subjects let. But on his complaining to the defenders they would neither admit nor deny the right of members of the community to fish in the said burn and loch; and as I have above explained under reference to the Lord Ordinary's opinion and to the minutes and correspondence, they practically told him that he must defend himself. He did so, and in my opinion he was entitled to do so with the view of vindicating his rights which were challenged by third parties. It was necessary for him to do so if he were to make a claim for abatement of rent, because, as I shall afterwards point out, he could not make such a claim successfully unless it had been judicially determined that he had suffered eviction. If the defenders had frankly admitted—and it was a fact which was within their knowledge, or ought to have been—that the community had exercised from time immemorial a right of fishing in the said burn and loch, the pursuer could then have brought his action directly against them; but I do not think he was safe to do so, looking to the attitude they adopted, without first endeavouring to protect himself against eviction. If he had been successful in that attempt he would have had no claim against the Town Council, because there would, in that event, have been no eviction; but having failed in the action without any fault on his part in the conduct of the process or otherwise, he is in the position of a person who has suffered eviction and who is therefore entitled to recompense.

The Court had the benefit of an able argument on both sides with regard to the law applicable to this claim for expenses in the former action, and I propose shortly to examine the authorities on the point.

There is no doubt of the general principle that where there has been a breach of contract the party who suffers from such breach of contract is entitled to damages against the party responsible for it; and such damages include not only the actual damage immediately and directly caused by the breach of contract, but also all damage arising out of it which might have been expected by the parties to the contract naturally to arise out of a breach, and such damage has been held to include, inter alia, legal expenses reasonably incurred in consequence of the breach of contract. (See the case of Straiton Estate Co. Ltd. v. Stephens, 1880, 8 R. 299; Hammond, 1887, L.R. 20 Q.B.D. 79; and Ayius v. Great Western Colliery Co. [1899], 1 Q.B. 413.)

But it was maintained that where an action is founded on warrandice, the expenses incurred in unsuccessfully defending a claim involving total or partial eviction from the subject warranted are not recoverable from the granter of the warrandice. For this proposition the defenders relied almost entirely upon certain dicta contained in sect. 895 of Bell's Principles. That passage begins with stating that "Warrandice is not an obligation to protect, but only to ndemnify in case of eviction." Taken by itself this would seem to imply that the indemnification must include expenses reasonably incurred in defending the claim; but then the author goes on to say, "Thus there is no action of warrandice till judicial eviction, unless the ground of demand be unquestionable and proceeding from the fault of the seller." This passage, again, would seem in doubtful cases, such as the present, to justify judicial resistance to the claim, as until that was settled the obligation of warrandice would not arise. But further on the author continues thus: "The person bound in warrandice is entitled to have notice of the claim or attempt to evict, but the buyer is not bound to enter into a litigation in defence of the right, provided he give due notice. If he undertake the defence without notice, and omit the proper plea, the seller will be free. The seller is not bound to defend against the claim, and if the buyer choose to do so while the seller declines it, and fails, he is not entitled to the expense of litigation."

It is the last clause that is founded on by the defenders. But the authority cited by Professor Bell for the clause is the case of Inglis, 1771, M. 16,633. Now in that case the action concluded for reimbursement of expenses incurred in defending a commission to a certain office. The challenge was unsuccessful, so there was no eviction, and it was held that eviction is the sole foundation for an action upon warrandice, and that the pursuer had no claim for reimbursement of expenses, as there had been no eviction. It is manifest that this decision does not support the doctrine laid down in the text. But the doctrine laid down in the decision is, I think, quite undoubted, and is supported by other decisions, the reason of it being that if an unfounded claim is made against the subject warranted, that is not a matter for which the granter of the warrandice is in any way to blame; it is only the misfortune of the person who is in possession of the subject that a third party has preferred an unfounded claim against such possession, and he has no recourse for expenses except against the person who attacked him, in the usual way. This doctrine was also laid down in the case of Stephen v. The Lord Advocate, 1878, 6 R. 282, where the Crown having, by a separate action of declarator, succeeded in having its right to the use of certain piers and accesses sustained, was held not responsible for the expenses of an unsuccessful defence which its tenant had maintained in the Small Debt Court in answer to a claim for the use of these piers and accesses, the ratio of this decision also being that the Crown having given the tenant possession of a subject from no part of which he had been legally evicted, they were not liable for the loss caused to him by a groundless but successful action having been brought against him and wrongly decided in the Small Debt Court. Neither of these decisions militates against the pursuer's claim for expenses in the present action; indeed they seem in a negative sense to support it, because the ground of refusing expenses in both cases was that there was no eviction, and therefore no loss for which the granter of the warrandice could be held in any way to blame. In the case of Welsh v. Russell, 1894, 21 R. 769, it was held that there was a case of partial eviction similar in some respects to what occurred in the present case, the eviction there consisting in the imposition of a right of way upon a heritable subject purchased by the pursuer, but otherwise the case does not seem to have much bearing on the present, the pursuer's case being there thrown out because he claimed compensation for total eviction and not damages for partial eviction.

In Erskine's Institutes, II. iii., 32, in dealing with the question of warrandice, the following passage occurs: "Yet intimation of distress is not precisely necessary, for the purchaser's right of recourse continues competent to him without such intimation, if evidence is not brought that in the action of eviction he had submitted to some irrelevant defence or subjected himself to an incompetent means of proof" (Clerk, 23rd June 1681, M. 16,605); and the same author in his Principles, II. iii., 13, states the law as follows:— "Regularly the grantee, when the eviction is threatened, ought to intimate his distress to the granter that he may defend the right granted by himself; but though such intimation should not be made, the grantee does not lose his right of recourse, unless it shall appear that in the process of eviction he has omitted a relevant defence or subjected himself to an incompetent means of proof."

The last passage quoted from Bell's Principles, it seems to me, is itself obscure, is not supported by the decision on which it professes to be founded, is at variance with the doctrine that warrandice is a contract of indemnity, and with the general doctrine applicable to breaches of all contracts.

It falls, however, to be noticed that the passage quoted from Professor Bell comes under the general head of "sale of land." His doctrine of warrandice as regards leases is to be found in sects. 1208 and 1253 of the Principles, where he deals with the implied warrandice contained in the contract of lease, the warrandice being that the subject exists, shall be made effectual to the tenant, and fit for its purpose; and, so far as I know, an action of damages for breach of such warrandice in leases covers all loss caused by the breach, unless it be indirect and consequential.

A passage from Professor Montgomerie Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, 3rd edition, pp. 217 and 219, and in the first edition at p. 207, was quoted by the counsel for the pursuer to shew that in the view of that able and experienced practitioner the party evicted was entitled to the expenses of an unsuccessful defence. He says: "It will be observed that the party against whom eviction is threatened has in some views a better claim if he is unsuccessful than if he prevails, because though unsuccessful in defending the subject, he will get his expenses, besides the value of the subject evicted, from the granter of the obligation of absolute warrandice, whereas if successful he indeed preserves to himself the subject but does not get his expenses"; he then proceeds to give some very good advice as to what the granter of the warrandice should do in such a case.

It appears to me that the true result of the authorities is that if an action of eviction be properly defended, and if, notwithstanding such defence, eviction follows, the granter of the warrandice will be liable, not only for the direct loss caused by the breach of warrandice, but for all expenses properly and reasonably incurred in defending the rights which he and the granter alike had an interest to defend.

It was strongly contended by counsel for the defenders that at all events full expenses in the other action should not be allowed because, it was said, there were two branches of that action, one concerning the right of the public to fish, and their presence on the pursuer's farm in pursuance of that right, and the other concerning ordinary trespass unnecessarily committed by persons founding on their fishing rights, but which trespass was not necessary for the exercise of these rights; and it was maintained that according to the Lord Ordinary's judgment the pursuer had not made out a case of damage by trespass, and therefore that all the expenses applicable to that part of the case should be disallowed, and that this should be done by way of modification of the total expenses.

The Lord Ordinary disregarded this argument, and I think he has done rightly. In the first place, the witnesses who spoke to the latter branch of the case were necessary to the former part, and indeed it is no easy matter, as a question of fact, to say when what may be called legitimate trespass ended and illegitimate trespass began; and in the second place it is certain that both kinds of trespass arose from the alleged right of fishing which the Lord Ordinary has found to exist.

For these reasons I do not think that any useful distinction can be drawn between the one part of the expenses and the other; and having regard to what was the origin of the whole proceedings, I do not think the pursuer should be deprived of any part of his expenses.

I accordingly propose that the Court should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 8th January 1907 reclaimed against, and find the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses since the date of the said interlocutor, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, with power to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the taxed amount thereof and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therewith.

198. Govan v. J. & W. M'Killop.

PROCESS—PROOF OR JURY TRIAL—REPARATION—QUESTION INVOLVING (A) CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE, AND (B) MEDICAL EVIDENCE—ALLEGED DEATH OF PERSON FROM PTOMAINE POISONING CONTRACTED THROUGH FOOD SUPPLIED IN A RESTAURANT—ACTION BASED ON FAULT AT COMMON LAW AND BREACH OF WARRANTY UNDER STATUTE—FORM OF ISSUES—THE SALE OF GOODS ACT 1893 (56 & 57 VICT. CAP. 71), SECT. 14, SUBSECT. 1.

The pursuer was the widow of Alexander Govan, managing director of Argyll Motors Ltd., Alexandria, and the defenders were owners and managers of the Grosvenor Restaurant, Glasgow. In this action she claimed £10,000 damages for the death of her husband, on the ground that he died from ptomaine poisoning contracted by partaking of lobster soup supplied in the defenders' restaurant. The pursuer's averments of fault on the part of the defenders were as follows :—

The defenders were responsible for the supply of said food, and they were bound, as public caterers, to provide for their customers good and wholesome food, which said lobster soup was not. Mr Govan ordered the lobster soup for consumption by him on the premises, and it was supplied by the defenders for that purpose. They wrongfully, and in breach of their contract with Mr Govan, failed to supply him with lobster soup suitable for human consumption as food, although Mr Govan, as they knew, relied absolutely on their care and on their skill and judgment to give him food in a wholesome condition. The defenders, in so acting, were in breach of the warranty implied by sect. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, to the effect that the lobster soup supplied by them as aforesaid was reasonably fit for human food. Moreover, the defenders were grossly negligent of their duty to Mr Govan to provide soup which could be eaten with safety. They knew, or ought to have known, that said food was not fit for consumption by their customers. In any event, if the defenders had taken reasonable precautions and exercised proper care they would have detected the unsoundness of said food, and they failed in their duty to Mr Govan, as their customer, by not taking such precautions.

The defenders in their answers denied that the pursuer died from ptomaine poisoning. Mr Govan died on 27th May 1907, and under a Sheriff's warrant the defenders had his body exhumed, and a post-mortem examination made on 18th June. They averred that, as disclosed by the post-mortem examination, Mr Govan's death was due to hæmorrhage in the brain and not to ptomaine poisoning.

Sect. 14, subsect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 is in the following terms :—

Where the buyer expressly, or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose.

The pursuers proposed the following issues for the trial of the cause :—

1. Whether, on or about 17th May 1907, the defenders in the course of their business as purveyors supplied lobster soup to the pursuer's husband, Alexander Govan, knowing that said lobster soup was required for consumption by him as food; whether said lobster soup or part thereof was not fit for human consumption; and whether pursuer's said husband, relying on defenders' skill as purveyors, partook of said lobster soup and was in consequence thereof seized with illness which caused his death, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?
2. Whether the illness which resulted in the death of the pursuer's said husband on or about 27th May 1907 was caused through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

Damages laid at £10,000 sterling.

The defenders contended that the issues should be disallowed and the case sent to proof.

The argument sufficiently appears from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The issues proposed were approved of for trial of the cause by a jury.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuer is the widow of Alexander Govan, and the defenders are restaurateurs in Glasgow. The pursuer's case is that her husband was supplied with lobster soup in the defenders' restaurant, and that his death was due to ptomaine poisoning contracted through partaking of this soup.

She submits two issues which she proposes for the trial of the cause—the one being laid upon sect. 14, subsect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, and the other being the ordinary issue of fault. The defenders do not dispute the relevancy of the action, but they maintain that it is unsuited for trial by jury on various grounds.

The first ground is that a question of law may be raised as to the applicability of the Sale of Goods Act. I was unable, however, to get any clear indication from the defenders' counsel of the nature of the possible legal question. I apprehend that, if the pursuer is able to satisfy a jury of the propositions and facts which are embodied in the first issue, there can be little doubt of her right to recover compensation. In some cases it may be a very difficult question whether a person who purchased goods which proved to be unwholesome or dangerous, relied upon the seller's skill. But I do not think it can be seriously contended that a purveyor does not impliedly warrant that the food which he supplies shall be fit for human consumption.

The other ground on which I was asked to withdraw the case from a jury is that the medical evidence will be conflicting, and that the nature and symptoms of ptomaine poisoning are matters upon which medical science has not arrived at any definite conclusion. In my opinion that is not a sufficient ground, in a case appropriated by statute for jury trial, for my exercising the discretion—which I no doubt possess—of directing the enquiry to be by proof. In accident cases we are familiar with the most difficult questions as to the nature and extent of a man's injuries, and his prospects of recovery, being determined by a jury on the most conflicting evidence of medical experts; but I have not been referred to a single case where this was considered a good ground for withholding the cause from the tribunal which the Legislature has considered most appropriate. The defenders founded on a recent decision of Lord Guthrie in the Outer House (Stocks v. Holstein, 1907, 14 S.L.T. 339), where his Lordship, under very similar circumstances, ordered a proof; but one of the reasons which led him to that conclusion does not exist here, because no objection is taken to the form of the issues proposed. Of course a jury, before they can find for the pursuer, must reach the conclusion in point of fact that her husband died from ptomaine poisoning, and that such poisoning was the result of his eating food supplied to him in the defenders' restaurant. That may be a difficult question of fact; but it is one upon which a jury is just as likely to be right as a judge; and I think the pursuer might well complain of not having her compensation—if successful—fixed by the tribunal which is supposed to be best able to assess damages for other than pecuniary loss, and of the lack of finality which a decision by a Lord Ordinary has as compared with the verdict of a jury. I shall accordingly approve of the issues proposed for the trial of the cause.—14*th November* 1907.

Toal v. The North British Railway Co.

FIRST DIVISION.

(The Lord President, Lords Kinnear and Dundas.)

199. Toal v. The North British Railway Company.

Reparation—Relevancy—Railway Company—Damages for Personal Injuries——Negligence—Averment of Duty on Company's Servants to Close Carriage Doors Before Setting Train in Motion Held Irrelevant.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

In this action Toal, a Glasgow craneman, sued the North British Railway Company in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for damages in respect of injuries suffered by him, and for which he averred that the Railway Company were responsible.

The pursuer's averments were to the effect that on an evening in November 1906, after alighting from a train on the defenders' railway at College Street Station, Glasgow, and whilst standing on the platform there, he was struck and knocked down by the open door of a carriage of the train when again in motion and leaving the platform, that he fell upon the rails, sustaining injuries which permanently incapacitated him from following his ordinary employment. He also averred that the station was in total darkness at the time of the accident. His averments of negligence were in the following terms:—

The said accident to the pursuer was due to the fault and negligence of defenders' servants, for whom defenders are responsible. When said train was stopped at said platform, there were no porters or officials on the platform to see that the doors of the carriages were closed before the train was restarted. It is the duty of defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station, but this the defenders and their servants culpably and negligently failed to do on the occasion of this accident to pursuer. The defenders and their said servants were also negligent in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door. If the guard of said train or any of defenders' porters had been on said station and had paid attention to their duty, they would have closed the door which struck pursuer, before the train was allowed to restart from said station, and the said accident would have thus been avoided. The pursuer believes and avers that the guard of said train was negligent, and did not come to the platform at said station, and failed to have regard for the safety of pursuer and others on said platform by having said door shut. Defenders' servants were also negligent in that they failed to have the lamps at said station lighted, as the station was in complete darkness at the time said accident happened, with the exception of the lights from within the carriages of the train in which pursuer had been a passenger. If said platform had been lighted, the pursuer could have easily seen that said carriage door was swinging open, or some other passenger would in all probability have closed same, failing attention to their duty by the servants of the defenders, whose duty it was to close same before the train was allowed to restart. The defenders' servants were thus reckless and negligent, and caused said accident to the pursuer.

Toal v. The North British Railway Co.

The defenders admitted the injuries, but denied liability, explaining that the station was properly lighted, that after the train drew up in the station the doors were properly closed, and that when the signal was given for restarting a number of people, including the pursuer, ran alongside the train cheering the Celtic football team, who occupied a saloon carriage on the train. They averred that the accident was caused or materially contributed to by the negligence of the pursuer in so doing, and in failing to observe the necessary precautions to avoid stumbling and falling upon the line.

They pleaded, inter alia, irrelevancy and contributory negligence.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Boyd) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session for jury trial and lodged an issue in ordinary form.

The defenders objected to an issue being allowed, and argued: The pursuer's averments instructed no relevant case of negligence against the Railway Company. There was no duty on the defenders to close the carriage doors before the train was allowed to move from the platform.

The pursuer argued that there was such a duty to close the carriage doors, and quoted the dicta of Lord Chancellor Cairns in the case of Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Jackson, 1877, 3 Ap. Cas. 193, at p. 198, in support of this contention.

The Court dismissed the action.

The Lord President.—My Lords, I am unable to find in this record a relevant averment of negligence against the defenders. The pursuer sets forth that on a certain date he travelled in a train which stopped at College Street Station. He alighted. He then says that while he was standing on the platform—he does not tell us how long he had been standing there—he was struck and knocked down by an open carriage door, and his leg slipped down between the platform and the train. The train was in motion at the time the pursuer was struck, and after it had passed the pursuer fell on to the rails. Now, the only facts that are there given to us are that the pursuer got out of the train, that he stood upon the platform, and that while there he was knocked down by an open carriage door. He must, of course, necessarily have been so close to the edge of the platform as to permit of the door knocking him down. The only averment of negligence that is made in these circumstances against the Company is this:—"It is the duty of the defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station." I say in passing that this "leaving the station" is rather an ambiguous phrase, and I rather fancy that the writer of the sentence which I have just read meant by "leaving the station" really the starting of the train. The only doubt raised in my mind as to that is that in the next sentence he says this: "The defenders and their said servants were also negligent, in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door." However that may be, I take the last averment as being the substance of the negligence averred, viz. that there was negligence in respect that the train was set in motion without the doors being closed.

My Lords, I think that is an impossible averment of negligence to allow to go to a jury, seeing that it is common knowledge, from the practice of railway companies, and indeed from the necessities of the case, that a great deal of the service of suburban trains would be practically impossible if it were absolutely necessary to close every door before the train was allowed to start. That it is a quite proper precaution for railway servants to close the doors, so far as they can, before the train starts, I do not doubt, but that is a perfectly different thing from saying that if a door is not closed before the train is allowed to move there is negligence on the part of the Railway Company. There is no averment that the train was started so quickly as to give no proper opportunity to alight. All that is said is that it is negligence, because the train was started while a door was still open. My Lords, I do not think that is common sense. I think, therefore, your Lordships should dismiss this action as being wanting in relevancy of averments against the Railway Company.

I think that is a safer ground to go upon than what was also urged on us—the disclosure of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer in bar, because, although no doubt I do think the chances, so to speak, are all in favour of it being the man's own fault that he allowed himself to be struck by the door of a railway carriage while on the platform, still that is not a universal proposition. There may have been circumstances in which he was not able to get away, and the proof of contributory negligence must, of course, lie upon the person who is alleging it—namely, the defender. But before the defender is put to any such proof there must be a case of negligence against him. It is there, I think, that this case fails, and I am therefore for dismissing the action.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. I only add that I do not find any averment that the defenders did not give the pursuer time to alight, and that he was knocked down before he had time to step from the carriage to a safe place. There is no averment of that kind, and in the absence of an averment of that kind I think the case rests exactly as your Lordship has put it.

Lord Dundas.—I also agree. I only add that to my mind the case is an extremely plain one.—31*st October* 1907.

200. Parish Council of Govan v. Parish Council of Glassary.

Poor Law—Settlement—Acquisition of Residential Settlement by Female Pauper—Education Act 1901 (1 Edw. VII., cap. 9), sects. 1 and 2—Held that Provisions of the Education Act 1901 Do Not Affect the Age at which a Female Pauper is Capable of Acquiring a Residential Settlement, or Change it from Twelve to Fourteen.

This was a Special Case to which the Parish Councils of Govan and of Glassary, Argyllshire, were respectively the first and second parties.

The statement of facts and contentions of the parties were in the following terms:—

1. Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie, now a lunatic pauper in the Govan District Asylum, was born at Lochgilphead, in the parish of Glassary, on 19th December 1885.

2. The said Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie (hereinafter referred to as "the pauper") is the lawful child of John Mackenzie, architect's draughtsman, who died at Slockvullin, in the parish of Kilmartin, on 18th February 1894, and Joanna M'Corquodale, wife of the said John Mackenzie, who died at 24 Budhill Avenue, Shettleston, in the parish of Glasgow, on 26th September 1901.

3. The said John Mackenzie, who was born at Lochgilphead aforesaid on or about 9th January 1859, had, at the date of his death in February 1894, no residential settlement in any parish, and accordingly his settlement at that date was in the parish of his birth, the parish of Glassary.

4. From 3rd July 1894, when she was between eight and nine years of age, until 15th April 1902, when she was aged sixteen years and four months, the pauper resided continuously in the Orphan Homes, Whiteinch, in the parish of Govan. During her residence in these homes up to the age of fifteen the pauper was sent out each day to a public school for her education.

5. After leaving the said Orphan Homes at Whiteinch in April 1902, until the date of her admission to the said Govan District Asylum on 8th May 1904 at the age of eighteen years and five months, the pauper was in domestic service. Her residences during this period were as follows [here followed a list of residences in various parishes in or about Glasgow]. Until about two weeks before her admission to the said asylum the pauper was a bright, intelligent girl.

6. If the pauper became capable of acquiring an independent settlement when she attained the age of twelve years in December 1897, then, by her continued residence in the said Orphan Homes thereafter until April 1902, the pauper acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Govan, which settlement she had not lost at the date of her becoming chargeable as a pauper. The parish of Govan would accordingly, in that event, be the parish liable for the pauper's maintenance.

7. The Parish Council of the parish of Govan, however, maintain that in consequence of the Education (Scotland) Act 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 9) no child can now be held to become capable of acquiring an independent settlement until it has attained the age of fourteen. If this contention be sound, then the pauper's residence of two years and four months in the parish of Govan, after attaining the age of fourteen, and before becoming chargeable, was not sufficient for the acquisition by her of a residential settlement in the parish of Govan. The pauper did not subsequently and prior to her becoming chargeable acquire a settlement elsewhere, and accordingly, as her father died leaving only a birth settlement, she would, in this view, take her own birth settlement, which is in the parish of Glassary, and that parish would be liable for her maintenance, and bound to relieve the parish of Govan of the sums expended by it on such maintenance.

8. The Parish Council of the parish of Glassary, on the other hand, maintain that no change has been made by the Education (Scotland) Act 1901 in the time at which a child becomes capable of acquiring an independent settlement, and that the time at which a child is capable of commencing to acquire an independent settlement falls to be determined independent of the provisions of that Act. They accordingly contend that by her residence in the parish of Govan for four years and four months after attaining the age of twelve, and before becoming chargeable, the pauper acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Govan, which she had not lost at the date when she became chargeable, and that therefore the parish of Govan is liable for her maintenance.

The following Questions of Law were submitted:—

1. Did the said Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie, the pauper, become capable of acquiring an independent settlement on attaining the age of twelve years? Or,
   Did she become capable of acquiring an independent settlement only on attaining the age of fourteen years?
2. Are the first parties, the Parish Council of the parish of Govan Combination, liable for the maintenance of the said Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie, the pauper, so long as she continues chargeable? Or,
   Are the second parties, the Parish Council of the parish of Glassary, liable for such maintenance?

1st Div.

Parish Council of Govan v. Parish Council of Glassary.

The Education (Scotland) Act 1901 provides as follows:

Sect. 1. It shall be the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age.

Sect. 2. It shall not be lawful for any person to take into his employment any child (1) who is under the age of twelve years or (2) who, being of the age of twelve years and not more than fourteen years, has not obtained exemption from the obligation to attend school from the School Board of the district in the manner provided in the next following section. . . .

The following cases were referred to in argument:—

For the First Parties: Craig v. Craig & M'Donald, 1863, 1 M. 1172; Parish of St Cuthbert's v. Parish of Cramond, 1873, 1 R. 174; Greig v. Ross, 1877, 4 R. 465, per Lord Gifford at p. 468.

For the Second Parties: M'Lennan v. Waite, 1872, 10 M. 908; Parochial Board of Elgin v. Parochial Board of Kinloss, 1893, 20 R. 763.

The Court answered the first branch of the first question in the affirmative, and the first branch of the second question in the affirmative.

The Lord President.—My Lords, it seems to me that this is a very plain case. It is admitted that but for the Education Act this case falls directly under the decision in Craig v. Greig & M'Donald, 1863, 1 M. 1189, because here is a child, with her father dead, who, since the time of the father's death, and at her puberty, acquired a residential settlement. Now the only thing that is said to prevent the application of the decided case is that since the time of the decision the Education Act of 1901 has been passed. The Education Act of 1901, by the first section thereof, makes it the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age. Accordingly, the second section prohibits persons from taking into their employment children being of the age of twelve and not more than fourteen who have not obtained an exemption from the School Board. It is argued that, because of that Act, there is therefore a disability upon a female child who, although of the age of puberty, that is to say, over twelve, is still under fourteen, doing those things which really go to the acquiring of a residential settlement.

My Lords, it would be a very curious result if it were so, because, undoubtedly, I think it is easy to say that the Legislature in passing the Education Act of 1901 had not the remotest notion that they were dealing with the Poor Law. I do not think any such result follows, for a very simple reason. It has been said again and again, alas! too truly, that all these Poor Law Rules embodied in the decisions are artificial to the highest degree. How artificial in cases of this sort can easily be gathered when one thinks how practically impossible it is for a female child of twelve years of age to earn its own livelihood. But there is the rule, artificial as it is, that when the father is dead and the child is emancipated and comes to the age of puberty, it is in a position in which it is theoretically supposed to be earning its own livelihood. Therefore I think the answer to the argument is a very easy one, that, although the Act imposes certain duties upon parents to provide the child with elementary education, it does not affect the theoretical capacity of the child to earn its own livelihood. The practical capacity, as I understand, in 999 cases out of 1000 is not there, although theoretically it is. One can conceive of a child who, for some reason or other, was so gifted as to be able to perform upon an instrument such as the violin, and who, at such tender years, could make sufficient money to earn her own livelihood, and who at the same time might have quite enough hours of the day which she might devote to reading, writing, and arithmetic. But, my Lords, the answer is a simple one—that the Act which has been quoted has really nothing to do with the subject which is before us. Accordingly, I am for answering the first branch of the first question in the affirmative, and the first branch of the second question in the affirmative also.

Lord Dundas.—My Lords, the question raised in this Special Case is a very short one, and (although it has to deal with Poor Law Settlement) I think it is a very simple one. The first parties maintain that, in consequence of the Education (Scotland) Act 1901, no child can be held to become capable of acquiring an independent settlement until it has attained the age of fourteen; and they seek to apply that doctrine to the effect that, in the case of females, the age at which they become capable of acquiring such a settlement has been altered from twelve to fourteen. My Lords, I think that contention is unsound. The Act 1 Edw. VII. cap. 9 is entitled "An Act to Regulate the Employment and Attendance of Children at School in Scotland." It is an Education Act pure and simple. It does not profess in any way to deal with the Poor Law, nor can it, in my judgment, be held to do so by any reasonable implication. I think it is plain, as your Lordship has pointed out, that the statute relied upon has nothing at all to do with the subject of the Poor Law. We must therefore, in my opinion, negative the contention of the first parties; and I agree that the questions should be answered as your Lordship proposes.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur.—2nd November 1907.

FIRST DIVISION.

(The Lord President, Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.)

201. Alexander v. Marmor Limited, et e contra.

Company—Director—Illegal Payment—Payment to Director of Expenses Incurred in Travelling to Attend Board Meetings Held to be Illegal.

These were cross actions to which the parties were Marmor Limited, a Company having its registered office in London, and Mr Alexander, a merchant resident in Glasgow, one of the directors of the Company. In the first action Alexander sued the Company for the sum of £525, alleged to be due to him by the Company in payment of his fees as director. The Company, in defence, averred that these sums had already been paid, with the exception of a balance of £114, of which they tendered payment. The defences in effect amounted to the statement of a counter-claim in the Company against Alexander, which claim included, inter alia, a sum of £279, 6s., which had been paid to him for travelling expenses, and which it was alleged the Company were entitled to recover. The Lord Ordinary (Dundas) held that the question so raised could not be raised by way of defence merely, and sisted the action in order that the Company might raise a counter-action.

A counter-action was accordingly raised in which the Company sued Alexander for, inter alia, the said sum of £279, 6s. In this action the pursuers averred that in 1902 the defender applied to the Board of Directors to authorise payment to him of his expenses incurred in travelling to attend the meetings of the Board; that the directors passed a resolution that travelling expenses should be paid to directors; that the defender accordingly applied to and received payment from the Company of the sum sued for, being seven guineas for each of thirty-eight attendances. They claimed repayment upon the ground that the said resolution and payment were irregular, ultra vires, and illegal, and that the Company and its directors had no power to authorise and make such payment.

The defender denied that the said resolution and payment were illegal or ultra vires of the Company, and explained that, even if the payment were ultra vires of the Company, the action of the directors in authorising the payment was protected under the Articles of Association of the Company. The clause of the Articles of Association upon which the defender mainly relied is quoted in the Lord Ordinary's judgment infra. The defender made other averments in support of a plea of bar, to which, for the purpose of this report, it is not necessary to refer more particularly. He pleaded, inter alia—

Alexander v. Marmor Ltd., et e contra.

5. The payment now challenged not being illegal or ultra vires of the Company, et separatim being protected by the Articles of Association of the said Company, the pursuers are not entitled to repayment of the sum claimed.

6. The defender being entitled to receive payment of said sum of £279, 6s., is not bound to make repetition of it to the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary repelled, inter alia, these pleas and ordained the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s.

Lord Dundas.—The matter involved in the first conclusion of the summons may, I think, be disposed of upon the pleadings, without the necessity of enquiry by way of proof. Payment to the defender of travelling expenses, though made and accepted in perfect bona fides, was, in my opinion, illegal. I find no warrant for it in the Articles of Association of the Company. By Article 77 the "remuneration" of each director (except the chairman) is declared to be £200 per annum. But the defender founds upon Article 92, which, under the head of "Indemnity to Officers," provides that "the directors, trustees, and officers of the Company shall be indemnified out of the funds of the Company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices, or by reason or on account of any contract, act, deed, matter, or thing which shall be made, done, permitted, entered into, or executed by them respectively on behalf of or bona fide in the interest of or with the view of benefiting the Company, notwithstanding that the same may be ultra vires in point of law." These words of indemnification are wide; but I do not think that the expenses incurred by a director in arriving at the Company's board room to attend meetings (be the distance long or short) can be held to be expenses incurred by him in the execution of his office. Such expenses must, in my judgment, be included in the remuneration for which he agreed to give his services. The director, I take it, executes his office in the board room, but not on the way thither. It is, I consider, part of his ordinary duty, for which he is paid, to go to the place where the meetings are held. I should have come to this conclusion, apart from authority; but I am fortified in it by the opinion of Farwell, J. (now L.J.) in the case of Young [1905], 1 K.B. 687. The clause there under consideration is not, I think, materially different from Article 92 of this Company's articles, and I assent to the general observations made by his Lordship as to the position and duty of directors in this matter. . . .

The defender reclaimed.

The argument appears sufficiently from the Lord President's Opinion, infra.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it decerned the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s., and in lieu thereof found that he was bound to make payment of the said sum, and, quoad ultra, adhered to the interlocutor.

The Lord President.—There are here two

1st Div.

Alexander v. Marmor Ltd., et e contra.

The Lord President.

actions. The leading action was at the instance of Mr Alexander against a Company called Marmor Ltd., and in it Mr Alexander sued for fees due to him as director. The defence was that he had already been paid, except as to a certain balance which was tendered; but the true matter of dispute between the parties was whether in an accounting between the parties the Company were entitled to get back from Mr Alexander a sum of £279, 6s. which he had been paid in the name of travelling expenses, and also whether they were entitled to get from him a sum of £100 due upon certain shares which had been allotted to him. The Lord Ordinary held that these questions could not be raised by way of mere defence, but must be raised by counter-action, and accordingly a counter-action was raised by the Company against Alexander for these two sums. It is in that action that the operative decree of the Lord Ordinary has been pronounced. What his Lordship has done is: he has decerned against Mr Alexander for £279, 6s., and he has allowed a proof as to the £100. In the reclaiming note parties have agreed that there must be a proof about this matter of the £100, as to whether it has been paid or not; but they are not at one about the £279, 6s.

Now the first question that arises upon the £279, 6s. is whether the payment as originally made was an illegal payment. It is common ground that the travelling expenses in question are not travelling expenses incurred in any particular journey on which Mr Alexander was sent by the other directors, such as a visit of inspection to quarries or anything of that sort, but simply represent Mr Alexander's own expenses in arriving at the scene of the Company's meetings, the Company's meetings being held in London, whereas Mr Alexander lived in Scotland. It is also common ground between the parties that these expenses were authorised to be made by the directors, and that they have never been submitted to one of the authorising meetings of the Company. In these circumstances Mr Alexander pleads Article 92 of the Articles of Association of the Company, which is in these terms:—"The directors, trustees, and officers of the Company shall be indemnified out of the funds of the Company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices, or by reason or on account of any contract, act, deed, matter, or thing which shall be made, done, permitted, entered into, or executed by them respectively on behalf of or bona fide in the interest of or with the view of benefiting the Company, notwithstanding that the same may be ultra vires in point of law." I am clearly of opinion that these expenses do not come under either of these heads. I do not think that a payment to a director, in order to get from his own dwelling-house to where the Company has its meetings, is an expense which he is put to in the execution of his office. He only begins to execute his office for the Company at the directors' meetings. I am not doubting that a payment of travelling expenses could be perfectly well made to a director where the director, at the request of the other directors, undertakes any special visit of inspection, or undertakes to go anywhere where he would not naturally be, in the interest of the Company. If, for instance, this company had wished any of their quarries inspected, even if these quarries had been in Greece or any other far-away part of the world, I do not doubt that it would have been a perfectly good charge to charge the travelling expenses of the director who was sent out there. But the ordinary expense which a man incurs in getting from where he himself chooses to live to the seat of the Company's business, does not seem to me to be expense that is incurred in the execution of his office at all. As little could it be expense that falls under the second head, which truly deals with another and different class of matter altogether. That means that if the directors or officers of the Company have done something in the interests of the Company bona fide, they should be paid for the expenses that they have incurred in that, even although it may be afterwards found to be ultra vires of the Company. That has to do with a different category of circumstances. Therefore I have come to the conclusion, without any difficulty, that we should start the matter by finding that these expenses were illegally paid by the directors to the particular director, and the consequence is that in a question with the Company he is bound to refund this illegal payment. . . .

Accordingly I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion. As regards the actual form of the judgment, he has made a decerniture for payment, which, of course, is not what was meant. I would advise your Lordships to recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it decerns the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s., and in lieu thereof find that the defender is bound to make payment, and, quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship in the chair. On the first branch of the case I think it is perfectly clear that directors' duties in general are to be performed at Board meetings, for the business of directors of companies necessitates meetings for consultation, and the fees allowed to the directors cover the expenses of going to the Board meetings. Of course, if a director is sent anywhere on a delegated duty, it is equally clear that he has to be paid his expenses, because I do not think that his colleagues would be able to secure the services of one of their number to go upon a distant journey except under the condition that he should be relieved of the expenses that he incurred in the interests of the Company. . . .

202. Morton v. French and Others.

Writ — Authentication — Execution by Mark—Privileged Document—Nomination of Beneficiary Under Friendly Societies Acts—Held that Such a Nomination Was Not a Privileged Document, and that Execution by Mark Before Witnesses was Not a Valid Authentication.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.

This was an action of multiplepoinding for the purpose of having determined the right to a sum of £36, 8s., due under a contract of insurance between the late Mrs Mary French and the Liverpool Victoria Legal Friendly Society, which was an industrial insurance company registered under the Friendly Societies Acts. Mrs French died on 7th January 1906, and Morton claimed the policy money in virtue of a nomination thereto in his favour, and James French and Elizabeth Macdonald claimed the sum as Mrs French's next of kin.

The next of kin pleaded, inter alia: "The nomination under which the said James Morton claims not being a writing under the hand of said Mary French, is of no effect."

The Friendly Societies Act 1896 provides by sect. 56 (1)—

"A member of a registered society (other than a benevolent society or working men's club) or branch thereof, not being under the age of sixteen years, may, by writing under his hand, delivered at, or sent to, the registered office of the society or branch, or made in a book kept at that office, nominate a person to whom any sum of money payable by the society or branch on the death of that member, not exceeding one hundred pounds, shall be paid at his decease."

The nomination was as follows:—

"I, Mary French, of 57 Jamieson Street, Govanhill, Town of Glasgow, not being under the age of sixteen years, hereby revoke all previous nominations, if any, made by me, and do hereby nominate James Morton, of 32 Carfin Street, Govanhill, Town of Glasgow, to receive the money payable on my death on insurance dated 25/6/04 (5316782) (as per ordinary branch policy) in accordance with the table of assurance and rules of the above named society in use at the date of such assurance and any alterations or amendments of the said rules.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Davidson) found that Mrs French had duly nominated James Morton to the policy money and ranked him to the fund in medio.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie), without recalling the Sheriff-Substitute's finding as to the validity of the nomination, held that the next of kin were entitled to the policy money.

James Morton appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for Appellant: This was neither a will nor a formal document. It was in the nature of an assignation. Such a society as this was bound to recognise and follow a practice, such as had been proved in the case, of giving effect to a signature by mark in making a nomination (Marito's Case, 1867, L.R. 2 Ch. Ap. 596). In an ordinary contract signature by mark was sufficient, and this was such a case (Baker v. Denning, 1838, 8 A. and E. 94; Addison on Contract, 10th edit., p. 38). In another view this was a highly privileged document, and it should receive such privileges in the matter of signature as were given to privileged documents. Documents in re mercatoria were allowed to be authenticated by mark, and such execution ought to be given effect to in a document specially permitted by Act of Parliament for the reasons which moved Parliament to provide for such nominations.

Argued for Respondents: Signature by mark was held sufficient only in the case of documents in re mercatoria. A nomination such as this was really of the nature of a will (Baxter [1903], P. 12). By the law of Scotland signature of a will by mark was not sufficient (Stirling Stuart v. Stirling Crawfurd's Trs., 1885, 12 R. 610, per Lord M'Laren at p. 617). And that was the law with regard to all documents not in re mercatoria (Graham v. M'Leod, 1848, 11 D. 173; Crosbie v. Wilson, 1865, 3 M. 870; Bell's Conveyancing, 3rd ed., I. 49; Ersk., III. ii. 7, 8). Bell's Com., I. 342, stated what were writs in re mercatoria, and such deeds as the present were not included. The only methods of executing other deeds were the old method with four witnesses and two notaries, and the method prescribed by sect. 41 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874.

The Court held that the nomination founded on by James Morton was invalid, in respect it was not duly authenticated.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think that the document founded on in this case is not one which can receive effect. In my opinion it is not legally signed and authenticated. I am satisfied that this is a case in which no relaxation can be allowed of the rule of law as to the authentication of deeds. Our law has always been very strict in that matter, and it does not depend on custom but on distinct statutory enactment. In certain cases where formality is not required, authentication by mark has been allowed. I allude to the class of writings known as in re mercatoria, but we are not here dealing with a document in re mercatoria. It is a deed which is practically testamentary in its nature. It is a revocable deed, and one which the party who signs can set aside. It has been held in England that such a document may be testamentary in its character, and with that I agree. The only remaining question is—Does the mode of authentication fall within any special expression as to the manner of nomination contained in the Act? In some cases—e.g. under sect. 16 of the Marriage Notice (Scotland) Act 1878—a person who is unable to write is allowed to adhibit his signature by a cross or other mark. But here the words of the statute simply are "by writing under his hand," without specifying the mode of signing. Where a relaxation in the rule as to signing is allowed, it has been specifically done by Act of Parliament. Here we have no such relaxation by the Friendly Societies Act, under which alone we are. We must therefore follow the universal rule of law, to which no exception has been made.

I propose that the first plea in law for James French should be upheld.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

203. Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Company Limited.

Master and Servant—Wrongful Act of Servant—Liability of Master—Manager of Hydropathic Establishment Interfering to Settle Dispute Between Guests—Detaining Guest in Manager's Room Against Her Wish—Whether Manager Acting Within the Scope of Employment—Issue Allowed.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

In this action the pursuer, Mrs Mackenzie, sued the defenders for damages in respect of a wrong alleged to have been committed by their manager at their hydropathic establishment, the wrong consisting in having detained her in his private room against her will for a period of about fifteen minutes.

The pursuer stated:—

Cond. 2. On or about 19th August 1906 the pursuer was residing at the defenders' hydropathic, Forres, owned by the defenders, who are a limited company. The manager thereof at said date was Thomas M'Nair, who was entrusted by the defenders with the management of the hydropathic and the supervision of the comfort of the guests in the defenders' hydropathic.

Cond. 3. Late in the evening of the date in question the defenders' said manager went to the recreation room, where pursuer was, and requested her presence in his private room, saying that a lady, who was ill, wished to see her, and in accordance with the said request the pursuer went to the said private room. The pursuer went to the said room by request of the said Thomas M'Nair, believing, as was the fact, that in making the said request he was acting as the defenders' manager.

Cond. 4. When the pursuer arrived in the said private room she found there a Mr and Mrs Robertson, who were her fellow-guests in the hydropathic. The said Mrs Robertson had, for some reason or another unknown to the pursuer, conceived an ill-will against her. There were also present Mrs M'Nair, wife of the said Thomas M'Nair, and the said Thomas M'Nair. The pursuer was detained for a considerable period against her will in the said private room, and an assault was committed upon her by the said Alexander Robertson. The said Alexander Robertson also slandered her by calling her a low woman, and alleging she had previously caused disturbances "here." The pursuer endeavoured to leave the manager's room. She put her hand on the handle of the door and the said Alexander Robertson then stepped between her and the door, and struck her hand from the handle. Mr and Mrs Robertson then both placed themselves against the door to keep it shut. The pursuer then pointed out to the defenders' manager that she was being forcibly detained in the said room, and asked him to see that she was allowed to leave, but this the said manager refused to do.

The said manager, for some fifteen minutes, then aided and abetted the Robertsons in preventing the pursuer from leaving the said room in manner aforesaid. The said manager neither ordered nor even requested the Robertsons to let the pursuer out, nor did he ring the bell or take any other steps open to him to have the pursuer's detention ended. Had the defenders' manager requested the Robertsons to allow the pursuer to leave the room, the pursuer believes and avers they would have done so. Had the manager summoned assistance by ringing the bell, or in any other way, assistance would have been forthcoming, and the pursuer's detention ended. Although the pursuer was anxious to leave the said room, and so expressed herself to the defenders' manager, she was nevertheless detained and prevented from leaving the said room for a considerable period (about fifteen minutes) by the said manager, who said he would not allow her to leave the room till she apologised to Mrs Robertson for slamming a door in her face—a thing she, the pursuer, had never done.

Cond. 5. In asking pursuer to go to his private room, and in detaining her there against her will as aforesaid, the defenders' manager was acting within the scope of his employment and in the supposed furtherance of the defenders' interests. He had no right, in the circumstances, to induce the pursuer to go to his room when he knew, as he did, that the Robertsons had an ill-will towards her, and that she would be unprotected, and he was bound to have at once seen that she, the defenders' guest, was allowed to leave the room when she wished to. He failed in his duty, and along with Robertson and his wife, detained her in the said room for a considerable period. Such detention was illegal and improper, and the defenders are liable therefor to the pursuer for the loss, injury and damage occasioned thereby.

The pursuer pleaded:—

"1. The pursuer having suffered loss, injury and damage through the wrongous and illegal actings of the defenders' servant as condescended on, decree should be granted as craved.

"2. The defenders' servant, acting within the scope of his authority from the defenders, having wrongously induced the pursuer to enter his private room, and thereafter having wrongfully detained the pursuer there as condescended on, decree should be granted as craved."

The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

The Lord Ordinary found that the allegations of the pursuer were not relevant, and assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuer of this action avers that on 19th August 1906 she was a guest in the hydropathic belonging to the defenders, that on the evening of that day she was summoned by the manager to his private room, and that when she arrived there she was slandered and assaulted by two fellow guests, Mr and Mrs Robertson. She has already raised an action against these persons in which issues have been adjusted—there being no question of the relevancy of her averments as against them. She maintains, however, that she has a separate ground of action against the present defenders on the ground that their manager detained her in the room against her will for a considerable period (about fifteen minutes). She avers that in doing so he was acting within the scope of his employment, and in the supposed furtherance of the defenders' interests.

The injury which the defenders' manager is said to have done to the pursuer is so small as to be almost microscopic. It is not said even in the amended record that he laid hands upon her, or that he in any way actively contributed to her detention in the room. This is part of her grievance against Mr Robertson, who is said to have stood against the door and prevented her opening it. The complaint against the manager seems rather to be that he did not intervene to protect her against the Robertsons by ringing the bell, or otherwise summoning assistance, or by requesting the Robertsons to permit her to leave. It is not suggested that he could thereby have prevented the alleged assault, but only that he might possibly have shortened her detention in the room by some minutes. Even against the manager, therefore, it does not appear to me that it would be possible to construct a relevant case. It follows that if there can be no action against the servant because of his non-intervention in the quarrel between the pursuer and the Robertsons there can be no possible claim against his employers.

There is, however, another and separate ground on which I think that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied. It was decided in the case of Poulton, L.R., 1867, 2 Q.B. 534, that the scope of a servant's authority is always limited to such acts as the employers could lawfully do themselves. For a mistake or excess in committing such an act by a servant, his employer may well be held responsible, but not for an act which the employers cannot be supposed to have authorised, because they had no authority to do it themselves. I assume that it is part of the duty of a manager of a hydropathic to attend to the comfort of the guests, as the pursuer avers, but it would be odd if I were required to hold that this impliedly authorised him to be a party to the detention of one guest in order to gratify the ill-will of another. The pursuer was unable to cite any authority for such a novel proposition. The only case referred to was that of Bryce v. The Glasgow Tramway Company, 1898, 6 S.L.T. 49. It has, in my opinion, absolutely no application. The act which the servant in that case was alleged to have done in a careless and reckless manner was an act which it was his duty towards his employers and in their interests to do, and accordingly the action was well directed against his employers.

I shall accordingly assoilzie the defenders, and I have the less hesitation in doing so as it appears to me to be plainly in the interests of the pursuer that she should not be embarrassed with a second action for damages arising out of the self-same species facti as have already been remitted for trial by a jury. If she succeeds in that case, she will recover full compensation for all injury that she has suffered; if she fails, it is scarcely conceivable that she could recover against the present defenders.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the Pursuer: The action was relevant. The wrong complained of was distinct from the assault referred to. It was an actionable wrong for the manager of the hydropathic to detain the pursuer in his private room against her will. He was restraining her freedom. It was a monstrous thing for such a manager to say he would not allow a guest in the establishment out of his private room until she apologised to another guest. There was no doubt he was acting within the scope of his employment in trying to settle disputes between the guests. It was for the peace and harmony of the establishment that the manager should have power to do such a thing at times, and he must be the judge of the time to do it. If in doing a thing which he had power to do he did an actionable wrong the defenders as his employers were liable. It was absurd to say that whenever he did what was illegal he did not render them liable because they could not be assumed to authorise an illegal act. That would put an end to all actions against a master for a wrong committed by his servant. If he was authorised in the course of his employment to do what he was doing at the time in a legal manner, the defenders would be liable for an illegal manner of doing it. Counsel referred to Citizens Life Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Brown [1904], A.C. 423; Wood v. North British Railway Company, 1899, 1 F. 562; Dyer v. Munday [1895], 1 Q.B. 742; Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 1867, L.R. 2 Q.B. 534; Limpus v. London Omnibus Company, 1862, 1 H. and C. 526; Ward v. General Omnibus Company, 1873, 42 L.J. C.P. 265; Ellis v. National Free Labour Association, 1905, 7 F. 629; Maxwell v. Caledonian Railway Company, 1898, 25 R. 550; Bryce v. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, 1898, 6 S.L.T. 49. The application of the principle de minimis non curat lex had no place in the case of reparation for a wrong.

Argued for Defenders: There was no relevant statement that the act complained of was in the scope of the manager's employment. It was necessary in all cases against a master for the act of his servant for the pursuer to aver (1) employment, and (2) facts from which the Court could infer that the act complained of was done for the master's benefit. The first was admitted. As to the second there might be either of two cases. The authority might be to make a contract and the action might be laid on contract. In that case the master was, prima facie, liable; he took the risk of the servant exceeding his powers. But where the action was laid on a wrong committed, prima facie the master was not liable, because he there took no risk. Here the onus was on the pursuer, and he was bound to shew that the manager was acting for the master's benefit in what he did. But it appeared from the condescendence that he was not so acting, because it was stated that the other guest, Mrs Robertson, had conceived an ill-will towards the pursuer, that the manager knew this, and that he intervened on her behalf in order to try and extract an apology from the pursuer to her. That could not be acting for the benefit of the defenders. Counsel founded on Limpus v. London Omnibus Company, cit. supra; Wardrope v. D. Hamilton, 1876, 3 R. 876; Lundie v. MacBrayne, 1894, 21 R. 1085; Gillespie v. Hunter, 1898, 25 R. 916. The maxim de minimis non curat lex was applicable. The pursuer had already sued an action against the Robertsons and obtained damages on the same res gestæ as were founded on here. There was only one incident. The pursuer was not entitled to split it up into the subject of several actions (Ferguson v. Colquhoun, 1862, 24 D. 1428; Hassan v. Paterson, 1885, 12 R. 1164). She had suffered no damages from any detention she might have been subjected to, and an action for damages in the circumstances averred was ridiculous.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and allowed an issue in the following terms, viz.:—

"Whether, on or about 19th August 1906, the defenders' manager, Thomas M'Nair, acting within the scope of his employment by the defenders, having induced the pursuer to enter his private room in the defenders' hydropathic establishment, wrongously detained her there,—to her loss, injury and damage?

"Damages laid at £400."

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I cannot see any ground for treating this case as one which ought to be disposed of without the facts being first ascertained. Such cases necessarily depend very much on the particular facts, and if this record does not present such features as make it necessary to assume that the manager of the hydropathic establishment was not acting in the course of his employment, then I think it must be allowed to go to trial.

I do not think a case of this kind can be dealt with on any application of the de minimis principle, at least until the whole facts are found. It is the facts alone on which the question of de minimis can arise.

We had a suggestion from the Solicitor-General that the manager could not be acting in the course of his employment, because the pursuer says that he induced her to go to his room because a fellow-guest had conceived an ill-will toward her and he knew it, and that therefore he was acting not as manager but in the private interests of the other guest. That, of course, is a statement which she will be entitled to prove. But the case is of this kind, that this lady says that she went willingly to the manager's room and was detained there against her will for an appreciable time. The manager certainly got her to go there while acting in the course of his employment, and I do not see any ground for saying that on the statements made on this record he must have ceased so to act before she was detained. I must say I think the statement quoted to us from the opinion of Lord Lindley in the case of the Citizens Life Assurance Company

v. Brown [1904], A.C. 423 at pp. 427–8, is applicable to this case. "The law upon this subject cannot be better stated than it was by the acting Chief Justice in this case. He said: 'Although the particular act which gives the cause of action may not be authorised, still if the act is done in the course of employment which is authorised, then the master is liable for the act of his servant.'" I can have no doubt that the manager of a hydropathic establishment is authorised to interfere in the way referred to in this case when there is a quarrel between guests, and to bring them together to have the matter put right. If in the course of so doing he commits an actionable wrong, I have no doubt the master is liable. I propose to your Lordships that we allow an issue.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—It is only because we are reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary that I add anything to what has been already said by your Lordship. The main question at this stage of the case is whether there are relevant averments of an actionable wrong for which the manager's principal, i.e. the Hydropathic Company, may be liable. I think it must be admitted that the wrong, if wrong there was, was a very small one, for the averments of the pursuer at most amount to this, that the manager persuaded the pursuer to enter his private room, and detained her there against her will for some fifteen minutes.

I think, however, that these averments are relevant, and that the case must go to a jury. I am accordingly in favour of allowing an issue, although I hope that parties may yet see their way to settling this insignificant dispute. I think it unnecessary to attempt to improve on the statement of the law applicable to such cases, which has already been made by many eminent judges. I am content to take the statement quoted by your Lordship from the opinion of Lord Lindley in the Citizens Life Assurance Co. v. Brown [1904], A.C. 423. Applying that law, I think the facts must be ascertained, unless it clearly appears from the pursuer's own averments that the servant was not acting in the course of his employment.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked to throw out this action upon three grounds: first, that there are no relevant averments of an actionable wrong; second, that upon the averments it is evident that the manager was not acting within the scope of his employment or in the course of his duty; and third, that in any event the whole affair was trifling and the damage suffered negligible. In regard to the first of these grounds I have no doubt that a wrong, and in my view not a trifling wrong, has been averred. It is averred that the manager detained this lady in his room for fifteen minutes after the assault had been committed, and refused to let her go until she made an apology. If that be true it was an outrage, and a relevant case has been stated.

2nd Div.

Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co. Ltd.

Lord Low.

As to the second ground I have nothing to add to what has been said by your Lordship. It cannot be doubted that the manager, at first at all events, intervened in his capacity as manager, and there must be enquiry to find out whether in his subsequent actings he abandoned that capacity and acted as a private individual. As to the third ground, if an actionable wrong was committed, it does not matter that, prima facie, the pursuer sustained but little injury; she is, at any rate, entitled to ask a jury to assess the damage.

Lord Ardwall.—I regret that I feel bound to concur with the opinion your Lordships have expressed that this case must be sent to a jury. I cannot accept without considerable qualification the law laid down by the Lord Ordinary; and although the case is a narrow one, I am not prepared to say that it is irrelevant. While there is much force in Mr Murray's contention that the whole affair was really one incident, which a jury have already considered, and for which they have already awarded the pursuer a certain sum of damages, still, if the averments are carefully scrutinised, it is apparent that two separate wrongs are complained of: firstly, slander and assault by Robertson (the case already considered by a jury); secondly, illegal detention by the manager (the case in which an issue is now asked). It cannot, therefore, be maintained that the pursuer is not entitled in law, if not in equity, to bring a second and separate action. I express no opinion as to the nature of the injury she sustained; that is a question for the jury.—23rd November 1907.

1ST DIV. DISCRETION TO REFER TO COURT OF SESSION DIFFICULT QUESTIONS OF CONSTRUCTION AND ENQUIRIES INTO DISPUTED QUESTION OF FACT.

Macandrew v. Dods.

Appeal from the Dean of Guild Court at Edinburgh.

This was a petition to the Dean of Guild Court by Colin Macandrew, proprietor of ground situated at No. 13 Lauriston Gardens, Edinburgh, asking warrant to the petitioner to erect upon the said premises, buildings consisting of offices and lavatory. The petition was opposed by Dods, a contiguous proprietor in Lauriston Gardens. The respondent's opposition was mainly upon the ground that the erection of the proposed buildings would be a contravention of two restrictions imposed upon the petitioner by his title, and enforceable by the respondent, viz.: (1) a prohibition against the erection of buildings other than villas upon the subjects; and (2) a prohibition against the erection of buildings thereon exceeding a certain height. The respondent also averred that in 1899 an application was made to the Dean of Guild by the present petitioner for a warrant very similar to that now craved; that on that occasion the parties in right of the feu now owned by the respondent opposed the application on grounds identical with those now put forward; in those proceedings the Dean of Guild having considered the whole cause, sisted the petition to enable the rights of the petitioner and the then respondents respectively to be established in the Court of Session, but that no further steps were taken at that time by the petitioner to establish his rights. The petitioner denied the respondent's statements as regards the said restrictions, and averred especially, with regard to (1) that if any restriction existed such restriction was only against feuing the subjects for the erection of buildings other than villas, not against the erection of such buildings by the petitioner; and with regard to (2) that the plot of ground upon which it was proposed to build was not within the area to which the alleged restriction applied. The circumstances of this application appear more fully from the Dean of Guild's note, infra.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia:—

2. The questions raised in this process being questions of heritable right, are not competent for decision in the Dean of Guild Court, and the petition accordingly falls to be dismissed or sisted till such questions are competently determined.

6. The same questions as are here agitated having been raised in this Court in 1899, and the then Dean of Guild having allowed the petitioner an opportunity of establishing his right in the Court of Session, of which he has not availed himself, he is barred from pursuing the present petition, or otherwise the same should be dismissed or sisted.

The Dean of Guild pronounced the following interlocutor:—

Having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the whole cause, sists the petition to enable the petitioner to establish his alleged rights in the Court of Session, and decerns.

Note.—The petitioner acquired certain land on the west side of Lauriston Gardens from Beattie's trustees by disposition dated 30th March, and subsequent dates, 1889. In that disposition the only restriction upon the land was expressed as follows:—"Declaring that the said Colin Macandrew and his foresaids shall be bound, as by acceptance hereof he binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, not to feu the piece of ground hereby disponed, except for the building of villas, unless with the consent of the feuars in Lauriston Gardens, to whom we or our predecessors in office, as trustees foresaid, have undertaken the like obligation in the feu-rights granted by us to our foresaids; and also that in so far as we are or may be held to be under any obligation ourselves not to erect on the said piece of ground any other buildings than villas, unless with consent foresaid, the said Colin Macandrew and his foresaids shall be under the same obligation, it not being intended to impose on them any obligation against themselves erecting other buildings than villas, unless such obligation already exists upon us, in which case the same obligation shall continue to exist, and shall be binding on them; which burden, obligation, and declaration hereinbefore contained are hereby created and declared to be real servitudes and burdens upon and affecting the piece of ground before disponed, and as such are appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines, as part of these presents, and inserted or validly referred to in any notarial instrument to follow hereon, and in all future transmissions and investitures of the said piece of ground or any part or portion thereof, under pain of nullity of the deed, writ or instrument from which the same shall be omitted." The respondent is the owner of the house and ground immediately to the north of the petitioner's land. The respondent's land was feued by feu-contract dated 9th and 10th December 1863, between Beattie's trustees and William Gibson. The respondent's land was feued with reference to a feuing-plan, and in the feu-contract it is declared that the said feuing-plan is referred "to for no other purpose whatever than as shewing the position of the ground hereby feued, the said parties of the first part reserving right to themselves and their successors to deviate therefrom as they shall think proper in regard to the unfeued ground, except that the said feuing-ground shall only be feued for the erection of villas." In the said feu-contract there is also the following declaration:—"Declaring that the house of Lauriston Lodge and grounds surrounding the same, as shewn on said plan, which has now been feued, shall not be used for such purposes as shall be a nuisance to the said William Gibson and the other feuars, and declaring that no building shall be erected by the said parties of the first part (i.e. the granters), or by their feuars on the grounds of Lauriston Lodge southward of the plot of ground marked A on the said feuing-plan feued to Adam Beattie to the extent of the breadth of that plot on the south side thereof, and to the south boundary of the grounds of Lauriston Lodge, of greater height than the boundary wall of the back-ground of the houses, being 6 feet high, with the exception of summer houses, which may be erected of a greater height, and the said parties of the first part shall take the feuars from them bound to this effect, and to submit to them the plans of any contemplated summer houses to obtain the approval of the party of the second part (i.e. the said William Gibson) or his foresaids before erection thereof." There is no dispute that the lands of the petitioner are part of the lands of Lauriston Lodge. The respondent maintains that (1) there is a valid restriction in the petitioner's title of his land, so that only villas can be erected on it. Admittedly the petitioner's proposed building is not a villa. The respondent also maintains (2) that the petitioner's land is part of the land subject to the servitude created by the respondent's title. The petitioner denies that the land is subject to that servitude.

In 1899 the petitioner made a similar application to this Court, and the respondent avers that that application was for warrant for a building on the same land as the petitioner now proposes to build on. The application in 1899 was opposed by the then owner of the respondent's feu. This Court sisted the petition in 1899 to enable the rights of parties to be established in the competent Court. The petitioner did not proceed after this Court's judgment in 1899 to establish his alleged rights. The Dean of Guild sees no reason for going back on the judgment of the Court in 1899, and therefore he again sists the petitioner's application, and for the reasons expressed in his opinion in 1899 he thinks that it lies on the petitioner to establish his rights.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.

In addition to the argument upon the merits which was submitted to the Court, it was argued for the Petitioner and Appellant: The Dean of Guild might competently dispose of this question, and he had unduly withheld his jurisdiction. The petition should therefore be remitted back to him for his judgment on the merits.

Argued for the Respondent: It was competent for the Dean of Guild to use his discretion in the matter as to whether he should dispose of a difficult point of law or should allow parties to obtain the judgment of the Court.

The Court dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutor appealed against, and remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild.

The Lord President.—My Lords, this case is not one that comes under quite ordinary circumstances. The proprietor of ground in Edinburgh wished some years ago to put up certain buildings. He was then opposed upon grounds which depended upon rights as shewn in the title both of the opponent and of himself, and at that time the Dean of Guild pronounced an interlocutor sisting the case, because he considered that the matter had better be determined in an action at law, and not by pronouncing an interlocutor upon the merits of the case in the Dean of Guild Court. The proprietor at that time acquiesced in that view, and did nothing. He gave up for the time his proposal to build, and he did not raise an action. He then comes back again to the Dean of Guild Court, and he repeats his crave to have a decree of lining granted; and the Dean of Guild of the present time has repeated the interlocutor of his predecessor. An appeal has been taken against that interlocutor by the person who wants to build. His counsel has urged upon your Lordships that the Dean of Guild here has unduly withheld his own jurisdiction, and that the case ought to go back to him again with a behest from your Lordships that he should proceed to dispose of the merits of the case.

Now, my Lords, I am exceedingly far from laying down the proposition that it is not proper of the Dean of Guild to take up questions of legal restriction, where there is no proper competition of heritable right, and where the questions are merely whether the restriction applies or not, however hard and difficult these questions may be. The Books are full of cases where the Dean of Guild in the first instance has had to decide difficult legal questions, and his decisions have come up for review at this Court. If this case had been one where the whole question turned upon the construction of a legal document, and upon construction alone, then I think your Lordships would have been probably inclined, either to send it back to the Dean of Guild or, as has been urged by counsel, to have proceeded at once yourselves to a determination of the case. When the particular restrictions that we have to deal with here are brought before our notice, it is abundantly made clear to me that there is one of them at least that cannot be finally determined without settling a disputed question of fact, and accordingly there has got to be an enquiry.

Now, my Lords, I am certainly not going to start the idea that parties who want an enquiry into these matters are entitled to come to the Inner House and then ask the Inner House to have an enquiry before themselves. Accordingly the only form of enquiry that should be allowed is either to send the case back to the Dean of Guild for enquiry, or to allow the matter to be raised at law. I do not say that if the Dean of Guild had chosen to take up an enquiry any objection would have been made. But he did not. It was a question of discretion, and it was a question of discretion in circumstances where he found that his predecessor had pronounced an interlocutor to that effect some years before, and that no opportunity had been taken to give effect to that interlocutor. That being so, I do not think it is expedient, in the circumstances of this case, to disturb the discretion of the Dean of Guild. I think, therefore, that as there are difficult questions here of construction, and also one question resting upon the determination of fact, they had better be determined by an action at law; all the more that the question of fact seems to me to be a question of fact which really will turn upon questions of evidence rather than upon questions of a practical character, such as the Dean of Guild is specially entitled to determine. We are told here that the plan upon which this matter turns is lost. It is, therefore, not a question of simply going to the ground with a plan—that is to say, it is not a surveyor's question, where the Dean of Guild certainly would be a very good person to determine it. It really comes to be a question of evidence. What sort of evidence I do not quite know: but I suppose it will either be whether certain adminicles will really do instead of the plan, or whether these adminicles have been so lost that, the plan also being lost, the restriction, such as it is, must be held pro non scripto. All these things depend upon legal, and not upon surveying considerations. I therefore think that in the whole circumstances of the case, which I look upon as a peculiar one, the Dean of Guild was right, and your Lordships should affirm his interlocutor; the case, of course, being sisted in order that the petitioner may raise the question by appropriate action at law.

SHERIFF COURT.

(Sheriff-Substitute Shennan and Sheriff Cullen, K.C., at Dunfermline.)

205. Home Drummond and Others v. Thomson and Others.

SHERIFF—JURISDICTION—INTERDICT—HELD THAT THE SHERIFF OF A COUNTY HAS NO JURISDICTION TO GRANT INTERDICT AGAINST PARTIES RESIDENT WITHIN THE COUNTY, IN RESPECT OF THE ILLEGAL USE BY THEM OF A HERITABLE SUBJECT (SALMON FISHING) SITUATED IN ANOTHER SHERIFFDOM.

In this action, which was raised in the Sheriff Court of Fife and Kinross at Dunfermline, the pursuers craved the Court "to interdict, prohibit and discharge the defenders," all of whom resided in Kincardine, county of Fife, "and each of them, from fishing for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any part of the river or estuary of the Forth, with the nets known as drift nets or hang nets, and from placing or setting nets of that description in any part of the said river or estuary, and from fishing for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any part of the said river or estuary with any description of net in the mode of fishing known as drift-net or hang-net fishing."

The facts and defenders' pleas appear from the Notes of both the Sheriff-Substitute and the Sheriff.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Hay Shennan) sustained the defenders' plea of "no jurisdiction," and dismissed the action. He added the following Note.

Note.—The pursuers are proprietors of salmon fishings in the Forth, and the defender Thomson is the lessee of salmon fishings situated lower down the river than the pursuers' fishings. It is stated that the other two defenders are fishermen in Thomson's employment. Pursuers aver that on 21st August 1906 defenders fished in an illegal manner at a place in the parish of Airth and county of Stirling. Defenders all reside at Kincardine, in the county of Fife. The petition prays that the defenders be interdicted from fishing for salmon in the mode of fishing known as drift-net or hang-net fishing in any part of the river or estuary of the Forth. The defenders plead incompetency, and no jurisdiction. No doubt these pleas run into each other, since lack of jurisdiction is one form of incompetency. But I understand that the plea as to competency was intended specially to raise the question whether the remedy sought was of such a character that it could ever be granted in the Sheriff Court. As I am of opinion that I have no jurisdiction, it is unnecessary to deal with this phase of the plea of incompetency, but it is proper to state that, as at present advised, I am of opinion that it is competent to grant in the Sheriff Court an interdict of the kind prayed for, to take effect within the territorial limits of the sheriffdom only.

The pleadings raise no question of heritable title, but only the simple issue of fact whether defenders used a method of fishing for salmon which has been declared by the House of Lords to be an illegal method. Further, there is no doubt that defenders are amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court, on the ground of residence within the sheriffdom. But jurisdiction is defined not only in regard to persons, but also in regard to subject-matter, and the real question in this case is, whether the subject-matter is one on which the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross has power to adjudicate? It is therefore necessary to consider what the subject-matter of the action is. When the question relates to moveable rights or to personal obligations which may be fulfilled anywhere (cf. Ersk. Inst., I. ii. 17), it is enough to found jurisdiction that the defender has his residence within the Sheriffdom to the Court of which he is cited. But "if the subject in question be immoveable, the judge of the territory where it is situated is the sole judge competent, so far as he hath cognisance of heritable rights; for things that are immoveable are incapable of shifting places, and must therefore be restored in that place where they lie, and by the warrant of the judge whose jurisdiction reacheth over them" (Ersk. Inst., I. ii. 17). The test seems to be this:—Where does the act or obligation fall to be performed? Where is the decree to be worked out?

Obligations relating to moveables and personal obligations (even a personal obligation to convey land) can be implemented anywhere, and accordingly in such cases the debtor in the obligation is sued in the court which has jurisdiction over him ratione domicilii. But the obligations and duties relating to the use of an immoveable subject can be fulfilled only at the place where the immoveable subject is. This is true even of a negative obligation, such as an interdict creates, because such an obligation is prestable only in the vicinity of the subject itself. The matter of jurisdiction in the case of immoveable subjects is dealt with in an English case, in which the British South Africa Company sued the Mozambique Company in the English Courts for trespass to lands situated in South Africa (L.R. 1893, App. Cas. 602). The general rule was admitted that the court of the locus is the court to deal with all such questions, but pursuers specially founded their case on the statutory rules of procedure of the English Courts. The House of Lords, however, affirmed the general rule, and refused to sustain the action.

Now the subject-matter of this action is the mode of using the right of salmon fishing in the river and estuary of the Forth, an area which extends into three sheriffdoms. The action is essentially a possessory one. It is a mistake to suppose that possessory questions are only those in which effect is given to possession for seven years. "In cases where no question of heritable right arises, where the heritable right is admitted and undisputed, but where the parties are at issue as to the mode in which they may use and enjoy their respective rights, the Sheriff has undoubted jurisdiction to regulate ad interim the mode of possession, and this apart altogether from the usage during the last seven years" (per Lord Gifford in Sutherland v. Thomson, 29th Feb. 1876, 3 R. 485 at p. 494). This action is neither more nor less than one to regulate the exercise of a heritable right—the right of salmon fishing—an immoveable subject. This being so, the defect of jurisdiction is plain. The Sheriff of Fife and Kinross can only regulate the right of salmon fishing within the sheriffdom. Here I am asked to regulate it within two adjoining sheriffdoms as well, and the illegal act complained of, on which the prayer for interdict is founded, is one which took place in one of these adjoining sheriffdoms. In my opinion, the decree which pursuers ask is plainly ultra vires of the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross, and indeed is a decree which only the Court of Session can grant. The matter may be well illustrated by supposing that pursuers here were praying (as they might) for an order for the removal of fixed engines in the Forth in a question of interim possession. It would be plainly incompetent for the Sheriff of Fife to grant warrant for the removal of a fixed net or fixed engine, situated in a part of the Forth which is in the sheriffdom of Stirling. I see no distinction in principle between that case and the case of interdict against fishing in a certain manner within that same part of the Forth. The negative remedy and the positive alike can be given only by a judge having jurisdiction over the territory affected.

If pursuers wish an interdict as wide as they crave, they must go to the Court of Session for it. If they are content with an interdict limited to the sheriffdom of Stirling, Clackmannan and Dumbarton, grounded on the alleged illegal fishing within that sheriffdom, I should think there is little doubt that the Sheriff of Stirling has jurisdiction at least over the tacksman Thomson, for the principle affirmed in Culross District Committee v. Smith-Sligo's Trs., 19 R. 58, seems as applicable to a tenant as to proprietor.—15*th October* 1906.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Cullen, K.C.), who adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, and added the following note:—The pursuers, who are proprietors of salmon fishings on the rivers Forth and Teith, seek to protect their fishings from injury by obtaining interdict against an alleged illegal mode of fishing practised by the defenders in the lower waters of the Forth. The area within which the interdict is intended to operate lies partly within the county of Fife, and partly within other counties outwith the territorial jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross. The pursuers' case accordingly involves the proposition that the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross has jurisdiction to interdict illegal fishing for salmon in any of the counties of Scotland, on the suit of those having interest, provided the persons sought to be interdicted are ratione domicilii subject to his jurisdiction.

There is little or no direct authority to be found on this class of question. On the principles laid down as applicable to jurisdiction generally, it appears to me that this is a case in which jurisdiction arises ratione rei sitæ. It would certainly, I think, be so as between the jurisdiction of the courts of different countries. The Courts of Scotland would not, I take it, assert jurisdiction to interdict illegal fishing for salmon, or say the use of real property so as to create a nuisance to adjoining proprietors, in England, although the party sought to be interdicted were subject to their jurisdiction ratione domicilii. It does not necessarily follow that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of a county in Scotland is similarly limited in relation to other counties of this country. But in the absence of authority to the contrary, and none has been advanced, the Sheriff's jurisdiction is left to be deduced from the same principles, and I am of opinion that on the application of these principles, the conclusion arrived at by the Sheriff-Substitute is sound.

This conclusion appears to be corroborated by the decision in the case of Culross District Committee v. Smith-Sligo's Trs., 19 R. 58. In that case the pursuers complained of injury occasioned by the defenders illegally abstracting water from pipes belonging to them. Jurisdiction was held to arise ratione rei sitæ, and the defenders were held to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross, and to be competently put under interdict by him, although not subject to his jurisdiction ratione domicilii. The pursuers argued that, esto the judge of the situs had jurisdiction, there was a concurrent jurisdiction in the judge of the domicile. No authority was cited in support of the existence of such a concurrent jurisdiction, and it seems to be inconsistent with the principles laid down by Erskine in the passage from the Institutes quoted in the Sheriff-Substitute's note.—3rd December 1907.

Patent — Design — Registration — Infringement—Infringement in Ignorance of Registration—Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act 1893 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 57), sect. 58 (a) — Ignorance of Registration Not a Good Defence to Action Based on sect. 58 (a)—Werner Motors Ltd. v. A. W. Gamage Ltd. [1904], 2. Ch. 580, Distinguished.

This was an action at the instance of Lawrence Twentyman Boustead against Dempster, Moore & Co. Ltd., concluding for payment to the pursuer of £100 as a statutory forfeit under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883, sect. 58. The pursuer was the proprietor of a design applicable to the manufacture of tree-bark perforators registered under the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Acts 1883 to 1902. The pursuer averred that the defenders had contravened his copyright in the said design by applying it to tree-bark perforators and selling the same in large quantities, and in particular that they sold 1000 of the said perforators to the Selangor Rubber Company during April and May 1906. The defenders, in answer to these averments, admitted that they supplied to the said Company a lot of knives for perforating the bark of rubber trees similar to the knife in the design registered by the pursuer, and explained that a sample of a knife wanted by the Selangor Company was given to them, and that they sold and supplied a quantity in terms of the sample. The defenders further explained (Cond. 3) that at that time they were unaware that the pursuer had registered a design applicable to the knives sold by them, and that when the pursuer intimated the fact to them they undertook not to make or sell any more of said knives, and that the said undertaking was honestly given by the defenders, and was accepted by the pursuer, and had been faithfully kept.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883 provides—

58. During the existence of copyright in any design—

(a) It shall not be lawful for any person without the licence or written consent of the registered proprietor to apply such design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof, in the class or classes of goods in which such design is registered, for purposes of sale to any article of manufacture or to any substance artificial or natural or partly artificial and partly natural; and

(b) It shall not be lawful for any person to publish or expose for sale any article of manufacture or any substance to which such design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof shall have been so applied, knowing that the same has been so applied without the consent of the registered proprietor.

Any person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable for every offence to forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty pounds to the registered proprietor of the design, who may recover such sum as a simple contract debt by action in any court of competent jurisdiction.

By sect. 7 of 51 & 52 Vict. cap. 50, which amends the said Act, it is provided "that the total sum forfeited in respect of any one design shall not exceed £100."

The pursuer pleaded:—

"In respect of the defenders' contraventions of the pursuer's copyright, the pursuer is entitled to decree for the statutory forfeit as craved."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:—

"2. The pursuer is barred by his acceptance of the undertaking mentioned on record.

"3. The defenders should be assoilzied in respect the pursuer's averments, so far as material, are unfounded in fact."

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord Ordinary decerned against the defenders for payment of £40 with expenses.

Lord Dundas.—The pursuer here demands a "forfeit," which he estimates at £100, in respect that the defenders have contravened his copyright in a registered design. Contravention is now admitted. But the defenders resist the pursuer's demand upon various grounds. In the first place, they found upon an undertaking made on their behalf, which is referred to in Answer 3, and plead "3. The pursuer is barred by his acceptance of the undertaking mentioned on record." The plea is, in my opinion, untenable. The pursuer never, so far as I see, acted so as to bar himself from suing the defenders for damages or penalty. They next argued—though the point is not made the subject of a specific plea in law upon the record—that they were unaware when they supplied the goods that the pursuer had a registered design; and upon this ground they claim immunity. I am not, as at present advised, satisfied that the defenders were unaware of this fact. But it is not, in my judgment, necessary to decide the point in one way or the other; because I do not think that, assuming it in the defenders' favour, it would afford them a relevant defence. The action is brought for a penalty under sect. 58 of the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vic. cap. 57), and not for damages under the 59th section. It is laid on subsect. (a) of sect. 58, and not on subsect. (b) thereof. Now it appears to me as matter of construction that the first of these subsections is intended to strike at the manufacturer or producer of the goods, and the second at the retail seller; and that under (a) it is not necessary, as it is under (b), to bring home to the contravener knowledge of the registration of the design. The distinction proceeds upon a perfectly intelligible basis, and I observe that the construction above suggested is that which is adopted by text writers upon the subject (see Fulton's Law and Practice relating to Patents, Trade Marks and Designs, 3rd ed., p. 421; Copinger's Law of Copyright, 4th ed., p. 444 and p. 449). But the defenders' counsel insisted that it had been decided in England that want of knowledge was a good defence to a claim under subsect. (a), and not only to one under subsect. (b). The case relied upon is Werner Motors Ltd., 1904, 1 Ch. 264, and 1904, 2 Ch. 580, also reported in 21 R.P.C. at pp. 137 and 621, decided by Byrne, J., and the Court of Appeal. The decision is not binding upon me; but I should, of course, treat with high respect what is decided or observed by the judges in England. I do not, however, find, on examining the case, that it supports the defenders' proposition. The point really decided in Werner's case was, to quote from the rubric (21 R.P.C. 622), "that the applicant for the patent of an article, and for registration of a design for the shape of a similar article, is not, under the Patents, etc., Act 1883, put to an election, but may secure both." But the question of the defendants' knowledge or ignorance that the design was registered was incidentally canvassed to some extent. The plaintiffs claimed an injunction and damages. Their statement of claim was apparently (21 R.P.C. 138, ll. 15 to 22) based upon both subsections of sect. 58; but I gather from the report of the argument for the plaintiffs (p. 141) that the case really made against the defendants was under subsect. (b); and Byrne, J., expressly states (21 R.P.C. 145, l. 38) that "the defendants have not themselves applied the design." I find nothing therefore in Werner's case to warrant the proposition that ignorance of the fact of registration is a good defence to an action based, like the present, solely upon subsect. (a). I consider that I am free to construe the section for myself; and I accordingly construe it in the sense already indicated, and repel the defence based upon a contrary construction. Lastly, the defenders argued that the pursuer had failed to prove damage to the extent of £100, or to any definite extent. But the pursuer sues not for damages but for the statutory penalty. I think this remedy was provided to meet cases like the present, where the amount at stake is not large, and it might be difficult and costly to establish a case of specific damages (see Copinger, 4th ed., p. 449). As to the quantum, I am of opinion, upon the best consideration I can give to the matter, that decree for £40 will meet the justice of the case.—15*th November* 1907.

Lord Dundas.—Mr Lewis Smith, wholesale bookseller and stationer in Aberdeen, died on 24th October 1880, leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated in 1860, and two codicils thereto, dated respectively in 1875 and 1879. The pursuers and real raisers of this action of multiplepoinding are the trustees surviving and acting under the settlement and codicils. The testator was survived by his widow and by ten children, all of whom had attained majority prior to their father's death. A daughter, Elizabeth, died in 1883, unmarried and intestate. The widow died in 1884. The fund in medio is the part of the truster's estate which has been retained by the trustees for behoof of one of the sons, Frederick Smith, who died on 27th December 1906, unmarried and intestate, and who had for a period of years prior to his death been an inmate of James Murray's Royal Asylum at Perth. At Frederick's death there survived, and still survive, three children of the testator, and families of five other children, who had died between 1884 and 1906, leaving issue. By the settlement, the truster disponed to his trustees All and Whole the estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at his death. By the second purpose the trustees were directed to pay to the truster's widow the whole free annual proceeds of the heritable estate during her life. By the third purpose they were directed to pay to her one third part of the free residue of the personal or moveable estate. The fourth purpose directed the trustees, out of the personal estate, to maintain the testator's son, Lewis Smith, then a patient in the lunatic asylum at Perth, in a comfortable manner and as his situation might require, and that during all the days of his life; but declaring that, if he should permanently recover his reason, the said obligation on the trustees to support him should cease, and he should be at the same time entitled to payment of the provision in his favour thereinafter mentioned. It may be noted for what it is worth, that the testator, at some subsequent period, wrote and initialled on the margin opposite this fourth purpose the following words: "I also direct my trustees to make similar and equal provision for my son Frederick, being of weak mind and requiring to be protected in his justrights." The fifth purpose contained, inter alia, the following provisions: "The residue of my said personal or moveable estate shall (under the declarations, reservations, and exceptions aftermentioned) be divided among all my sons and daughters equally between and among them, share and share alike; declaring that their proportions thereof shall be payable to them, if daughters, on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first; and if sons, on their attaining majority; . . . but declaring that the said provisions . . . . shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof; but on the death of any one of them before such term of payment, the provision to any of them so dying leaving lawful issue shall be divided equally among his or her issue alive at the period of my death, and failing such issue shall belong to my surviving children or their issue, equally among them per stirpes; but declaring that the share of my son Lewis shall not be payable unless in the event of his recovering his reason, the provision herein before made for him being all that is necessary on his account during his illness." By the sixth purpose the trustees were directed, upon the death of the testator's widow, to sell the whole of the heritable estate, and to "divide the price among and between my whole surviving children equally among them, share and share alike, in like manner and subject to the exceptions and exclusions, regulations and provisions above prescribed for the division among them of the residue of my personal estate, including the conditional exclusion of my son Lewis. . . ." The testator's second codicil "explains," inter alia, "that as regards my son Frederick, the provisions for him I direct my trustees to make the same as the provisions made by me for my son Lewis in all respects, and I recal my settlement as to Frederick quoad ultra."

It is stated that the trustees set aside a share of the truster's moveable estate and of the proceeds of the sale of the heritage for behoof of Frederick Smith, and applied the income thereof and part of the capital towards his maintenance until his death.

In these circumstances, competing claims are made to the fund in medio. It is claimed, in the first place, by the executor-dative of Frederick Smith. This claimant maintains that the fee of one-tenth share of the truster's moveable estate vested in Frederick a morte testatoris, and that the fee of one-ninth share of the proceeds of the heritable estate vested in him upon his mother's death in 1884, his sister Elizabeth having predeceased Mrs Smith unmarried and intestate. The theory of the claim, as presented by Mr Lippe, was that Frederick had attained majority prior to his father's death, that the "period of payment" of the shares of moveable estate was, in the case of sons, majority; that Frederick's share therefore became a vested interest in him at the said "period of payment"; and that similarly, as regards the proceeds of the heritable estate, Frederick's share vested in him by his survival of the date of his mother's death. I think these arguments are unsound. It is true that, in the normal case, each son's share vested in him on his survival of the appointed period of payment, viz. the death of his father as to the moveable estate (he being then major), and that of his mother as to the heritable estate. But a special code was expressly provided for the case of Lewis, and made applicable by the codicil to Frederick, by which the share was not to become payable unless in the event of his recovering his reason. I think, therefore, that no right vested in Frederick, because he died before the period of payment, and therefore of vesting, applicable to his case, had arrived.

If this view is correct, a question next arises as to the period at which the beneficiaries entitled to Frederick's share fall to be ascertained. Mr Chree, on behalf of one set of claimants, argued that Frederick's share of moveables vested a morte testatoris, and his share of the proceeds of the heritable estate vested, on his mother's death, in his brothers and sisters who were surviving at those dates respectively, subject only to possible defeasance, in the event of Frederick recovering his reason. Mr Kemp, for a different set of claimants, maintained that vesting in Frederick's share did not take place until his death, when his shares, both of the moveable and the heritable estate of his father, vested in his brothers and sisters surviving at that date, viz. 27th December 1906, and the children of predeceasers, per stirpes. I am of opinion that the latter contention is well founded, and that the former is erroneous. The difference between them in practical result is not great. It is only, as I understand, that in the one view the representatives of Miss Elizabeth Smith would, and in the other view would not, be participants in Frederick's share of the moveable estate. But I consider that Mr Kemp's argument is to be preferred, because I think the words "my surviving children" ought, according to ordinary canons of construction, to be read as referring to the event, viz. the death of a son before the term of payment of his share, upon the occurrence of which the division of his share amongst other persons was to take place.

In reaching this conclusion I have not left out of view that in the case (which has not occurred) of a son dying before the term of payment, leaving issue, his provision is directed to be divided equally among his issue "alive at the period of my death." It seems to me that this direction might have created considerable difficulty, supposing, for example, that a son of the truster had married after his father's death, and died in minority, leaving issue. By the strict terms of the settlement, that issue would apparently have been excluded from any share of the residue; while, on the other hand, the share could not, I apprehend, have been claimed by the surviving children of the testator, who are only called in default of issue. But I think that speculation as to events which might have occurred, but have not in fact happened, ought not to affect my construction of that part of the clause which has, as events have turned out, come into operation. . . .—15*th November* 1907.

This was a multiplepoinding brought by the executors of Miss Charlotte Anderson with reference to the distribution of her estate.

In regard to the two questions decided by the Lord Ordinary, the facts bearing on the first question are given in the Opinion.

With reference to the second question, the claimant, Robert David Duncan Matthew, made the following averments in support of his claim:—

"In or about May 1905, and prior to the execution of her settlement and codicils, Miss Anderson expressed her intention of making a gift to the claimant of her property, Bishop's Croft or Yard, Abernethy, and, on or about 12th June 1905, she instructed Mr G. L. Anderson, solicitor, Newburgh, to prepare a formal conveyance of said property in favour of the claimant. Said property had passed to Miss Anderson upon the death of her brother, Mr Thomas Stuart Anderson, in April 1905. Messrs Pinkerton & Sneddon, solicitors, Newburgh and Perth, were the law agents employed to wind up Mr Stuart Anderson's affairs, and they had possession of the titles of said property, and did not deliver them to Mr G. L.

Allison and Others v. Anderson and Others.

Anderson until only a day or two before Miss Anderson's death. The entry which Mr G. L. Anderson made in his instruction book at the time, under date 12th June 1905, is in these terms:—'Robert David Duncan Matthew, residing at Walnut Grove, Kinfauns, near Perth. Disposition by Miss Anderson to R. D. Matthew and his heirs and assignees of property, Abernethy, and also superiority of property there, the vassal in which is Alex. Beatson. Feu-duty £4 0s. 4d. yearly, i.e. of Alex. Beatson's feu.' Miss Anderson also informed Mr Sneddon, of Pinkerton & Sneddon, that she intended to give said property to the claimant. Miss Anderson was aware of the delay that was likely to be caused in preparing said formal conveyance, and accordingly, with the intention of preserving evidence of her wishes, she wrote on 10th May 1905 a letter to the claimant's mother, containing inter alia the following statement:—'My reason for writing you to-day is to tell you that I am going to give Aunt Nancy's Abernethy property to Bobby. The income from it will be a little help to him, now that he is not so able to work as formerly. . . . As lawyers are very dilatory, it will be some time before the titles can be made out in Bobby's name (I have to be infeft first), I think it well to let you know what my intentions are.' By said letter Miss Anderson intended to make, and did make, a de presenti gift of the said property to the claimant."

He also averred that about the same date Miss Anderson wrote to her heir-at-law informing him of what she had done, and that she thereafter treated the property as belonging to the claimant; that she paid over the rents of the property collected at Martinmas 1905 to the claimant, and that it was believed she verbally informed the tenants of the property that she was no longer proprietrix, and that, on 13th December 1905, she wrote to one of the tenants, "Bishop's Croft is no longer my property." Further, he averred that—

"Early in February 1906 the claimant's sister, Miss Agnes Matthew, at the request of the claimant, wrote to Miss Anderson, inquiring if his property were insured, and on 11th February 1906 Miss Anderson wrote in reply, 'Tell Bobby that his house is insured, and the banker here will send the policy. The next payment will be in May.' Miss Anderson had paid the premium in May 1905, and the next premium was payable in May 1906. Miss Anderson thereupon instructed her banker, W. Morison, who was also agent for the insurance company, to change the policy to the claimant's name by the next time of payment, and on 26th June 1906 it was so changed to his name. The claimant paid the premium due in May 1906."

There was no reference to Bishops Yard property in Miss Anderson's settlement or codicils.

The Lord Ordinary sustained the claim for the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland, and repelled the claim for Robert David Duncan Matthew.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is a multiplepoinding for the distribution of the estate of the late Miss Charlotte Anderson, daughter of the late Thomas Anderson, banker, Newburgh, Fife, who died on 28th February 1906. She left a holograph settlement and codicils, which are said in the summons to be all dated 27th May 1905. I doubt if this date is correct as regards the last codicil, or as regards the alteration on the original holograph settlement; but the date does not seem to be of importance as regards the questions to be decided.

Two questions have arisen for decision:—

1. The testatrix left a legacy in the following terms:—"To the India Mission of the Church of Scotland, Bombay Branch, the sum of one thousand pounds (£1000)." Then follow a number of legacies to institutions which are named. The Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland claim this legacy. They aver that they "up till about the year 1892 had a branch mission which carried on mission work in the city of Bombay, but the institution in connection with the mission there was sold and the proceeds invested, and the investment is now known as the 'Bombay Endowment Fund,' the income of which has for the last two or three years and is presently being applied for the purpose of the mission work at Poona, which is in the Bombay Presidency, and is under these claimants' control."

Miss Anderson's executors maintain that this legacy has lapsed. They aver "As regards the legacy of £1000, bequeathed in the first codicil to the India Mission of the Church of Scotland, Bombay Branch, it is believed and averred that the Church of Scotland had not, at the date of death of the testatrix, and has not now, a mission in Bombay, though there was some years ago a mission in connection with the said Church in Bombay, which has been abandoned. This legacy has accordingly lapsed, and the said £1000 falls to be treated as part of the ultimate residue of the said estate."

I am of opinion that the argument for the executors fails. The leading words of the bequest are that it is to the India Mission of the Church of Scotland. The words Bombay Branch merely indicates work carried on in a particular district of that Mission. I think on a fair construction of the bequest Bombay does not mean the city, but the Presidency of Bombay. The reference in the codicil by the testatrix to her brother who died and was buried at places within the Presidency explains the motive of the bequest. The testatrix seems to have purposely left the terms of the bequest wide. But even if the bequest meant a branch of the India Mission of the Church of Scotland in the city of Bombay, it is not said that the work is to be carried on in that city. The executors found on the fact that there was a certain mission in the city of Bombay which has ceased to exist, but they do not aver, and cannot suggest, that it was a mission which was exactly described by the words of the bequest. Nor do they say that the mission carried on at Poona, which is within the Bombay Presidency, and about one hundred miles from the city of Bombay, is of a character which does not satisfy the terms of the bequest. The executors do not aver that the testatrix meant the old mission in the city of Bombay. They do not aver that the testatrix was ignorant of the fact that the institution in that city had ceased fourteen years before her death. I am accordingly of opinion that the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the legacy of £1000 in question, with interest at the average rate of the interest obtained by the executors on the trust investments from 28th February 1906 until payment.

2. Robert David Duncan Matthew, who states he is a first cousin once removed of the testatrix, claims that he is entitled to a property called Bishop's Croft or Yard, Abernethy, in virtue of a gift made to him by the testatrix during her lifetime; or alternatively, that certain letters which are founded upon are to be construed along with the other testamentary writings of the deceased as operating a valid bequest of the property in his favour. The contrary claim is for the residuary legatees. Now, in order to make an effectual inter vivos gift there must be a transference of the money or property to the person whom the donor wishes to benefit. An expression of intention is quite insufficient to complete the gift (Thomson, etc. v. Dunlop, 1884, 11 R. 453; Lord Young, at p. 458). The averments for the claimant appear to me to contain nothing more than an expression of intention on the part of the deceased, and to be insufficient, even if proved, to instruct a gift. Nor do they, as was suggested, contain a promise upon which there has been rei interventus. The claimant states that he has paid a premium of insurance on the property, but this was in May 1906, after the death of the testatrix. I think it is impossible to regard the letters founded on as in any way testamentary writings. The bequest of residue in the testamentary writings is free from ambiguity. There is no express mention in the settlement or codicils of the Bishop's Croft, but the claimant cannot found upon these letters as shewing what the testatrix meant. I am accordingly of opinion that Matthew's claim should be repelled.—16*th November* 1907.

Slander — Relevancy — Statements in Letter by Master in Reply to Law Agent of Dismissed Servant Demanding Arrears of Wages—Privilege—Malice—No Sufficient Averments of Malice—Action Dismissed—Question Whether Averments of Malice Apart From Incidents of Dismissal Necessary.

This was an action by a dismissed cook against her former employer, a hotel-keeper carrying on the Grand Hotel, Lerwick, concluding for reparation for slander.

The pursuer's material averments were as follows:—

The pursuer was in the employment of the defender from 12th February until 15th May 1907. With reference to the statements in answer, it is admitted that the pursuer was in the defender's service as kitchen-maid from January until May 1906. In May 1906 she left of her own accord, as she was not prepared to serve any longer as kitchen-maid. Thereupon the defender repeatedly requested her to come back on trial for a fortnight as cook. She accordingly returned, and as the defender expressed himself highly satisfied and offered to engage her as cook, she remained as cook until the end of September 1906. [It appeared from the defender's uncontradicted averments that the pursuer left defender's service in September 1906, and returned thereto in February 1907.]

On Wednesday, 15th May 1907, about 5.15 in the afternoon, the pursuer went into the kitchen of the hotel to prepare dinner, which had been ordered for 7 p.m. She found Mrs Hatje, the defender's wife, standing in the kitchen. On the pursuer's entering, Mrs Hatje turned to her and said, "You are drunk." The pursuer denied the accusation, but Mrs Hatje declined to withdraw it, and asserted that the pursuer had got drunk upon liquor supplied to her by the barmaid. The explanations in answer, so far as not coinciding herewith, are denied. In particular, it is denied that the pursuer was under the influence of drink, or that there was any occasion for or that she had any duty of being in the kitchen at four o'clock. There was no fixed time for the pursuer being in the kitchen, and when convenient she was accustomed to rest in her bedroom, which she was doing upon the afternoon of May 15th, prior to 5 p.m.

The said statements were wholly false and without any foundation, and were made by Mrs Hatje solely for the purpose of insulting the pursuer and wounding her feelings. The pursuer, as Mrs Hatje knew, was perfectly sober.

The said false accusation was highly insulting to the pursuer, and damaging to her character as a cook. It constituted a grave charge against her as a servant, which she could not afford to pass by. It was impossible for the pursuer to remain in the service of the defender and his wife, and she was entitled and bound to give up her place. She informed Mrs Hatje that she would leave the hotel, and asked her for the arrears of wages then due to her, but Mrs Hatje replied, "You will not get a farthing." The pursuer left the Grand Hotel on the evening of May 15th.

As a consequence of the pursuer's resenting Mrs Hatje's accusation against her, and leaving the service of the defender, the defender and his wife were incensed at her, and they further determined not to pay her the wages due to her. The defender at the said date, viz., 15th May 1907, was owing the pursuer wages for the period from 12th March to 15th May, amounting to the sum of £3, 16s. Upon 17th May the pursuer, through her solicitor, Mr Alexander Sutherland, S.S.C., Lerwick, wrote to the defender requesting payment of the said sum. Upon the same day the defender wrote a letter to Mr Sutherland in the following terms :—

"A. Sutherland, Esq.

"The Grand Hotel,
"Lerwick, 17th May 1907.

"Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter regarding claim of wages by Christina Hanton, kindly inform her that she will not get one penny ; she has been drunk, which can be testified by all the rest of the servants, and left without giving any warning, and particularly behaving herself in such a manner during my absence from home ; I think she ought to be well punished. Furthermore, I have a letter in my possession from her at the time of engagement, that in the event of her getting drunk she would forfeit all her wages.

"She may take any proceedings against me if she likes.—I am, yours truly, William Hatje."

The said letter is produced and referred to. The statements in answer, so far as not coinciding herewith, are denied. In particular, it is denied that the defender guaranteed to Reid, Tait & Company, drapers, Lerwick, an account for clothing supplied to the pursuer. The defender is called upon to state when he paid the account for £2, 16s., and to produce receipt therefor.

The statements in the said letter to the effect that the pursuer was drunk are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious. They represent that the pursuer had been drunk while in his service and unable to perform her duties as cook. The defender made the said statements in the knowledge that they were false, and solely for the purpose of injuring the pursuer, and to escape, if possible, from paying his just debt. By the said letter the defender approved of and adopted the false and calumnious accusation made by his wife. The statements in the said letter were made maliciously and without probable or any cause. The object of the defender in making them was to vent his ill-will at the pursuer for leaving his service, and, particularly, to try to escape paying the arrears of wages justly due by him, and to defraud the pursuer of the said sum of £3, 16s. The statements in the said letter to the effect that the defender had a letter of the pursuer's in his possession agreeing that she should forfeit wages in the event of her getting drunk, and that he had a right to retain her wages under such letter, are false, and were made with the intention of browbeating the pursuer and intimidating her into abandoning her claim for wages. He still persists maliciously and illegally in retaining the pursuer's wages, on the pretext that she was drunk upon 15th May.

On the adjustment of issues the defender argued that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, it being necessary to aver malice, and malice not being relevantly averred.

The following cases were cited :—Milne v. Smiths, 1892, 20 R. 95 ; Mackay v. M'Cankie, 1883, 10 R. 537 ; M'Donald v. Rupprecht, 1894, 21 R. 389 ; Campbell v. Cochrane 1905, 8 F. 205 ; M'Ewan v. Watson, 1905, 7 F. (H.L.) 109 ; and Sheriff v. Denholm, 1897, 5 S.L.T., p. 234.

The Lord Ordinary held that malice was not relevantly averred, and dismissed the action.

Lord Guthrie.—The letter of 17th May 1907 from the defender to the pursuer which is complained of was written in reply to a letter of the same date from the pursuer's solicitor to the defender. The letter from the pursuer's solicitor has now been produced, and in view of its terms, the pursuer admits that, if she gets an issue, it must contain the word "maliciously."

The action raising a clear case of privilege on the pursuer's averments, the question remains whether the pursuer has made averments of malice to go to a jury. No malice extraneous to the incidents connected with the pursuer's dismissal are alleged. It is admitted that it would not have been enough for the pursuer to allege that the defender acted maliciously, or even that his statements were known by him to have been false. Some motive for so acting, it is conceded, must be set out. The motives here alleged for falsely charging the pursuer with having been drunk are said to have been two : first, the defender's anger at the pursuer leaving his service ; and second, to try to escape payment of £3, 16s., the arrears of wages due by him to her. That is to say, that, subsequent to the dismissal, the defender invented a charge which he knew to be false, and did so for these two pertinent reasons. It appears to me that the case so made fails on the pursuer's own averments. The charge of drunkenness was no afterthought, originated by the pursuer giving up her place. According to Condescendence II., the defender's wife made the accusation before the pursuer had even proposed to leave the service. As to the defender himself, in the letter from Mr Sutherland, the pursuer's agent, which is made part of the record by the reference to it in Condescendence V., it is clearly stated that it was in consequence of an antecedent accusation of drunkenness that the pursuer left the defender's service. If so, the pursuer's case on malice is self-contradictory and cannot be remitted to probation. In those circumstances I do not find it necessary to consider the argument which was submitted to me, based on Lord M'Laren's opinion in the case of Campbell v. Cochrane, 1905, 8 F. 205, 214, that "in order to make a relevant case of malice there must be facts alleged which are independent of the cause of dismissal, independent of the immediate cause of circulating the slander, from which the jury might legitimately infer some antecedent ill-will or indirect motive as the origin or cause of the slander." I hesitate to say that a case could not be figured in which relevant averments might not be made of malice originating out of the dismissal itself.

The pursuer made a separate point on the phrase in the defender's letter:—"I think she ought to be well punished." It was argued that this language was at least reasonably capable of being construed by a jury as inferring malice, the defender having no legitimate interest to bring punishment on the pursuer. Taken in connection with the rest of the sentence, of which the clause forms a part, I do not think the words in question mean anything more than that, if the pursuer gets no money, it will serve her right for her conduct in being drunk and leaving without warning.—19*th November* 1907.

II. Diligence — Arrestment — Subject Arrestable—Arrestment in Hands of B of Debt Due by B to A after B has Handed Cheque to A in Payment of Debt but Before Cheque Cashed—Arrestment Held Inept.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

This was an action of furthcoming at the instance of Leggat Brothers, printers, Glasgow, against Moss' Empires Ltd. as arrestees, and George Gray, an actor and playwright residing in London, as principal debtor.

In 1905 Gray guaranteed to the pursuers the payment of a printing account of the Events Publishing and Advertising Company, which was due to the pursuers by Mussett, the Glasgow manager of Moss' Empires Ltd. Mussett failed to pay his debt, and the pursuers proceeded to sue Gray upon the guarantee. Gray was a domiciled Englishman, and in order to found jurisdiction against him Messrs Leggat on 14th June 1906 used arrestments in the hands of Moss' Empires Ltd. Decree in absence was obtained against Gray in that action for the payment of a sum of £125, and certain arrestments were used on that decree. It was to make the latter arrestments effectual that the present action was raised. The defence of George Gray to this action was that the arrestments of 14th June were ineffectual to constitute jurisdiction against him, and the decree and arrestments forming the subject of the present action were therefore inept. It was common ground between the parties that during the week ending 16th June 1906 the defender, Gray, was fulfilling an engagement with Moss' Empires Ltd. in Glasgow, for which Moss' owed the defender a salary, and that in the course of that week a cheque was sent from Moss' head office in London to their Glasgow manager to be handed to the defender, Gray, in payment of the said salary. The arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used in Moss' hands at 4.20 p.m. on Thursday, 14th June. The parties differed as to the precise point of time at which the cheque arrived and was handed over to the defender. The defender upon the point averred that in the course of that week—

1st Div.

Leggat Brothers v. Moss' Empires Ltd. and Another.

He applied to the chief accountant of the Company in London for payment of his salary in advance. In response to this request the chief accountant by letter, dated 13th June 1906, forwarded to the manager of the Company in Glasgow a cheque directly in favour of this defender for the amount of his salary. This defender received the cheque from the Glasgow manager on the morning of Thursday, 14th June 1906, and duly granted receipts therefor. On the same day, before 2.30 p.m., he endorsed the cheque and handed it for onerous consideration to a creditor, who subsequently cashed it. The arrestment used by the pursuers was not laid on till later in the afternoon of the 14th June 1906. By that time this defender had been paid the whole sum due to him as above set forth; there were no funds belonging to him in the hands of the arrestees and the arrestment attached nothing. The Court had accordingly no jurisdiction over this defender, and the decree subsequently obtained by the pursuers was wrongous and inept.

The pursuers' averments were as follows:—

Explained that the cheque referred to was forwarded to the Glasgow Manager of Moss' Empires Ltd. from their London office on 14th June 1906, and reached Glasgow on 15th June 1906, by which time the arrestment had been effectually laid on in the hands of Moss' Empires Ltd. The defender on 15th June 1906 got possession of the cheque without the consent of the said Glasgow manager, and at once cashed it before the said Glasgow manager had time to stop payment thereof. The arrestment thus effectually attached the defender's salary, and in respect thereof the Court had jurisdiction to pronounce the said decree in absence against him.

The Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) allowed parties a proof of their averments, and on the evidence led assoilzied the defenders. The Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeded on the ground that the facts as established by the proof substantiated the case made on record by the defender, and that accordingly the arrestments used upon the afternoon of 14th June 1906 did not attach any funds due or belonging to the defender. The point of law

1ST DIV.

Leggat Brothers v. Moss' Empires Ltd. and Another.

argued to the Inner House was not argued before the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued:—

The arrestments used had been sufficient to found jurisdiction against Gray, even though the Lord Ordinary were right in holding that the cheque had been handed to Gray on the 14th, because, admittedly, it had not been cashed until the 15th, after the arrestments had been put on. The mere giving of a cheque does not operate as payment to extinguish the debt of the granter (Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 74). The debt remains until the cheque is cashed (Cohen v. Hale, 1878, L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 371). Even granting that it operated conditional payment, there remained a conditional indebtedness, which was a suitable subject for arrestment to found jurisdiction, until the cheque was paid. The English cases cited by the respondent proceeded upon this assumption. In order to found jurisdiction it was not necessary that the arrestments should be effectual to lay a nexus upon the subjects arrested (North v. Stewart, 1890, 17 R. (H.L.) 60).

Argued for the Respondents: In ordinary circumstances the granting of a cheque operates conditional payment. If the cheque is met upon presentment it operates retro in extinguishment of the debt (Chitty on Contracts, 14th ed. 628; Byles on Bills, 16th ed., 24–29; Pearce v. Davies, 1834, 1 Moore & Rob., 365; Carmarthen Railway Co. v. Manchester Railway Co., 1873, L.R. 8 C.P. 685; In re Palmer, 1881, L.R. 19 Ch. D. 409). The granter is not bound, on diligence being used in his hands, to stop payment of the cheque. Payment by cheque is, in fact, payment subject to a resolutive condition that should the cheque be dishonoured the debt will revive. This was the ratio of the decision in a series of cases, including that of Cohen, relied on by the reclaimers. These decisions establish the proposition that a garnishee order will be effectual if served upon a debtor who stops payment of a cheque, but not if served upon one who does not do so (Cohen (cit.); Elwell, 1884, 1 C. and E. 362; Belshaw v. Bush, 1851, 11 Scott's C.B. Rep. 191; Currie v. Misa, 1875, L.R. 10 Ex. 153; Hall v. Pritchett, 1887, L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 215; Stott v. Fairlamb, 1883, 53 L.J. Q.B. 47). In ordinary cases of mercantile dealing a debt may be extinguished by means of payment other than in strictly legal tender. Payment by cheque or bank draft is held to be cash payment in questions as to illegal preferences in bankruptcy (Carter v. Johnstone, 1886, 13 R. 698; Bell's Com., II. 202; Bell's Pr. 2327), and in a question as to payment for shares in a company before allotment (Glasgow Pavilion Ltd. v. Motherwell, 1903, 6 F. 116). Even assuming that the granter could stop payment whilst the cheque was still in the hands of the payee, he could not effectively do so where, as in the present case, the cheque had been endorsed to a third party for value. That negotiation constituted a new creditor, who alone could sue on the cheque (Clydesdale Bank v. M'Lean, 1883, 10 R. 719, 11 R. (H.L.) 1). Arrestments to found jurisdiction although, unlike other forms of diligence, laying no nexus on the subjects arrested, still must have for their subject what was capable of being made effective. In this case nothing had been arrested that could be made effective, as the debt had been extinguished before the arrestments were laid on.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—My Lords, Mr Gray, who is the defender in this action of furthcoming, granted a guarantee in favour of Messrs Leggat Brothers, the pursuers, for a debt due to them by one Mussett. Musset had not paid his debt, and Messrs Leggat were anxious to raise an action against Gray upon the guarantee, Gray having refused to pay without legal process. Gray was an Englishman and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts, and accordingly Messrs Leggat sought to subject him to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of Moss' Empires Ltd., a Scottish registered company, who owed Gray money from time to time, in respect that Gray was a person who took engagements with Moss' Theatre of Varieties. With that purpose Messrs Leggat used arrestments in the hands of Moss' Empires Ltd. at 4.20 p.m. upon Thursday, June 14. The arrestment was immediately followed by service of the action, and in that action Messrs Leggat eventually obtained a decree in absence. They subsequently, on the dependence of the action, arrested other sums of money, and the present action is one of furthcoming as regards the sums of money so arrested. The defence to the action is that there was no jurisdiction in the action in which decree was got, and the defence of no jurisdiction admittedly depends on whether the arrestments ad fundandam were good or not. There is a great deal of controversy as to the precise state of the facts, but in order to see the questions that arise, I may take first what is common ground between the parties. There is no doubt that during the week which began on Monday the 11th and ended on Saturday the 16th of June, Gray was fulfilling an engagement for which Moss' Empires would owe him a salary, and in ordinary course the salary would have been paid at the end of the week. There is no doubt also that Gray, having had a hint that it was possible that he might be proceeded against under this guarantee, had telegraphed to Moss' head office in London requesting that his salary might be paid before the usual day; and there is no doubt that, acceding to that request, Moss' Empire office in London sent, during the course of the week, a cheque made out directly to Gray, which they addressed to the Glasgow manager, Mussett, with directions to him to hand it over to Gray.

Now the controversy on the facts is when that cheque arrived and was handed over. Gray says that it arrived on the morning of Thursday the 14th, and that it was then handed over by him to a certain friend of his, Cosens, for value, the value consisting partly in a sum which he had already received from Cosens and partly in an undertaking on Cosens' part to give him the balance of the cheque. Leggat Brothers, the pursuers, on the other hand, contend that the cheque was not received until the morning of Friday the 15th, and was then handed to Gray. It is common ground between the parties that the cheque, as a matter of fact, was cashed in the early morning of Friday the 15th, although there is again a discrepancy of statement, the pursuers saying that it was cashed by Gray himself, and the defenders saying that it was cashed by Cosens. As I have already said, the arrestments were laid on at 4.20 on Thursday afternoon, and the question arises whether at that time there was anything to arrest.

My Lords, we had a very satisfactory and good argument from the Bar in this case, and a point has been raised in the Inner House, which does not seem to have been argued before the Lord Ordinary, and which logically comes first, because if the decision on it were to go in a certain way it would make enquiry as to the disputed facts unnecessary. The pursuers, who, of course, are contending for the validity of the arrestments, say that even supposing the defender's story were correct, i.e. that the cheque arrived on Thursday morning and was endorsed or handed to someone else even for value on that Thursday, yet inasmuch as it was admittedly not cashed until Friday, therefore at a quarter past four on Thursday afternoon there was still a debt owing by Moss to Gray. In other words, they say that the effect of handing the cheque by the debtor to the creditor is not to operate payment, but that the relation of debtor and creditor still exists until the cheque is cashed and the creditor, either directly or through someone else, gets possession of the money.

In order to investigate that question I think it is first of all necessary to clear one's mind upon the true nature of an arrestment. There is a great deal of authority, and there has, at one time or another, been a good deal of controversy upon the precise nature of an arrestment ad fundandam. I am not going through all these authorities to trace the development of the doctrine, but I think I am correctly summarising them when I say this. All admit that the proceeding is exceedingly anomalous. Nobody exactly knows what was its historical origin, but I think that while there has been perhaps a vacillation of opinion as to whether an arrestment ad fundandam does or does not create a nexus upon the property arrested, the opinion has come to be quite settled that although no nexus is created—at least after jurisdiction is founded and the action has commenced—yet the origin of the whole proceeding can be traced to the idea that when the arrestment was laid on there was some property to be taken in execution.

My Lords, I think the authority which most directly supports what I am now saying is the case of Trowsdale's Tr. v. The Forcett Railway Company, 1870, 9 M. 88. The question there was as to the class of subject that was arrestable. The Lord Justice-Clerk there says: "It is perfectly true that in point of fact an arrestment ad fundandam does not fix the subject arrested within the jurisdiction, for the arrestee may safely part with it, and it so far differs from an arrestment in execution; but it does not follow, and is not, in my opinion, the law, that there is any difference between the two kinds of arrestment in regard to the subjects arrestable. I know no better statement of the law than is to be found in the opinion of Lord Corehouse (concurred in by a number of other judges) in the case of Cameron v. Chapman, 1838, 16 S. 907, at p. 918. 'If,' says Lord Corehouse, 'an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was, as the defenders assume, a process by which a moveable subject is fixed down in this country, and rendered, in so far as jurisdiction is concerned, the same in all respects as a heritable subject, there might be some plausibility in their argument. But assuredly that is not the case. . . . It is not necessary to enquire on what principle the custom is founded of arresting moveables to found the jurisdiction against their owner being a foreigner. It is plainly in opposition to the general doctrine, both of the Roman law and modern jurisprudence, both of which admit the maxim actor sequitur forum rei. It was borrowed in Scotland from the law of Holland, where, as Voet observes, it had been introduced, contrary to principle, from views of expediency, and for the encouragement of commerce. We are of opinion, therefore, that it must not be carried further in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent.'" In the same case of Trowsdale's Tr., Lord Neaves, after also observing that the arrestment is an exception to the rule that a creditor must go to the forum of his debtor, and that it had been introduced gradually, says: "The principle rests on the fact that there is something within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be specially taken in execution of any decree which may be pronounced." And accordingly the Court held in that case that there could not be an arrestment ad fundandam founded on the arrestment of books and papers, because these were not articles which could be taken by diligence.

My Lords, I do not find that there is any subsequent authority which in any way infringes the authority of Trowsdale, and in particular I do not find anything inconsistent with that in a judgment which is, of course, of paramount weight and authority—the judgment of the House of Lords in North v. Stewart, 1890, 17 R. H.L. 60. Lord Watson there also refers to the earlier history of arrestments, and says: "The sole purpose and effect of an attachment"—that is, the modern form of arrestment ad fundandam—"is to fix the locality of the subjects arrested in Scotland, and thereby to render their foreign owner liable to be convened in a process issuing from the Court of Session at the instance of the arrester for recovery of a personal debt. As soon as the foreign owner has been duly made a party to that process, the arrestment is spent, and the arrestee is no longer, as in a question with the arrester, under any obligation to retain in his hands the moveables which it affected." But that is entirely consistent. In other words, the doctrine, which after a certain amount of doubt, especially, I think, as shewn in the case of Malone & M'Gibbon v. The Caledonian Railway Company, 1884, 11 R. 853, may now be held to be firmly established by the case of North,—the doctrine, namely, that an arrestment ad fundandam does not create a nexus as against the arrestee which prevents him from parting with the subject—that doctrine is perfectly consistent with the other doctrine, that the origin of the process was the idea that there should be property which could be taken in execution; and consequently when you are considering whether a subject is arrestable to found jurisdiction, as was being considered in the case of Trowsdale's Tr., the true criterion is whether the subject is something which, if it were arrested in execution and the diligence were worked out, could be made available by the creditor in the debt.

1st Div.

The Lord President.

Now, my Lords, I find the same idea developed in the dictum of Lord Kinnear in the case of Lucas' Trs., 21 R. 1096. His Lordship there says: "An arrestment and furthcoming is an adjudication preceded by an attachment, and the essential part of the diligence is the adjudication. It follows that an arrestment is futile unless it can be followed up and the diligence worked out by a decree effectually transferring from the common debtor to the arresting creditor the obligation which was originally prestable to the former by the arrestee. The proceedings for this purpose may vary according to the nature of the debt." Now, no doubt, in that case his Lordship is speaking of furthcomings upon arrestments which had been used in dependence. But if, as I have submitted to your Lordships, the origin of the arrestment ad fundandam rested upon the same principle, then the test, which is a good test for an arrestment in execution, is an equally good test for an arrestment ad fundandam. That being so, and assuming the facts to be as stated by the defender, I come to the question whether there was anything in this case which could have been made available to a creditor by the arrestee. That is to say, Moss' Empires having, by the time when the arrestment was laid on, sent a cheque in payment of their debt which had been received by Gray, was there anything resting owing by Moss' to Gray which could have been made available in execution? I am bound to say I think clearly not. I think that really the question here resolves itself into one of ordinary mercantile dealing. In one sense, there can be no payment except in legal tender duly received: but in another sense there can be payment, and there is payment every day, which is made otherwise than by legal tender. The most familiar instance is payment by bank notes—by any bank notes in Scotland, and by bank notes other than Bank of England notes in England. That is an ordinary and common form of payment. Well, in modern times I think it is an equally common form of payment to pay by a cheque upon the debtor's own bank account. A cheque, after all, is merely an order on a third person to pay, and it is very analogous to an order on a third person to hand over hard cash. It is perfectly true and quite obvious that when a creditor takes a cheque he takes it on the hypothesis that the cheque is going to be honoured; but if when he goes to the bank the cheque is not honoured, either by the bank refusing to pay, or by the bank being unable to pay, as would be the case if it had stopped payment in the interval, then there is no question that he would still have an action against his original debtor. But I do not think that that very obvious consideration creates any difficulty, or alters the state of affairs when a cheque is ordinarily taken in payment. I do not know that it is necessary to refer the matter to any particular legal category; but if it is, I should rather suppose that the honouring of the cheque was a condition resolutive, and that if payment of the cheque failed to be made, the effect would be that no payment had been made, and the original debt would be set up again. But I am really not concerned as to whether that, which is after all a mere theory, is right or not. The point remains that according to ordinary commercial practice, payment by cheque is recognised, and it seems to me that payment is complete the moment that the creditor has accepted the cheque as in payment, subject always to the condition that the cheque will be met when presented.

My Lords, I have put the matter upon what I think are the ordinary rules of mercantile dealing, but such authority as there is points in the same direction. I refer particularly to two cases which were quoted to us at the Bar. The first case was that of Carter v. Johnstone, 1886, 13 R. 698, where a distinction is made most markedly between the handing over of a person's own cheque and the endorsing of other people's cheques in which he was the payee, and it was held that one was struck at by the Bankruptcy Act, while the other was saved as a cash payment. Lord Shand, after speaking of actual cash payments, says: "It is quite true that certain equivalents to cash payments have been recognised, and in practice at least have been understood to be effectual and not struck at by the statute. A draft or order produced from a banker and transmitted to a creditor in another town, and a debtor's cheque on his own banker . . . . have all been regarded as equivalents for cash payments, or different forms of making cash payments." And Lord Adam in the same case says: "It is said that these endorsements were granted in the ordinary course of trade, and that a bank cheque on a man's own bank being equivalent to cash, the rule should be extended to such a case as the present. The two cases, however, are very different; in the first place, in actual business a draft on a man's own banker is universally held to be equivalent to a cash payment." The second case was that of The Glasgow Pavilion Ltd., 1903, 6 F. 116, where Lord Young says: "Now, that payment by a cheque which is accepted and duly honoured is a payment in cash, as the expression is used in our law, is, I think, a question not capable of being easily disputed. No creditor is bound to receive payment of a debt due to him by cheque or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm. A creditor may even refuse to accept Scottish bank notes, and insist on his debtor bringing him current coin of the realm to the amount of his debt. Nevertheless, if he choose to accept these bank notes in payment, I do not think it is capable of being disputed that he would be held, according to our law and practice, to have been paid in cash. In the same way, if he receives, although not bound to do so, a cheque from his debtor, and gives him a receipt for the sum contained in the cheque, that is regarded as a payment in cash if the cheque is duly honoured, and the payment in cash is not at the date of the honouring of the cheque, but at the date of its receipt by the creditor." My Lords, that seems to me precisely to meet the case in point. Although there the Court was dealing with the application of the principle to a different matter—namely, the question whether the directors of a company before proceeding to allotment had received payment of the requisite sum in respect of the shares applied for—yet I do not think that the difference of application makes any difference to the doctrine.

Certain English authorities were quoted to us. One of them seemed at first sight to be adverse to the opinion I have expressed—I refer to the case of Cohen v. Hale, 1878, 3 Q.B.D. 371—but I have come to be satisfied that it is not. That was a case where there was a garnishee order, which is very analogous to an arrestment. The question came to be whether the garnishee order had attached anything. In that case the garnishees had granted a cheque in payment of the debt, but the cheque was stopped before it was presented. The whole point of the judgment is that when a cheque is stopped it is as if it had never existed, and that does not of course touch the question of what is the effect when the cheque is not stopped, but, on the contrary, passes into the hands of the person to whom it is made out and is eventually cashed. I think the matter is made quite clear by the decision in the case of In re Palmer, 1881, 19 Ch. Div. 409, where it was held that there was no duty in a person who had given a cheque to stop it in the interests of any other creditors. As little can there possibly be a duty in the interests of those who wish to do diligence. Accordingly, my Lords, upon this part of the case I am clearly of opinion that assuming the cheque to have been received by Gray on the morning of Thursday the 14th, that paid the debt, subject to the condition that the cheque should be honoured, which it was. Accordingly, at twenty minutes past four on Thursday afternoon there was no debt due by Moss to Gray, and therefore nothing which could have been made available in a furthcoming if there had been an arrestment in execution in Moss's hands. That being the proper criterion to apply in considering whether or not there was a good arrestment ad fundandam, it follows that the arrestment which was laid on was inept.

[After dealing with the facts]:—I therefore come to the conclusion that it would certainly not be wise to disturb the findings in fact of the Lord Ordinary, who after all has seen the witnesses and heard the evidence. If Cosens and Gray are speaking the truth, there can, of course, be no question as to what is the true state of the case. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that we should adhere.

Lord Kinnear.—The question of difficulty in this case is one of fact, and as that depends on a conflict of testimony, in the course of which each side charges the witnesses of the other with perjury, I should be very slow to differ from the Lord Ordinary, who heard the witnesess and has given us his opinion upon their credibility. But looking at the evidence independently, as we are bound to do, as if it were brought before us for the first time, I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship and for the same reasons. I agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship, and do not repeat the considerations upon which I think that conclusion is justified. I therefore take the fact to be that the defender received a cheque from the arrestees in payment of the debt on 14th June, and that the arrestments founding jurisdiction were not used until a later hour of that day. The question therefore is, on that assumption as to fact, Was there anything arrested? And I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that there was nothing. We had a very interesting discussion as to whether the delivery and acceptance of a cheque really extinguished the debt during the interval between its acceptance and the payment of the money by the bank; but I confess to thinking that the interest of the question is rather abstract and logical than practical. As between a debtor and a creditor the delivery of a cheque payable on demand is, according to the intentions of both parties, payment of the debt; and it is in fact as well as in intention payment if there is in truth money in the bank to pay it and it is cashed. It is beyond all question that Moss intended to pay the defender, and the defender intended to take payment by cheque payable on demand, and further, that when the cheque was presented it was duly cashed. As between the debtor and the creditor that seems to make an end of the whole matter. I do not think it is material to consider whether, according to one argument, the payment by cheque is a conditional payment suspended in its full operation until the cheque is cashed, or whether, according to the other view, it merely suspends the creditor's remedies until it is seen whether the cheque will be honoured or not. In either view there may be a contingent liability still in the debtor if it should turn out that the cheque is not cashed. The question is whether that contingent liability is a proper subject for the diligence of arrestment or not. Now it appears to me to be perfectly clear that if the arrestment now in dispute had been an arrestment in execution, it would have been inept. There was no interest of the defender's in the hands of the arrestees except, if it be an exception, a potential claim against them on a contingency which did not happen, and which was dependent upon conditions of fact which it is now certain never existed. He might have had a claim if the cheque had been dishonoured, but it was not; and if that potential claim had been arrested it would have attached nothing, because it would have been perfectly obvious as soon as the arresting creditor proposed to carry his diligence into operation by furthcoming, that there was nothing in the hands of the arrestee at the time, the possible contingency on which there might have been something not having happened.

Lord Kinnear.

I, of course, keep in view what your Lordship has explained—the distinction between arrestments in execution or on the dependence, and arrestments for founding jurisdiction, and we must take it as now settled in law that an arrestment for founding jurisdiction really attaches nothing. But then it does not follow that such an arrestment will be good if, in fact, there is nothing to attach. I think the contrary is the law, because, although there is no actual nexus laid upon moveables or debts that are arrested for founding jurisdiction, still in order to make the arrestment effectual at all, it must bear to attach something which is properly subject to diligence. I cannot find in any of the cases that it has ever been suggested that an arrestment for founding jurisdiction will be good although the subject which it bears to attach was not attachable by arrestment in execution. I think the authority of the case of Trowsdale's Tr., 1870, 9 M. 88, to which your Lordship referred, is conclusive to the contrary. The doctrine is that, whatever be the origin of arrestment for founding jurisdiction, it proceeds upon the hypothesis that there is in fact something within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be specifically taken in execution of any decree which may be pronounced. I think it is a good test of the validity of an arrestment for founding jurisdiction to enquire whether it purports to affect any property or fund which could be taken in execution.

Now, as I have said, it seems to me perfectly clear that if the arrestment now in question had been an arrestment in execution, or if it had been followed up by arrestment on the dependence of the action, nothing would have been attached, and for that reason and others which your Lordship has given, I am of opinion that this arrestment is altogether inept. If there be any novelty in the question as actually raised (and I think there is, because so far as direct authority goes it is a new point whether this was or was not an effectual arrestment ad fundandem), then I think the rule for our decision is furnished by the opinion of the Whole Court in Cameron v. Chapman, 1838, 16 S. 907, in which Lord Corehouse, after pointing out the opposition between the doctrine of a jurisdiction founded on the arrestment of moveables and the general principles of jurisdiction both in our own law and in the Roman law, goes on to say that while an artificial method has been so established, the Court are of opinion that it must not be carried further in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent. Now I think we are asked to carry it further in this case than it has ever been carried in any previous decision, so far as I know or counsel at the Bar were able to inform us. I therefore agree that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Dundas.—I am entirely of the same opinion and upon the same grounds. Your Lordships have dealt with the case so exhaustively, both as regards the law and as regards the facts, which I think present more difficulty than the law, that it would be idle for me to attempt to add further words on my own behalf.—5th November 1907.

I. Process — Decree — Suspension—Held that a Husband Seeking to Suspend a Decree Against Him for Goods Ordered by His Wife Must Find Caution.

II. Diligence — Charge — Suspension — A Charge to Pay Suspended Because of the Omission of the Name of the Payee.

III. Diligence — Charge — Suspension — Objections to a Charge to Deliver Articles and to Pay a Sum Within Seven Days under Pain of Poinding and Imprisonment, that (1) The Period Within Which Delivery Was to be Made Was Not Separately Stated, and (2) It Was Not Stated What Omission would Involve Imprisonment, and What, Poinding—Objections Repelled.

In this action, John Hardie, Green Tree Inn, Kirkcaldy, sought to suspend a decree pronounced on 20th March 1907 in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcaldy by the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross in an action at the instance of the respondents, and a charge following upon said decree.

On 6th December 1904 the complainer's wife, by a letter in her own name, requested the respondents to send her the articles of furniture mentioned in the charge as hereinafter quoted, and thereafter signed an agreement to take these articles on hire from the respondents. The instalments payable for the articles under the agreement fell into arrear, and the respondents raised an action against the complainer and his wife, in which they sought delivery of the said articles and payment of the amount of the arrears (as limited to the price or inventoried capital value of the articles). In this action the respondents obtained decree against both defenders in the terms quoted in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

Following upon this decree the complainer and his wife were charged to implement the decree conform to charge dated 19th April 1907. The charge was in these terms :—

"I, Henry Wright, sheriff officer, by virtue of an extract decree from the Sheriff Court Books of Fife and Kinross, and warrant by the Sheriff of said shires thereon, dated at Kirkcaldy the twentieth and twenty-seventh, both days of March Nineteen hundred and seven years, at the instance of Brown, Barker & Bell, cabinetmakers and upholsterers, 70 Union Street, Glasgow,—Pursuers; against John Hardie, 160 High Street, Kirkcaldy, and Mrs Annie Hardie, 160 High Street aforesaid, wife of and residing with the said John Hardie, and the said John Hardie as her curator and administrator-in-law,—Defenders, in His Majesty's name and authority, and in name and authority of the said Sheriff, hereby lawfully charge you, the said John Hardie and Mrs Annie Hardie, jointly and severally (first) to deliver to the pursuers the following articles of household furniture and others hired by the pursuers to you the defenders on or about the eighth day of December Nineteen hundred and four, viz. one four-foot six-inch cabinet, one bedstead, one spring mattress, one flock mattress, and one hearth rug; and (second) to make payment of Fifteen pounds two shillings and sixpence, with interest thereon from the twenty-fourth day of September Nineteen hundred and six, and Sixteen pounds seventeen shillings and ten pence of expenses, and that to the said within seven days next after the date of this my charge to you, under the pain of poinding and imprisonment so far as competent. This I do upon the Nineteenth day of April Nineteen hundred and seven years, before and in presence of Henry Wright, jun., residing in Kirkcaldy, witness to the premises. Four words delete.

HENRY WRIGHT, sheriff officer."

The grounds for suspending the decree and charge are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is a note of suspension presented by John Hardie, who, with his wife, till recently resided at 160 High Street, Kirkcaldy. They now reside at Green Tree Inn, High Street, Kirkcaldy. The respondents are cabinetmakers and furniture dealers in Glasgow. The note sets out that the complainer has been charged jointly and severally with his wife, under a pretended decree pronounced on 20th March 1907 in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcaldy, at the instance of the respondents, first, to deliver to the respondents certain articles of household furniture, alleged to have been hired by the respondents to the complainer and his wife; and second, to make payment of £15, 2s. 6d., with interest from 24th September 1906, and £16, 17s. 10d. of expenses, "under pain of poinding and imprisonment so far as competent." It was not argued on behalf of the complainer that there was any ex facie irregularity in the decree. The case that he desired to make against it was that there was nothing in the circumstances to make him jointly and severally liable with his wife, and that she had not his authority or consent to make the contract for hiring the furniture which is contained in her letter of 6th December 1904, printed in Ans. 2. As it was not contended that the decree contained any ex facie irregularity, I am of opinion that before challenging it the complainer is bound to find caution. This, it was intimated at the Bar, he was not prepared to do, and accordingly I think that as regards the decree the note of suspension must be refused, in respect the complainer is not prepared to find caution.

The charge is in a different position. The copy charge for the complainer is No. 6 of process. It is printed in Statement 6, and three objections were stated to it on behalf of the complainer.

1. That the period within which the articles of furniture were to be delivered was not specified in the charge. I am of opinion that this objection is not well founded, because the printed words "within seven days next after the date of this my charge to you" are, in my opinion, applicable as much to the decree ad factum præstandum as to the decree for payment of money.

2. That the charge bears to be given "under pain of poinding and imprisonment so far as competent." It was pointed out that imprisonment was only competent for failure to perform the decree ad factum præstandum, and that the debt for which decree was granted was not within the classes of debts for which a debtor may be imprisoned. It was argued that inasmuch as the debtor could not tell from the charge which part of the decree the pain of imprisonment was applicable to, the charge was bad. Now it does not appear that there is any statutory form of charge. As is explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in the case of Williamson v. MacLachlan, 1866, 4 M. 1091 at p. 1095: "If a charge is so expressed as to convey to the person charged sufficient information of what he is required to do, and the warrant and authority on which the requisition is made, it complies with all that the common law requires." There does not, therefore, appear to be any necessity for inserting in the charge the nature of the pains and penalties. The complainer, however, says that, if they are inserted, they must be inserted correctly, and described with sufficient distinctness to enable him to understand what they are. His contention was that a charge in the form complained of might be equivalent to a threat of imprisonment in the event of his failure to pay the sums which he was charged to pay. It may be that the charge is open to this criticism. The respondents' answer, however, to this point seems to me to be conclusive. They found upon the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Extracts Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. cap. 17), and say that the decree in the present case exactly follows the form given in schedule 12 of that Act. The charge, they point out, exactly follows the form of the decree; the decree is precisely in the form of the statutory schedule, and therefore the sheriff officer has done all that was incumbent upon him. I think the respondents' contention upon this head is sound.

3. That the charge is blank in the name of the payee. This, to my mind, is a fatal objection to the charge. The complainer is first charged along with his wife jointly and severally to deliver to the pursuers the articles of furniture; they are then charged to make payment of the two sums of money, but the complainer is not told by the charge to whom the payment is to be made. In the complainer's copy of the charge he is merely told that payment is to be made to the said, and then follows the blank. In the copy charge for his wife the blank is filled up with the word "pursuers." Now matters of diligence have always been held to be strictissimi juris. Even without authority I should have been disposed to hold that the omission of the name of the payee was fatal of the charge. There is an expression of opinion in the case of Shiells v. Reid, 1829, 7 Shaw 535, by Lord Mackenzie on page 541, to the following effect: "The creditor must take his risk of all failures by the messenger, in observing the natural essentials of the dilgence in the copy left for the debtor, as well as other things; as if the messenger should, for instance, in the copy, omit the name of the creditor, his own name, or a material part of the letters, or the command given by virtue of them, there plainly must be a nullity, whatever might be the hardship on the creditor, who might not see the copy." This was no doubt obiter, but I take the same view as regards the omission here. It was argued that matters are not so strictly viewed now as they were in 1829, and no doubt a merely clerical error producing no misapprehension would not now be held fatal to the diligence. It was maintained that the words in print, "and that to the said," necessarily brought in a reference to what had gone before, but the name of the sheriff officer occurs before as well as the designation of the pursuers in the action.

I am accordingly of opinion that the reasons for suspending the decree should be repelled; that the charge given the complainer must be suspended quoad the payment of the sums of money; and that the reasons for suspending the charge given the complainer to deliver the articles of furniture should be repelled. The complainer is, in my opinion, entitled to expenses. —16*th November* 1907.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie — Watson's Executor v. Allan and Others.

This was a multiplepoinding brought by the Rev. William Watson, the executor nominated under the holograph will of Dr Donald Allan, for the determination of questions arising on the bequest of residue contained in that will, and for exoneration and discharge. The will was dated 23rd June 1900, and the testator died on 24th August 1906.

The clause of the will in which the bequest of residue was made is given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The claimants were Robert Allan and others, the whole parties interested in the deceased's intestate succession, who maintained that the bequest of residue was void from uncertainty, and, further, that, in any event, the Missions represented by the other claimants were not sufficiently identified as the Missions to which the deceased intended to make the bequest; the Rev. John M'Murtrie, D.D., and others, the office-bearers of and representing the Foreign Mission Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; and the Rev. Alexander Miller, D.D., and others, the Joint Secretaries of and as such representing the Foreign Mission Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland, and the Joint Treasurers of that Committee. The claims of the two Church Committees, and the facts averred in support of these claims, are set forth in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof before answer of the averments of the two Church Committees.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is a multiplepoinding with reference to the residue of the estate of the late Dr Allan, Evanton, Ross-shire, who died on 24th August 1906.

He left a holograph will dated 23rd June 1900, by which, after leaving certain special legacies, he dealt with the residue of his estate in the following manner:—"The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of Foreign Missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltearn, as my executor, at a remuneration of twenty pounds sterling." The next of kin maintain that this bequest of residue is void from uncertainty, and that they are accordingly entitled to succeed as heirs ab intestato.

Claims have been lodged by the office-bearers of the Foreign Mission Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; and also by the joint secretaries of and as such representing the Foreign Mission Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland, and the joint general treasurers of the United Free Church of Scotland, who, as such, are joint treasurers of the Foreign Mission Committee. These two sets of claimants originally claimed that each was entitled to the whole of the residue, but these claims are not insisted in, and they now make common cause against the next of kin. Their claims are alternative. First, each claims to be ranked and preferred along with the other to the whole of the residue in equal portions absolutely; or, otherwise, they claim to be ranked and preferred to the whole of the residue in equal portions, subject to such directions with regard to the distribution of the said equal portions among the foreign missions as may be directed by the pursuer and real raiser, the executor. No claim is lodged by the executor.

The first alternative is based upon the argument that, on a sound construction of the settlement, the bequest of residue was not for the benefit of the purposes of foreign missions, but was for the benefit of certain definite foreign mission schemes; that is to say, the Churches put their claim upon the ground that this is a case of a bequest to definite legatees insufficiently designed, and that under the authorities they are entitled to prove who the testator intended to benefit (Scottish Missionary Society, 1858, 20 D. 634; Wilson's Exrs., 1869, 8 M. 233). It is averred that the testator was born in the parish of Kiltearn and practised medicine in Bonar Bridge for about twenty years; that he then, about 1886 or 1887, left Bonar Bridge and settled at Evanton, where he lived until his death, and practised to a limited extent. He was thus a domiciled Scotsman, and had been a member of a Church in Scotland all his life. In the claim for the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland it is averred: "At the date of his death the testator was in full communion with the Church of Scotland, having for the last six years prior to his death attended his brother-in-law's church in the parish of Kiltearn. During that period he gave general contributions to the parish church at Kiltearn, and, through that church, to the schemes of the Church of Scotland, including the Foreign Mission Scheme of that Church. Prior to December 1900 the testator had been a member of the Old Free Church of Scotland, but upon the union of that Church with the United Presbyterian Church, he attended and became a member of the Church of Scotland, and continued to be so until his death."

The Foreign Mission Committee of the United Free Church aver "He regularly contributed to the Foreign Missions of the Free Church of Scotland at Bonar Bridge, and thereafter in Kiltearn, the parish in which Evanton is situated, up to the date of the union of the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church in 1900. After that date, as there was no United Free Church in his district, the testator in December 1900 became a member of the Church of Scotland at Kiltearn, of which his brother-in-law, the pursuer, was and is minister. The foreign missions formerly carried on by the Free Church of Scotland are now, and have been since the union of that Church with the United Presbyterian Church, carried on in their entirety by the United Free Church of Scotland." Each of these claimants avers that the Foreign Missions of the claimant's Church are those designated by the testator as entitled to his residue, or alternatively, that the residue fell to be equally divided between them. It is also averred that the Church of Scotland and "the United Free Church of Scotland are the only two Churches in Scotland who have foreign missions of an organised character. They both have extensive missions in India, China, and Africa as well as in other places." These averments appear to me to be sufficient to entitle the claimants to a proof.

The alternative contention for the Churches is founded upon a proposition well settled in law, and which is thus stated by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst) in Crichton v. Grierson, 1828, 3 W. & S. 329: "According to the authorities in the law of Scotland, it is quite clear that a man may, in the disposition of his property, select particular classes of individuals and objects, and then give to some particular individual a power after his death of appropriating the property or applying any part of his property to any particular individuals among that class whom that person may select" (Blair v. Duncan, 1901, 4 F. (H.L.) 1 at p. 5).

If, however, the testator did not intend to bequeath his residue to certain foreign mission schemes, if he intended to bequeath it for the benefit of foreign mission purposes generally, I am unable to hold, in view of the decided cases, that this was a sufficient selection of particular classes of individuals and objects. Assuming that the term foreign missions occurring in a will such as this is necessarily confined to religious missions and excludes all others, e.g., medical missions, the case seems to me to fall directly under the case of Macintyre v. Grimond's Trs., 1904, 6 F. 285, 7 F. (H.L.) 90, for the reasons given by Lord Moncreiff in the Court of Session, which were expressly approved by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords. I am of opinion that Dr Allan's bequest, if it is so interpreted, is not sufficiently specific to be supported. A bequest for religious purposes is not in Scotland construed as meaning a bequest for charitable purposes.

Even if it could be held that the testator had selected particular classes of individuals and objects, he has failed to give to some particular individual power after his death of appropriating the residue. It is to be observed that there is here no trust. The bequest of residue is a direct bequest. The testator's brother-in-law is appointed as his executor. It is said that under the Executors (Scotland) Act 1900, sect. 2, the term "executor" is equivalent to trustee. In my opinion this does not affect the point of importance, which is that no discretionary power of selection is given to any one under the will, nor do I think that such a power can be implied (Low's Exrs., 1873, 11 M. 744). As is pointed out by Lord M'Laren in Robbie's Judicial Factor, 1893, 20 R. 358 at p. 363, the appointment of hæres fiduciarius with a power of selection is essential to the existence of such a bequest, because in the absence of such a grant of power of selection the legacy would fail from uncertainty.

If the claimants represent the Foreign Missions which the testator intended to benefit they do not need to be selected by the executor in the exercise of any discretionary power (on the mere question of relevancy I do not find it stated on record that he has selected them); if the claimants require to be selected by the executors before becoming entitled to anything under the residue clause, then they are obliged to found upon a bequest which, as I have already said, is not sufficiently definite. The duty which would, according to the claimants' argument, be placed upon the executor would be the definition of a class, not the selection from a class defined.

It only remains to notice that an argument was stated against the title of the claimants. It was maintained that the bequest was to Foreign Missions and that they were not Foreign Missions that were claiming. I do not think there is anything in this plea. The only persons in titulo to grant a discharge for the Foreign Missions of the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church of Scotland would be the persons in whose names claims have been lodged.—21*st November* 1907.

213. Carrigan v. Cleland.

Process — Summons — Instance—Pupil—Capacity to Sue—Pupil Suing for Damages for Personal Injuries Without Father's Concurrence—Father Permanently Residing Abroad.

This was an action of damages by a pupil child, who at the time of the accident after-mentioned resided with his father, a labourer in Glasgow, for personal injuries alleged to have been caused to the pursuer by a kick from a horse which was being led by an employee of the defender along the streets of Glasgow. The pursuer averred that his father had since the date of the accident gone to America and permanently taken up his residence there.

The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the action was incompetent in respect (a) that it was raised against the will, et separatim without the sanction, of the pursuer's tutor and administrator-in-law, and (b) that the pursuer was in pupillarity.

The defender argued in the Procedure Roll that it was incompetent for a pupil to raise an action without the concurrence of his father, where the father was alive and able to act, had no separate interest, and resided at a known address. A pupil has no capacity to sue by himself, and the Court has never clothed a pupil with such capacity by the appointment of a curator ad litem, except in cases where the father was either dead or possessed of an interest adverse to the pupil's. Possibly the Court might intervene also where the father could not be communicated with; but here the father's address was known.

The pursuer argued that this was a fitting case for the intervention of the Court. It was sufficient to justify such intervention that a pupil has no tutor within the jurisdiction of the Court (Mackay's Practice, p. 147, sect. 12).

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action as incompetent.

Lord Guthrie.—The injured person in this action of damages is a pupil. His father is alive. But the action is not raised by the father, but is brought at the pupil's instance. The defender pleads that the action is incompetent in respect that it is raised by a pupil without the sanction of his tutor and administrator-in-law. The pursuer asks the Court to appoint a curator ad litem to him, by whom, if the curator thought fit to proceed with the action, it would be carried on. The pursuer's averment about his father is "at the time of the accident after-mentioned he lived with his father, James Carrigan, a labourer, at 91 Dale Street, Bridgeton, Glasgow. His father has since gone to the United States of America, where he has permanently taken up his residence."

The pursuer's counsel appealed to the cases in which it has been held that the Court may recognise an action brought into Court by a pupil without the conjunction, in the instance, of a father or other administrator, and where the absence of a legal pursuer has been cured by the judicial appointment of a curator ad litem. The defender replied by pointing out that in these cases, as they are detailed in Fraser on Parent and Child, page 209 et seq., the father was either dead or adverse. He admitted that to these categories might perhaps be added the case where the father cannot be communicated with. But he maintained that the mere fact of the father's residence being, temporarily or permanently, out of the jurisdiction, whether in England or in the United States, would not entitle the Court to take the admittedly strong step of recognising an action in which there is, strictly speaking, no pursuer.

I think the defender is right. The exception to the general rule seems to have been introduced on the ground of sheer necessity, to avoid what would amount to a denial of justice. In this case there is no basis of necessity to warrant the application of the exception. The father is admittedly alive, and it is not alleged either that he declines to raise the action or that he has any adverse interest, or even that there is any difficulty in communicating with him. — 26th November 1907.

On 8th April 1907 William Caird, a commercial traveller, was injured while attempting in Bressay Sound, from a small boat, to board the defenders' passenger steamer "St Rognvald." Caird and Another v. Thomas Adam and Others.

he had sustained through the fault of the defenders.

The defenders averred that "Mrs Caird's husband while travelling with the 'St Rognvald' between Lerwick and Kirkwall on the occasion in question, was travelling in virtue of a ticket issued to him by the defenders. One of the conditions of this ticket provided that 'This ticket is issued subject to all the conditions mentioned on the Company's sailing bills, and that the Company is not liable for any loss, injury, delay or accident to passengers or their luggage however the same may be carried, whether by negligence of their servants or otherwise, nor for any sea, river or steam risks whatsoever.'" The pursuers' averment in answer was a denial, and they pleaded, inter alia: "Esto that the deceased William Caird was travelling between Lerwick and Kirkwall in virtue of a ticket issued to him by the defenders, having on it the conditions set forth by them, the pursuers are not thereby barred from insisting in the present action, and the defenders' plea thereanent ought to be repelled."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia: "The said William Caird having accepted defenders' travelling ticket subject to the conditions contained in it and being aware of said conditions, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons."

The defenders proposed the following counter-issue: "Whether at the time of the accident to the said William Caird he was a passenger by the defenders' steamer 'St Rognvald' from Lerwick to Kirkwall under and in terms of the conditions which are set forth on the ticket issued by the defenders to him, whereby the defenders are not responsible for personal injury to him while a passenger?"

The form of the issue was objected to by the pursuers, and it was argued that there should be added to the issue whether Caird was aware of the conditions contained in the ticket and assented to them. Knowledge of and assent to the conditions are essential (Stevenson v. Henderson, 1875, 2 R. (H.L.) 71).

Argued for Defenders: This is the form of issue approved of in Grieve v. The Turbine Steamers Ltd., 1903, 11 S.L.T. 379, where the facts are identical with those in the present case. The question for the jury is: Had Caird reasonable notice of the conditions? (Parker v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 1877, 2 C.P.D. 416; Richardson, Spence & Co. and the "Lord Gough" Steamship Co. Ltd. v. Rowntree, 1894, A.C. 217).

The Lord Ordinary, following the case of Grieve, approved of the form of the counter-issue as proposed, but ordered the defenders to amend their record by adding an averment of knowledge by Caird of the conditions on the ticket.

Observed by Lord Salvesen that if he were the judge presiding at the trial he would direct the jury that Caird was not a passenger under and in terms of the conditions set forth in the ticket unless he knew or must be held bound to know of the conditions and assented to them either expressly or implicitly.—31*st October* 1907.

Workmen's Compensation Act — Unrecorded Agreement to Pay Compensation to Injured Workman—Cessation of Payment —Subsequent Warrant to Record Agreement — No Application for Review — Liability on Employers to Pay From Date of Warrant to Record—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. I, sects. (8) and (12).

This was a Note of Suspension by the Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd., brought to suspend a charge to pay the sum of £87, 18s. 9d., being one hundred and five weeks' compensation under a memorandum of agreement entered into by them with the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, or alternatively to suspend the charge quoad the sum of £57, 15s. 9d., being the compensation in respect of the period elapsing between the last payment to the respondent and the date of the Sheriff's warrant to record the agreement.

The workman was injured on 12th October 1904; the complainers paid him compensation at 16s. 9d. a week, the rate agreed on in said unrecorded memorandum of agreement, up to 25th January 1905, when they averred that his incapacity ceased, although no application for a review of the weekly payment was made by the complainers under sect. (12) of Sched. I of the Act. Thereafter the respondent brought an action in the Court of Session based on the same accident, concluding for damages at common law (ante, 13 S.L.T. 103). On the complainers being, on the 8th July 1905, assoilzied from the conclusions of said action in respect the respondent was barred by having elected to accept compensation, the respondent, on 17th February 1906, applied for and on 18th May 1906 obtained from the Sheriff-Substitute warrant to record said agreement, and said agreement was recorded on 20th December 1906. The complainers on 3rd April 1906 had applied to the Sheriff-Substitute to grant an arbitration, and this application was sisted pending the petition by the respondent for warrant to record the agreement. On warrant to record being granted, the Sheriff-Substitute refused the complainers' application for an arbitration, and an application by the complainers for a stated case on appeal against this refusal was refused by the First Division on 23rd October 1906 (1907, S.C. 3). The respondent having meantime charged the complainers to pay the full sum of compensation in terms of the agreement from their cessation of payment on 25th January 1905 to 30th January 1907—a period of one hundred and five weeks—this note of suspension was brought.

The arguments of the parties appear in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The following cases were cited, in addition to those mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's opinion: Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168; Fife Coal Co. Ltd. v. Davidson, 1906, 13 S.L.T. 703.

The Lord Ordinary suspended the charge only quoad the period from cessation of payment to the date of the warrant for recording the agreement, i.e. quoad the sum of £57, 15s. 9d.

Lord Guthrie.—In connection with an accident on 12th October 1904 the respondent was paid compensation for total incapacity by the complainers, in accordance with an unrecorded agreement entered into between them, under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Warrant to record the agreement was granted on 18th May 1906. No application for review has been made by the complainers under sect. 12 of the first schedule of the Act of 1897.

The complainers have been charged by the respondent to pay £87, 18s. 9d., being one hundred and five weeks' compensation from 25th January 1905, the last date of payment, to 30th January 1907. The respondent was not in the complainers' service after the accident.

The complainers maintain that they are not liable in payment of any part of the sum charged for, or otherwise that there can be no claim against them for the period prior to 18th May 1906, the date of the Sheriff-Substitute's warrant to record the agreement. The respondent's case is that even if wholly or partially recovered after 25th January 1905, the complainers remained, and remain, liable under the statutory agreement for the weekly payments, until review, under sect. 12 of the first statutory schedule; or otherwise, he maintains that he acquired a right from the date of the warrant to record, which endures till statutory review.

In my opinion the respondent's alternative contention is well founded.

By sect. 8 of the second schedule of the 1897 Act provision is made for recording a memorandum of agreement. The section proceeds: "Thereupon the said memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a Sheriff Court judgment." I see no warrant for holding that a charge can be given on an agreement prior to the date of the warrant to record (Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co., 1902, 5 F. 244; Cavaney v. Pumpherston Oil Co., 1903, 5 F. 963; Nimmo v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890).

Outer House. Lord Guthrie.

Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair.

After recording, or warrant to record, it appears to me that the right to payment continues till review under sect. 12 of the first schedule, except in three cases: first, where the same employer has actually paid a sum equal to the amount of the weekly payment, whether that payment be made in name of statutory compensation or as wages; if paid as wages, it will be held, so far as it goes, to include the statutory compensation (Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168); second, where it is proved that there was an agreement, express or implied, between the employers and the workman that the weekly payments should cease; or, third, where it is proved that the workman has admitted that the incapacity has wholly ceased.

In this case no payment of any kind was made by the complainers to the respondent subsequent to 25th January 1905, and I do not find any averment of agreement, express or implied, between the complainers and respondent that the weekly payment should cease, or any relevant averment of admission that the incapacity had wholly ceased. The authorities do not seem to me to establish the proposition, which I cannot find in the statute, that an employer's liability would terminate on proof that, if the workman had chosen, he might have earned the same wages as before the accident, or even on proof that, in point of fact, he did earn such wages from other employers, unless, in the latter case, it might be held that such conduct, on the part of the workman, involved what Lord Stormonth-Darling called a "practical admission" by the workman that his incapacity had totally ceased. Outer House. Lord Johnston. Holland v. County Council of Lanark.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action.

Lord Johnston.—The pursuer's averments in this case when his condescendence is read in connection with the answers to the defenders' statement of facts are not intelligible without something of the nature of a plan. He has failed to afford any assistance by way of a plan, and I have been obliged to have recourse to defenders' plan No. 8 of process for an explanation of the locus to enable me to understand the averments of parties. I do not assume that its accuracy is admitted, and I only use it as illustrative, and to enable me to understand the averments. When these are pictorially explained it turns out that the pursuer's original statement was most misleading, and, instead of correcting it, when faced with the true facts as to the locus, he has endeavoured to continue the disguise of the true facts by a confused mass of explanations in answer, which make it extremely difficult to ascertain what his real ground of complaint and true case really is. The record now runs in this simple matter to twelve pages of print, and, owing to the pursuer's attitude, it is, as I have said, very confused. I have no doubt that this has resulted from the difficulty which the pursuer's counsel have experienced in making anything like a relevant case.

In his condescendence the pursuer sets forth that in April 1907 he resided at 2 Pretoria Street, Cambuslang; that at a distance of less than thirty yards from his house there lay a disused quarry, situated in a piece of waste ground belonging to and occupied by the defenders, the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire District Committee; that the said ground was situated at the side of the tenement where the pursuer resided; that its sides were steep and dangerous ("its" referring grammatically to the ground, though I suspect intended to refer to the quarry); that it, presumably the ground, was fenced from the street where the pursuer resided, but that this fence was old and dilapidated, and in particular was broken down for a distance of 17 feet near the end of the tenement where the pursuer resided; that on 19th April 1907 the pursuer's son, aged six, was playing on said waste ground at the side of pursuer's tenement, when he fell into the quarry and was drowned, the water being 11 feet deep and the bank steep. And, accordingly, he now claims damages for the death of his son, which he attributes to the fault and negligence of the defenders in failing to sufficiently fence said waste ground and quarry, the waste ground beside said breach in said fence being, as he says, in close proximity to a populous neighbourhood where children abound, and being constantly used as a playground by children, and being also largely frequented by members of the public.

On the face of the pursuer's record as it at first stood, there was a prima facie case for enquiry, as the duty of the defenders and their alleged fault were matters of degree depending on the circumstances. It is doubtful whether there was sufficient specification, but at any rate there were the rudiments of a relevant case. But then the pursuer is forced to admit that his statement that the waste ground is situated at the side of the tenement where he resides; that it is fenced from the street where he resides by a sleeper fence, which is broken down for a distance of 17 feet near the end of the tenement where the pursuer resides, is entirely misleading.
